baptismal font was installed in the newly constructed baptistry.

On Aug. 30, 2005 some 130 attendees including parishioners, Knights of Columbus, Catholic Daughters of the Americas and lay Carmelites attended a Mass celebrating the 50th anniversary of St. Mary Church.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis celebrated the Mass, which was concelebrated by a number of diocesan priests.

"This church is living up to the purpose for which it was dedicated," Bishop Jugis said in his homily. "We know what the word 'dedication' means — something that is set aside for a single purpose. This building is set aside for one single purpose: the celebration of the sacred rites so that the people of God can be formed into a living temple."

Father Williams, the church's pastor since 2002, was unable, due to illness, to attend the celebration.

"What I stressed with the people and what I felt myself is that we're building on the past," he said later.

CHARLOTTE — For the next few months, Charlotte will be home to several of the oldest existing fragments of ancient Scripture.

The Dead Sea Scrolls exhibit at Discovery Place will allow Christians and non-Christians alike a rare opportunity to see what many archeologists, historians and theologians consider the most significant discovery of the 20th century.

"The Scrolls are not only a great historical discovery and artifact, but a connection between our faith today and the faith of the ages," said Frank Villaronga, diocesan director of evangelization and ministry formation. "Hopefully, when people see the Scrolls, they will feel closer to God and be

MOURNING A VISIONARY

A nun passes by the grave of Sister Lucia dos Santos inside the Carmelite cloister in Coimbra, Portugal, Feb. 17. The remains of Sister Lucia, the eldest of three Portuguese children to receive apparitions of Mary in 1917 in Fatima, Portugal, were transferred to the Basilica of Our Lady of Fatima Feb. 19. Sister Lucia died in her convent Feb. 13, 2005, at the age of 97.

More than 100,000 gather at Fatima to watch reburial of Sister Lucia FATIMA, Portugal (CNS) — Despite a persistent rain, more than 100,000 people gathered at the Shrine of Our Lady of Fatima to pray and witness the reburial of Carmelite Sister Lucia dos Santos, the last of three Fatima visionaries.

Sister Lucia died Feb. 13, 2005, in her cloistered convent in Coimbra, Portugal, at the age of 97.

She had been buried temporarily at the Carmelite convent while preparations were made for final burial alongside her two cousins, Blessed Francisco and Jacinta Marto, at the Shrine of Our Lady of Fatima.

On May 13, 1917 — when Lucia was 10 years old, Francisco was 9 and Jacinta was 7 — the children claimed to have seen the Blessed Virgin Mary at Fatima, near their home.

The apparitions continued once a month until October 1917 and later were declared worthy of belief by the Catholic Church.

In 2000 Pope John Paul II beatified Sister Lucia's cousins, who died as children.

The late pope long credited Mary with saving his life; he was shot May 13, the anniversary of the first of the apparitions in Fatima.

In 1984, he had the bullet fragment that was removed from his body placed in the crown of the Marian statue at the Fatima shrine.

Father Luis Kondor, assistant postulator of the children's sainthood cause, said the bishops of Portugal would ask Pope Benedict XVI to set aside the five-year waiting period and allow Sister Lucia's cause for canonization to begin.

The priest told Portugal's Catholic Radio Renascenca that before he died, Pope John Paul had expressed his willingness to set aside the waiting period called for by church law.

But Bishop Serafim de Sousa Ferreira Silva of Leiria-Fatima told the radio, "We must wait, with much patience and discernment, without precipitating things."

Archbishop Jorge Ferreira da Costa Ortiga of Braga, president of the Portuguese bishops' conference, told reporters: "More important than her beatification is the witness of holiness that Sister Lucia left as her testament."

Priests keep watch with families at Mexican mine entrance

MEXICO CITY (CNS) — As rescue workers slowly advanced through a collapsed mine in an effort to save 65 men trapped hundreds of meters below the surface, Father Juan Renovato was aboveground, trying to keep hope alive.

"People are getting desperate and hysterical," Father Renovato said Feb. 20, near the entrance to the Pasta de Conchos coal mine, near the town of San Juan de Sabinas in Mexico's Coahuila state.

Father Renovato and other priests were praying with and counseling the hundreds of family members and friends of the miners, who were trapped before dawn Feb. 19 when a gas explosion collapsed part of the mine.

Bishop Alonso Garza Trevino of Piedras Negras instructed the 12 priests in the area to take turns being at the entrance to the mine so that one of them would always be present for family members of the miners gathered there.

Officials said there had been no communication with the trapped men and that they were not sure they were still alive. The miners reportedly had six hours' worth of oxygen at the time of the explosion, but Coahuila Gov. Humberto Moreira Valdes said the pumps that push air through the mine's ventilation shafts continued to work.

However, Moreira said it was not certain that the air was getting to the part of the mine where the men were believed to be trapped, which was about 220 yards below the surface and down about 1.4 miles of mine shaft.

Father Renovato, rector of Martyrs of Christ the King Cathedral in Piedras Negras, said the priests were telling the miners' family members to maintain faith and hope.

"We can't lose hope now, because now is when hope is most important," Father Renovato said.

"Every minute that passes makes the situation more difficult for the miners," he said.

FROM THE VATICAN

Lack of justice, peace shows sin still paralyzes people, pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The lack of justice and peace in the world is a sign that despite people's good intentions, sin still paralyzes many of them, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Reciting the Angelus Feb. 19, Pope Benedict said the day's Gospel reading about Jesus forgiving the sins of the paralyzed man and healing him demonstrates that Christ's primary mission is to heal souls.

"The paralyzed man is the image of every human being impeded by sin from moving freely, from walking on the path of goodness, from giving the best of himself," the pope said.

"Evil, nesting in the soul, binds man with the ropes of lies, anger, envy and the other sins, and paralyzes him little by little," he said.

The presence of sin prevents humanity from fully developing "those values of brotherhood, justice and peace" which are celebrated and proclaimed in solemn declarations signed by most countries in the world, he said.

Pope Benedict said there obviously are many complex reasons for the failure of the international community to realize the ideals it proclaims, but the Gospel calls Christians to trust that Christ can and will heal the world.

"Only the love of God can renew the heart of man, and only if it is healed in its heart can paralyzed humanity get up and walk," he said. "The love of God is the true force that will renew the world."

At the end of his address, Pope Benedict offered special prayers for the victims of the Feb. 17 mudslides in the Philippines, where more than a thousand are feared dead, buried beneath the mud.

"Our hearts turn to all those suffering the devastating consequences of the landslide in the Philippines," the pope said.

Vatican says number of priests increases, but varies by continent

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The number of priests and seminarians in the world continues to increase, but the situation varies widely from continent to continent, the Vatican said.

The most positive signs come from Asia and Africa, while Europe has shown a marked decline in priestly vocations, according to a Feb. 18 statement from the Vatican press office.

The statistics were released in connection with the presentation of the 2006 edition of the Vatican yearbook, known as the Annuario Pontificio, which catalogs the church's pastoral presence diocese-by-diocese.

The press office referred to data on church population, priests and seminarians through 2004, the last year for which statistics are available.

It said the number of priests in the world was 405,891 at the end of 2004, an increase of 441 from 2003. About two-thirds were diocesan priests and one-third members of religious orders.

Asia added more than 1,400 priests over that period and Africa added 840. The situation was relatively stable in North and South America and Oceania, while Europe showed a decrease of nearly 1,900 priests.

The number of seminarians in the world rose to just over 113,000 in 2004, an increase of more than 670 from 2003. Africa and Asia again showed the greatest increases, while Europe continued to evidence a "clear decline," the Vatican said.

The global population of Catholics reached nearly 1.1 billion at the end of 2004, an increase of about 12 million, or about 1.1 percent, from 2003.

The Vatican said the number of permanent deacons continued to grow, increasing by about 2.5 percent in the period 2003-2004. At the end of 2004, there were more than 32,300 permanent deacons in the world.

The Vatican issues a separate statistical yearbook later in the year.

Pope names 15 new cardinals, including two from U.S.

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In his first set of major appointments, Pope Benedict XVI named 15 new cardinals, including U.S. Archbishops William J. Levada, head of the Vatican's doctrinal congregation, and Sean P. O'Malley of Boston.

The pope announced the names at the end of his general audience Feb. 22 and said he would formally install the cardinals at a special consistory March 24.

The pope also convened the entire College of Cardinals for a day of reflection and prayer March 23 and said he would celebrate Mass with the cardinals March 25, the feast of the Annunciation of the Lord. It will be the first gathering of the College of Cardinals since they elected Pope Benedict last April.

The pope said the new cardinals reflect the universality of the church.

The new cardinals represent 11 countries from five continents. Three are Vatican officials, nine are heads of dioceses or archdioceses around the world, and three are prelates over age 80 being honored for their service to the church.

A giving SPIRIT

Youth group cooks, serves meals to homeless

STATESVILLE — Sometimes a little spirit goes a long way.

SPIRIT, the high school youth group at St. Philip the Apostle Church in Statesville, cooked, delivered and served food to more than 70 people at the Fifth Street Ministries soup kitchen Jan. 29.

The youths collected food and monetary donations from family and parishioners to make the meals, which consisted of spaghetti, salad, bread, brownies and drinks.

The youths have served at the soup kitchen annually, but this was the first year they cooked the meal.

"They had a lot of fun and enjoyed the appreciation and compliments from the people who were happy to have such a nice meal," said Tina Swaney, youth minister.

Afterward, the youths reflected on the experience.

"They expressed thanks for what they take for granted and gave thanks for the opportunity to be the 'hands of Christ,'" said Swaney. "They felt that they had received so much more than they had given."

Knights recognize efforts of Holy Cross parishioners, others

KERNERSVILLE — The Knights of Columbus recently presented a number of awards to parishioners of Holy Cross Church in Kernersville and other organizations.

The annual parish recognition program is sponsored by Holy Cross Council 8509 and the Columbiettes, its sister organization. Awards were given during the council's Jan. 21 spaghetti dinner, which raised funds for a local police officer wounded in the line of duty.

The award program recognizes individuals who voluntarily served the church and community through stewardship and service projects in 2005. The winners received certificates of appreciation and a combined award of $250 to be distributed to charities of their choice.

Deacon Eugene Gillis, permanent deacon at Holy Cross Church, received the Parishioner of the Year Award.

The Gillis family helped found Holy Cross Church in the 1960s, and Deacon Gillis' service to the parish "in love, time and leadership are unparalleled," according to the council's newsletter.

Other nominees for the award were Al Livelsburger, Bill McAlidin and Fred Schaefer.

The David Reinhart Award was presented to Patricia Henderson who "exemplified the selfless and dedicated volunteerism demonstrated by its namesake in the community at large."

Other nominees were Marie Kinney, Melanie Feeney Lewis and Frances Petticord.

Cheryl Gilreath received the Junior Achiever Award for her service to the sick and homebound. She served also as a missionary last summer in New Mexico. She desires to continue serving others by joining the religious life.

Others nominated were Madeline Lewis, Jason Meyer and Margaret Smith.

A special monetary award of $250 was given to a fund for Kernersville Police Officer Jeff Weathers, who is recovering from injuries received in the line of duty. Other monetary gifts were given to the Just One Dollar For Africa Charity and a Holy Cross parishioner in need of assistance.

ignorance, not ill will.

At the same time, the pope wants to offer reconciliation to followers of the late French Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre — but not at the cost of “disowning” the Second Vatican Council, said Cardinal Francis Arinze, the Nigerian who heads the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments.

Cardinal Arinze spoke about the direction of the new papacy in an interview in early February. He said he expected important movies — but not a purge — to improve liturgy under Pope Benedict.

“I do not expect an aggressive correction of abuses. I don’t think the pope is going to use the ecclesiastical hammer,” Cardinal Arinze said.

“Pope Benedict has very clear doctrine and convictions. What many people may not know is that he is not rough. He is gentlemanly, in the sense of what the prophet Isaiah said: ‘A bruised reed he will not break,’” the cardinal said.

Many liturgical abuses, Cardinal Arinze said, are “based on weakness of faith or ignorance” or on a wrong idea of creativity. Where improper practices occur, it is important to begin identifying them and talking about them, but without harming the people involved, the cardinal said.

That could be one reason the pope is focusing on the bigger faith issues, understanding that the quality of worship reflects knowledge of the faith, he said.

A good example, he said, is the pope’s first encyclical, “Deus Caritas Est” (“God Is Love”).

Liturgical direction

Many people are scrutinizing papal Masses for clues to liturgical direction under the new pope.

“Obviously, people are watching the details, and I cannot blame them,” Cardinal Arinze. “I think the papal liturgies are beautiful and that people like them.”

He said the election of Pope

Benedict, who wrote extensively about liturgy as a cardinal, kindled hope for reconciliation with the Society of St. Pius X, which was founded by Archbishop Lefebvre and which rejected the new Mass and several Vatican II teachings or directives.

Cardinal Arinze shares that hope, but said people should realize that the pope “cannot change the faith of the church.”

“He cannot disown Vatican II in order to make the Lefebvrites happy. The pope cannot reinvent everything, or act as if Vatican II did not take place,” he said.

Tridentine Mass

While some have proposed a wider indulgence to allow use of the pre-Vatican II Tridentine Mass with fewer restrictions, Cardinal Arinze said he is happy with Pope John Paul II’s rules, which require the involvement of the local bishop.

“When you speak of wider use for everybody, it raises some questions, which have to be examined more carefully,” he said.

The cardinal said he thought that for most people the question is not the Tridentine rite versus the new Mass, but the much more basic issues of faith, love of Christ and the appreciation of the importance of Sunday Mass.

“If a person has these, many of these other problems would fall into line,” he said.

Liturgical texts

Cardinal Arinze said one priority that has carried over to the new pontificate is the translation of liturgical texts.

“The pope has said, let the various translations of the Missal proceed quickly, because the people are waiting. These pieces of paper used on Sunday and little leaflets are not ideal. You really need the whole book translated,” he said.

He said the new Roman Missal, released in Latin in 2002, is 1,300 pages long and has excellent texts, including some new ones, but the people do not have them in their local languages.

The cardinal said he hoped work on the English translation would be completed in two years. He said that would not depend principally on the Vatican, but rather on the priority given the project by bishops’ conferences.

sion on English in the Liturgy for bishops’ conferences, which can adopt, amend or reject the translation.

The worship congregation, meanwhile, has established a committee of 12 bishops, called Vox Clara, to help it evaluate the texts as they are being prepared.

The congregation’s closer watch on translations in recent years does not mean the Vatican wants to supplant local bishops and bishops’ conferences as the “key people” in translating liturgical texts, Cardinal Arinze said.

But sometimes, he said, the congregation gives its views on a particular translation as it is being done, so that translated texts will receive ratification in Rome with the least delay.

Heading a congregation

Cardinal Arinze, 73, has headed the worship and sacraments congregation since 2002. Liturgy has always been one of his primary interests, and he wrote his doctoral dissertation on sacrifice in a Nigerian traditional religion as an introduction to the catechesis of the Catholic Mass.

The cardinal has been a popular speaker in the United States, and his reflections on liturgy and other topics have been featured in a number of recent video podcasts.

He heads a staff of 36 experts responsible for responding to questions from around the world, reviewing texts and ministerial books in many languages, hosting groups of bishops, attending a multitude of meetings and conferences, promoting liturgical knowledge and practice, and discouraging abuses.

Last year the congregation sponsored a study day at the Vatican to encourage dioceses to take liturgical music more seriously.

‘Spiritual banquet’

Cardinal Arinze said the main challenge facing his congregation is to encourage a spirit of prayer, which must grow out of faith. He said bringing people to Mass regularly is essential, and it hinges largely on two factors: catechesis and high-quality, faith-filled liturgies.

Celebrating Mass well involves lay ministers, but primarily the priest, who sets a tone through every word and gesture, the cardinal said.

Likewise, a priest has to preach well, making sure that his homily offers theological and scriptural enlightenment, and not merely verbal “acrobatics” to show off how many books he’s read, he said.

The cardinal said that if done well Sunday Mass will not be experienced as a heavy obligation, but as a spiritual banquet, a celebration appreciated by the faithful who are hungry for spiritual nourishment and want to adore God.

“You should not need a commandment to enter such a banquet hall,” he said.

The Diocese of Charlotte

In the Diocese of Charlotte, Bishop Peter J. Jugis said the parishes and religious houses are continuing the process of implementing the liturgical norms, which were promulgated in March 2005.

The liturgical norms cover all aspects of the Mass, from Introductory Rites to Communion. The norms ensure reverence for the Eucharist and preserve the unity of the Catholic Church.

“The liturgical norms are an indispensable reference point for liturgies throughout the diocese,” said Bishop Jugis.

The norms are available on the Diocese of Charlotte’s Web site, www.charlottediocese.org.

Director reflects on 20 years in development office

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — Jim Kelley has been a busy man for the last 20 years.

February 2006 marks two decades for Kelley serving as director of development in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"It's been an incredible experience. I could never have predicted any of it," he said.

Kelley manages the office that operates the annual Diocesan Support Appeal; assists parishes with stewardship efforts and capital campaigns; assists development efforts for diocesan Catholic schools, campus ministry and Catholic Social Services; directs the planned giving and major gift programs and writes grants.

"The primary focus of the office is to encourage parishioners to commit to stewardship as a way of life. We also provide parishes and agencies with services to provide funds for ministries that change lives," said Kelley. "That's been our focus for the last 20 years ... to help people."

"When Jim came on board, he wanted to take a route that truly changes people's lives," said Barbara Gaddy, associate director of development. "We haven't strayed from that concept."

Kelley also serves as executive director of the diocesan Foundation, which provides endowments for the diocese and its parishes, agencies and schools.

Prior to joining the diocese, Kelley worked as an administrative manager for Seventh Street Detox Center in Charlotte. He said God's hand was involved in his decision to accept then-chancellor Msgr. John McSweeney's invitation in 1985 to create the diocesan development office.

"From high school on, I've always asked God to direct me where he wants me to be," said Kelley. "He's always helped me move in the right direction."

Kelley has helped the diocese move in the right direction also. According to Gaddy, the diocese is at the forefront of the United States, and possibly the world, in its stewardship efforts, thanks to Kelley.

"We're at the top because of the way our operations are set up," said Gaddy. "Jim directs all 15 of the office's stewardship and development programs, and we work as a team to coordinate those efforts. Very few development offices in the United States can say that."

Kelley is happy to share his development experience outside the diocese, authoring "Stewardship Manual: A Guide for Individuals and Parishes Developing Stewardship as a Way of Life" and "Sustaining and Strengthening Stewardship," as well as co-authoring two publications for the International Catholic Stewardship Council.

He has spoken at national conferences and provided onsite consulting work and presentations in 75 of the 195 dioceses in the United States.

"We've also taken our stewardship message to other countries, most recently when visiting Australia in 2004," said Kelley.

Representatives from several Australian dioceses have visited the Diocese of Charlotte three times to study development and stewardship efforts.

In addition to his hard-working staff, Kelley credits the efforts of those in the parishes, schools and agencies for their development and stewardship success.

"We have so many who take stewardship seriously and give back generously of their time, talent and treasure in gratitude for God's blessings in their lives," said Kelley.

Stewardship plays an important role in Kelley's private life as well. Married

Sisters find fun, competition on slopes

GREENSBORO — The lack of snow in the Triad didn't keep two students at St. Pius X School in Greensboro from taking to the slopes in ski competitions.

Both fifth-grader Madeline Burnham, age 10, and her sister, second-grader Caity Burnham, age 7, competed on the Sugar Mountain ski team at the High Country Junior Race Series state championships at Appalachian Ski Mountain resort Feb. 12.

Madeline took first place for the girls 9-10 age division and took top prize for most points earned in her division during the 2006 season.

Madeline also qualified this month to compete in the 2006 national ski competition hosted by NASTAR, a national recreational ski-racing group, in Steamboat Springs, Colo., in March.

Margaret Burnham, their mother and an avid skier, introduced the girls to skiing when each turned 5 years old.

"They love to ski," said Burnham. "It's still brand new for Caity. But something clicked for Madeline this year and she got really fast."

Although Caity did not qualify for the national competition in Colorado, she plans to be there to support her older sister.

Madeline and Caity Burnham, students at St. Pius X School in Greensboro, recently participated in qualifying competitions for an upcoming national ski competition in Colorado.

with two children, Kelley is a parishioner of St. Matthew Church in Charlotte and has volunteered with homeless organizations and the United Way of Central Carolinas for the last 25 years.

His efforts have earned him a number of awards, two of which have been named in his honor — one from the local Homeless Services Network and one from the United Way.

Kelley looks toward the future with excitement.

"In the development office, we're always grateful but never satisfied. We can always do a better job; we can always improve to help others make a better way of life," he said.

And he can't imagine doing anything else.

"God led me to work in the diocese. We're making a great impact," he said.

"We're going to keep doing more to better serve the parishes, agencies and schools."

FACTS AND FIGURES

Under Jim Kelley's leadership over the last 20 years, the development office has:

- helped raise $235 million for the diocese and diocesan schools and agencies;
- completed more than 114 capital campaigns, raising from $45,000 to several million dollars;
- helped create 137 endowments in the diocesan Foundation;
- increased the Diocesan Support Appeal total from $800,000 in 1985 to $4.1 million in 2004.

the Olympics here" in his own backyard, said Cardinal Severino Poletto of Turin.

"He's a great saint, a modern model of holiness and youth," said the cardinal.

In order to tell Olympic visitors more about Turin's favorite saint-in-the-making, two Blessed Pier Giorgio associations came together to set up two exhibits for the duration of the games. One was set up in a small church in Bardonecchia and another in a Turin church where Blessed Pier Giorgio was made a Third Order Dominican, a lay order.

The exhibits, called "A Saint on Skis," tell the story of a young outdoorsman who was a friend to the poor and active in many church-sponsored associations and political groups that fought for social justice.

His great sense of humor and generosity made him very popular with his peers. With his closest friends he formed a club, "the Shady Characters," and he was nicknamed "Robespierre" and "the Terror" because of the practical jokes he liked to concoct.

Wanda Gawronska, Blessed Pier Giorgio's niece and the head of the Rome-based Pier Giorgio Frassati association, said people are attracted to this young man once they discover he led "a completely normal life."

"He had all the same problems young people have. He had exams to study for, parents who didn't get along, and he fell madly in love with a girl," she said while visiting Turin and the exhibits she helped organize.

He never gave up the fun things in life — he cherished his friends, he loved climbing mountains, skiing slopes, and helping his family, she said.

Humble living

But, at the same time, Blessed Pier Giorgio lived his life with an intense spirituality and devotion to Christ and the Eucharist, she said.

"He really felt Christ" was present in those who were less fortunate, said Gawronska. "He said he saw the poor and suffering were surrounded by a particular light" that others did not have.

Gawronska, whose 103-year-old mother is Blessed Pier Giorgio's sister, said his pockets were always stuffed with tiny slips of paper — each one had the address or request of people who needed help.

"He went everywhere, bringing people food, looking for jobs for people, helping children, visiting the prison; he was someone people really counted on," she said.

Blessed Pier Giorgio was from an influential and wealthy family, but he pinched his pennies so he could spend most of his allowance on the poor.

People often asked him why he always traveled third class, Gawronska said. Though he did it to save money that he would later spend on others, he would reply, "because there was no fourth class."

He kept meticulous records of how he spent his allowance. On a page from a notebook he kept during a brief stay in Berlin, he listed the amounts he spent on others, like the "poor children of Berlin" and of the smaller amounts he spent on himself for coffee, bread and cigars.

He never went without his cigars, Gawronska said: "His expenses were always alms and cigars."

'Beneficial influence'

Blessed Pier Giorgio was active in Catholic Action and the Popular Party, which promoted the church's social teaching. He once said, "Charity is not enough; we need social reform."

Pope John Paul II, who beatified him in 1990, said Blessed Pier Giorgio had served as "a beneficial influence" during his own youth in Poland and that as a student he "was impressed by the force of his Christian testimony."

In a homily celebrating the International Jubilee for Athletes in 1984, Pope John Paul said Blessed Pier Giorgio's dedication to helping the poor and suffering was an example of how to sow peace among people, "making us brothers and sisters."

He called on his audience to look closely at how this young man lived and to use him as an example, "a program" to follow so that they, too, could "be messengers of the true peace of Christ."

Born in 1901, Blessed Pier Giorgio "anticipated the church teachings of the Second Vatican Council. He had a lay vocation, and this fascinated the church," said Gawronska.

Blessed Pier Giorgio, known as "the Man of the Eight Beatitudes," died from polio, probably after contracting it from the people he helped, she said.

His remains are buried in a chapel in Turin's St. John the Baptist Cathedral, next to the chapel housing the Shroud of Turin.

Jars, such as the one pictured above, were found at the site of the Dead Sea Scrolls in 1947. The jars were made more than 2,000 years ago and were used to store scrolls containing biblical and non-biblical texts.

What are the Dead Sea Scrolls?

In 1947, young Bedouin shepherds, searching for a stray goat in the Judean Desert, entered a long-untouched cave and found jars filled with ancient scrolls.

That initial discovery by the Bedouins yielded seven scrolls and began a search that lasted nearly a decade and eventually produced thousands of scroll fragments from 11 caves.

During those same years, archaeologists excavated the Qumran ruin, a complex of structures located on a barren terrace between the caves and the Dead Sea.

Shortly after their discovery, historical, paleographic and linguistic evidence, as well as carbon-14 dating, established that the scrolls and the Qumran ruin dated from the third century B.C.E. to 68 C.E.

Coming from the late Second Temple Period, during the time when Jesus Christ lived, the Scrolls are older than any other surviving biblical manuscripts by almost 1,000 years.

compelled to read the Scriptures with a renewed energy."

The exhibit is the East Coast debut of an 11,000 square-foot exhibition featuring the original Dead Sea Scrolls, some of which have never been seen outside of Israel, and may never be again. The exhibition runs through May 29.

"This is undoubtedly one of the most prized exhibitions to come to Charlotte," said Larry Polsky, chair of the Discovery Place board of trustees.

The design and construction of the exhibit hall were led by Joanie Philipp, director of major projects for Discovery Place and a parishioner of St. Ann Church in Charlotte.

"In February 2005, we learned we had been approved for the exhibit," Philipp said.

She had planned to use an existing exhibit from a museum in Michigan, but in May 2005, she learned the Israel Antiquities Authority wanted an entirely new exhibit constructed.

"Normally it takes about two years to build an exhibit from the ground up," Philipp said. "We did it in eight months."

The discovery of the century

In 1947, a young Bedouin goat herder and his companions discovered clay jars filled with scrolls in a cave near the Dead Sea. That initial discovery began a search that lasted nearly a decade.

Two of the principal archeologists were G. Lankaster Harding, director of the Department of Antiquities in Jordan, and Father Roland de Vaux, a French Dominican priest who headed the Ecole Biblique (Bible School) in Jerusalem.

Eventually, the excavation of 11 caves yielded thousands of fragments from hundreds of scrolls, hidden for at least 2,000 years. Today, most of the artifacts from the site are kept in the care of the Israel Antiquities Authority, which continues to research, conserve and preserve the manuscripts.

The Dead Sea Scrolls date back to the time of Jesus Christ and include some of the earliest surviving texts later forming the books of the Old Testament. Until the Dead Sea Scrolls' discovery, no existing texts of the Hebrew Bible could be dated before 895 C.E. (Common Era).

The Dead Sea Scrolls were transcribed between 250 B.C.E (Before Common Era) and 68 C.E, in Hebrew, Aramaic or Greek — closing a 1,200-year gap by a millennium.

"If you compare the Dead Sea Scrolls translation to the latest translation we have, they are extremely similar," said Father James Hawker, diocesan vicar for education and pastor of St. Luke Church in Mint Hill. "That would show that the latest translation we have, which was written about 900 A.D., is quite accurate."

The Scrolls in Charlotte

The Dead Sea Scrolls exhibit at Discovery Place begins with entry into a gateway fashioned to look like the opening of a desert cave. After an introductory film, visitors hear and see the story of the scrolls, including their discovery, the controversy that surrounded them, their on-going decryption and the massive effort to preserve them.

The exhibition continues with installations illustrating the community of Qumran where the scrolls were written, and the lifestyle of those who wrote and copied them.

The Gallery of Scrolls features 10 authentic scrolls and three replicas that include passages from Deuteronomy, Genesis, Isaiah and Psalms. The exhibition also features other artifacts discovered in association with the scrolls at Qumran.

After the scrolls are exhibited in Charlotte, they will be returned to Israel and stored in darkness for a year for preservation purposes. Some of these same scrolls may never leave Israel again.

This fragment of a scroll found near the Dead Sea contains compositions not included in the Bible. The fragments on display at Discovery Place in Charlotte.

DID YOU KNOW?

— Only Caves 1 and 11 have produced relatively intact manuscripts. Discovered in 1952, Cave 4 produced the largest find — about 15,000 fragments from more than 500 manuscripts were found.

— Scholars have identified the remains of about 825-870 separate scrolls.

— The scrolls can be divided into two categories — biblical and non-biblical. Fragments of every book of the Hebrew canon (Old Testament) except the book of Esther have been discovered.

— Prophecies by Ezekiel, Jeremiah and Daniel not found in the Bible are written in the scrolls.

— Although the Qumran community, where the scrolls were found, existed during the time of the ministry of Jesus, none of the scrolls refers to him, nor does any mention his followers described in the New Testament.

— The last words of Joseph, Judah, Levi, Naphtali and Amram (the father of Moses) are written in the scrolls.

— The scrolls contain previously unknown stories about biblical figures such as Enoch, Abraham and Noah. The story of Abraham includes an explanation as to why God asked Abraham to sacrifice his son, Isaac.

— Although most of the scrolls are made of animal skins, some are made of papyrus and one is copper. They are written with a carbon-based ink, from right to left, using no punctuation except for an occasional paragraph indentation. In fact, in some cases, there are not even spaces between the words.

— Some of the Dead Sea Scrolls actually appeared for sale in the Wall Street Journal June 1, 1954. The advertisement read, "The Four Dead Sea Scrolls: Biblical manuscripts dating back to at least 200 BC are for sale. This would be an ideal gift to an educational or religious institution or group. Box F206." The scrolls were purchased for $250,000.

Visitors to Discovery Place examine the copper scrolls found among the Dead Sea Scrolls in Qumran. The scrolls contain a list claiming the existence of hidden treasure. The actual existence of such a treasure has never been proven or refuted.

Why are the Dead Sea Scrolls Important?

Since their discovery, the scrolls and the identity of the nearby settlement of Qumran have been the object of great scholarly and public interest, as well as heated debate and controversy.

They represent an invaluable source for exploring the nature of post-biblical times and probing the sources of both Judaism and Christianity.

Judaism

The Dead Sea Scrolls include a range of contemporary documents that serve as a window on a turbulent and critical period in the history of Judaism.

In addition to three groups identified by Josephus, Judaism was further divided into numerous religious sects and political parties. With the destruction of the Temple and the commonwealth in 70 C.E., all that came to an end. Only the Judaism of the Pharisees—Rabbinic Judaism—survived.

Reflected in Qumran literature is a Judaism in transition: moving from the religion of Israel as described in the Bible to the Judaism of the rabbis as expounded in the Mishnah (a third-century compilation of Jewish laws and customs which forms the basis of modern Jewish practice).

Christianity

The Dead Sea Scrolls, which date back to the events described in the New Testament, have added to our understanding of the Jewish background of Christianity.

Scholars have pointed to similarities between beliefs and practices outlined in the Qumran literature and those of early Christians. These parallels include comparable rituals of baptism, communal meals and property.

Most interesting are the parallel organizational structures: the sectarians divided themselves into 12 tribes led by 12 chiefs, similar to the structure of the early Christian Church, with 12 apostles who, according to Jesus, were to sit on 12 thrones to judge the 12 tribes of Israel.

Many scholars believe that both the literature of Qumran and the early Christian teachings stem from a common stream within Judaism and do not reflect a direct link between the Qumran community and the early Christians.

Pope tells magazine staff church must participate in cultural debates

By CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The Catholic Church must participate in modern cultural debates, finding ways to present enduring truths in a serious, yet accessible way, Pope Benedict XVI said.

The pope met Feb. 17 with the editors and staff of La Civiltà Cattolica, a Jesuit-run magazine founded by Pope Pius IX in 1850 and one that continues to be reviewed by the Vatican Secretariat of State before publication.

By writing about cultural, social and political issues, the pope said, the magazine helps the Catholic Church in its dialogue with the modern world, identifying positive trends and offering the guidance of the Gospel.

Increasingly, modern culture is "closed to God and to his moral law, even if it is not always prejudicially adverse to Christianity," the pope said.

At the same time, he said, there are many signs of hope, including "the new sensitivity to religious values on the part of many men and women; renewed attention to sacred Scripture; respect for human rights to a greater degree than occurred even in the recent past; (and) the desire to dialogue with other religions."

In the face of such ambiguity, he said, "Catholics are called to make a great effort to develop the dialogue with modern culture and open it to the perennial values of the transcendent."

The mission of La Civiltà Cattolica, he said, is "to participate in the contemporary cultural debate both to propose, in a serious yet popular way, the truths of the Christian faith in a clear manner faithful to the magisterium of the church and to defend, without a polemical spirit, the truth, which is sometimes deformed, including through unfounded accusations against the church community."

Pope Benedict said the teaching of the Second Vatican Council is the "lighthouse" that should guide the magazine.

He said that although the council concluded 40 years ago its "doctrinal and pastoral riches" have not been fully appreciated.

"Undoubtedly, it gave the church an impulse capable of renewing it and preparing it to respond adequately to the new problems that contemporary culture raises," he said.

In addition, Pope Benedict said, the documents and statements of the Vatican and of bishops' conferences around the world in response to new concerns are a "living spring" the magazine can draw upon in its work.

The pope asked the magazine's staff to devote special energy to explaining and promoting the social teaching of the Catholic Church.

Father Peter-Hans Kolvenbach, superior general of the Jesuits, addressed the pope on behalf of the magazine's staff, telling him La Civiltà Cattolica wants its work to be marked by fidelity to the Holy See and love for the church.

"At the beginning of the 21st century, new problems confront the church," he said.

Father Kolvenbach said the pope had outlined the problems in several of his writings, but particularly in his encyclical "Deus Caritas Est" ("God Is Love").

"Our magazine intends to move along the lines indicated in the documents in the conviction that in them and through the action of the Holy Spirit" the church would be led and protected "through the joyful and the painful events of human history," Father Kolvenbach said.

Pope to visit Vatican Radio as it celebrates 75 years

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI was scheduled to visit the Vatican's own radio station as it celebrated its 75th anniversary.

Since Feb. 12, 1931, when Pope Pius XI officially inaugurated Vatican Radio, every pope except Pope John Paul I — who was pope for 34 days — has paid at least one official visit to the station or its broadcasting centers.

On March 3, Pope Benedict was scheduled to visit the radio's headquarters at the Palazzo Pio building that sits at the opposite end of the wide boulevard in front of St. Peter's Basilica, just across from Castel Sant'Angelo.

The pope was to wrap up his visit by delivering an address to the radio's staff in the building's Marconi Hall.

The building is the radio's programming and broadcasting hub, where journalists from 59 different countries produce more than 64 hours of programming daily in some 45 different languages.

The radio's general director, Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, told journalists Feb. 21 that the high point of the radio's anniversary celebrations would be Pope Benedict's visit.

Repent, believe in Gospel, says Jesus

By DANY LUBY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Each year, many of us think hard about what we should "do for Lent."

Many choose spiritual practices involving additional religious disciplines — special prayers, more frequent attendance at Mass, participation in Lenten devotions like Stations of the Cross and eucharistic adoration, etc.

Many others focus more on practices of detachment, observing Lent by "giving up" one thing or another for the duration of the season — sweets, smoking, a favorite TV show, that daily glass of wine with supper.

Such customs have been a longstanding tradition among Catholics, and they are valuable not only in themselves but for the way they strengthen our sense of identity as Catholics, members of this ancient community of disciples of Jesus.

As we wrestle with specific choices about how we will observe this holy season, it might be wise to reflect on Jesus' words in the Gospel for the first Sunday of Lent. There the Lord frames our task in two related parts.

"Repent," he tells us; that is, turn away from sin and darkness, from the habits of self-indulgence that blind us to the needs and rights of others. Step aside from patterns of selfishness that isolate us from family, church, the larger human community.

But repentance is not the end of Jesus' Lenten call.

"Repent," he tells us, "and believe in the Gospel."

Turn away from sin, and at the same time turn toward the light of life in Christ. Live in a way that reflects a firm conviction that God loves us with an undying and passionate love, that we are, all of us, God's beloved children, sisters and brothers in Christ.

As we choose our individual and communal Lenten practices, may we measure our choices by how they will help us both "repent" and "believe in the Gospel."

Questions:

How do my typical Lenten practices assist me to both "repent" and "believe in the Gospel"? What is one new practice that might help reinforce my desire to repent during Lent? My desire to believe the Gospel?

Texas Catholic family featured on 'Extreme Makeover: Home Edition'

BY CINDY BREWER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VICTORIA, Texas — Seven-year-old twin sisters Tara and Sara Kubena, diagnosed with leukemia when they were 3, received a big surprise when they found out their family had been selected to receive a new home designed by the team of ABC's "Extreme Makeover: Home Edition."

The show's host, Ty Pennington, and others from the series announced the surprise to the family Jan. 17.

A week later John and Monica Kubena and their four children — Tara and Sara have two other siblings, Brady and Kelly — were presented with a 4,200-square-foot home on the same property of the two-bedroom trailer home where they had been living.

The home is equipped with special features to help the girls' medical conditions.

The episode featuring the Kubenas, who are members of Holy Cross Church in East Bernard, was scheduled to air Feb. 19.

"We went above and beyond," Ed Sanders, one of the home's designers, said. "We didn't need to do it, but we have (given them) access to all the technology, and with all the pain (Tara's) been in, you're darn right we're going to go all out."

The Kubenas have been inundated with medical bills over the past few years. After the girls were diagnosed with their disease, they underwent chemotherapy treatments and their cancer went into remission.

Last year, Tara's leukemia returned and she had to undergo a bone marrow transplant at Texas Children's Cancer Center in Houston.

And her home's conditions were not up to the standards for a girl whose immune system was nearly destroyed.

That's where "Extreme Makeover: Home Edition" came in. On Tara's 102nd day after her transplant, the show's producers made the announcement that the Kubena family had been selected for a home makeover.

In January 2005, Tara's aunt sent a letter to the show telling the Kubena family's story and explaining why they need a home makeover. The show receives nearly 15,000 requests per week.

The Kubena family was chosen from the thousands of others who sent in letters and tapes because "they're such a worthy family," according to the show's staff members.

The new home could mean the difference between life and death for a cancer patient whose immune system is working at only about 10 percent capacity, said Tara's oncologist, Dr. ZoAnn Dreyer, who said it is so important to remove the viruses from the air in Tara's home.

"It is best when (recovering patients are) around filtered systems," she said.

More than 1,000 volunteers from Houston, East Bernard and surrounding towns worked to complete the new house in 106 hours; a house this size would normally take six months to build.

A team installed an air purifying system into the home and more than 100 vendors donated labor and supplies.

When the home was unveiled to the Kubena family, a crowd of nearly 2,500 people, more than the population of East Bernard, were on hand to welcome them. High above the new house flew a plane pulling a banner that read "Welcome Home Tara."

Local schools let out early so students could attend the home's unveiling. A special place was reserved for the second-grade classmates of the twins, as some in the crowd had waited overnight for a good spot.

The television program also donated a new Ford hybrid SUV and a vacation for the family to use once Tara is healthy enough. And, to top it off, an anonymous donor donated the cost of the house's taxes and insurance for 10 years.

Church cautious about plan to examine remains we have are some fragments of cloth and human rib," said Bertrand Vincent, spokesman for France's Tours Archdiocese.

"Even if these are confirmed as belonging to a young woman of the period, who was burned to death, this won't prove it's Joan of Arc. For now, the church is showing maximum prudence and reserve," said Vincent.

Philippe Charlier, professor at Raymond Poincare Hospital, west of Paris, announced that he would analyze the fragments allegedly retrieved from below the stake in Rouen, France, where St. Joan was executed in 1431 at age 19.

In a telephone interview with Catholic News Service Feb. 17, Vincent praised Charlier's "professional expertise and good intentions" and said that Tours would "take note" if the project were "conducted seriously, with proper results."

"However, unless something extraordinary is achieved, and it's proved beyond all reasonable doubt that these are Joan of Arc's remains, the church will not consider them the relics of a saint," the spokesman added.

Vincent said that Father Jean-Louis Gaudier of Chinon had consented to Charlier's examination of the bone and cloth, which have been housed in a Chinon church museum since 1938.

However, he added that the remains, which were located at a Paris pharmacy in the 19th century, were not regarded as "church objects."

St. Joan, a peasant girl from Domremy in eastern France, was burned as a witch and heretic in May 1431 after leading a French army against English invaders and lifting the siege of Orleans.

The national heroine, who was canonized in 1920, reputedly heard the voices of saints as a young girl and was widely credited with altering the course of the 1337-1453 Hundred Years' War and strengthening French nationhood.

Speaking at a Feb. 13 Paris press conference, Charlier said he hoped to verify with DNA and carbon-14 tests that the remains were genuinely those of a 19-year-old female, as well as pinpointing the precise year and month of death.

"In ideal circumstances, our scientific studies will match historical accounts by showing the body was burned three times on the same day," the forensic expert said.

"We would then have a bundle of arguments, so detailed and close to the record, that we would be able to say with almost complete certainty that they are indeed the remains of Joan of Arc," said Charlier.

The professor said his team also hoped to prove a piece of animal bone found with the remains belonged to a cat, thus bearing out historical accounts that cats often were thrown on the stake with alleged sorcerers.

He added that his findings would be presented to a conference in Bourges, France, later this year.

Last year, Charlier's team studied the remains of Agnes Sorel, mistress of King Charles VII, the 15th-century French king who fought alongside Joan of Arc. Charlier said test results confirmed the historical record that Sorel died of mercury poisoning.

Teacher helps get Bible recorded onto CD

KERNERSVILLE — Last fall, when a student of Roni Barrow asked if he could listen to the New American Bible on CD, she replied: "Sure, I'll order it and we should receive it in less than a week."

So Barrow, the Learning Support director at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville, contacted RFB&D, a company that provides audio recordings of textbooks and reference and professional materials for people with "print disabilities" — those unable to read due to a disability.

But she was unable to order the CD — it had yet to be recorded.

So Barrow asked a company representative if the Bible could be recorded onto a CD and sent to the school's Learning Support department, which provides books on CDs for Learning Support students.

RFB&D (Recording for the Blind and Dyslexic), agreed to the project, but asked Barrow to be patient.

"This is the Bible, so it may take a while," said Melinda Hayes of RFB&D.

To assist RFB&D, Barrow sent the company two copies of the New American Bible to use for the recording. The company began recording the text in February 2005.

By December 2005, the recording was complete. And now, in addition to Bishop McGuinness, Catholic high

Farewell to February

Month noteworthy for appreciating culture, love

For a short month, a lot happens in February. On the frivolous side there is the Super Bowl (quick, who won in 2001?) and Groundhog Day (tell me again, what does it mean if the groundhog sees its shadow?).

But the second month on the calendar also gives us a lot to ponder — love and the treatment of our fellow man are the thinking person's themes for this chilly time of year, as February gives us the grandeur of Black History Month and the whimsy of St. Valentine's Day.

From Black History Month, we get an appreciation of the culture and contributions of our black brothers and sisters. St. Valentine's, pumped up by the steroids of media attention, has morphed the patron saint of lovers into an obligation to buy cards, chocolates, flowers, perfume and stuffed animals.

For Catholics in North Carolina there is a curious intersection of Black History Month and the love exemplified by St. Valentine. In a 1948 diocesan book, "First Synod of the Diocese of Raleigh," the Catholic Church supported the sanctions imposed by the state against interracial marriage: "Marriages between a white person and negro, or Indian, or between a white person and person of negro or Indian descent to the third generation ... are void."

To understand this sanction, it is important to know that priests play a dual role at wedding ceremonies. On behalf of the Catholic Church, the priest is a witness to the sacrament of matrimony that the husband and wife confer on one another. It is the exchange of the wedding vows that binds a man and woman.

The union is witnessed and then blessed by the priest. At the same time, the priest performs the civil union of marriage that is recognized by the state.

The language of the synod book on interracial marriage reads like a piece of legislation, which is to say it is nearly incomprehensible. It likely was taken verbatim from state law. So, perhaps it is understandable that the synod book merely followed what the law required.

But Richard and Debi Hill don't see it that way. The Hills, an interracial couple, are members of St. Matthew Church in Charlotte.

"We have always experienced love and acceptance in the Catholic Church," said Debi. "It blows me away that the Catholic Church once condoned segregation."

How many interracial couples had broken hearts on Valentine's Day because church and state forbade their union in matrimony? How many children weren't born out of those loving relationships?

February, it turns out, contains lovers' histories that never were.

The Hill family includes the couple's two children and three children from Richard's previous marriage. What if they wanted to marry in 1948 instead of 1978?

"My life would be totally different," said Debi, "I had a poor self image before my marriage to Richard. With my marriage and my faith I am a mother, I own a business and I volunteer regularly at church. We really feel that God brought us together."

And what God has joined let no man tear asunder.

The days banning interracial marriage are gone, but thankfully, not forgotten. Black History Month is also a potent reminder of injustice.

I enjoy Black History Month so much that I wouldn't mind seeing a Hispanic History Month, an Asian History Month and yes, even a White History Month. Each of our respective cultures has made a contribution to the rich soup that is America — just the right recipe for a cold winter's day.

A look at Lent

A general introduction to the season

Lent is the season the Catholic Church gives us to take stock and review our lives, to root out all that is not good and true and replace it with the faithful and the holy. In these 40 days, the Catholic Church turns to the ancient penitential practices of fasting, almsgiving and prayer. These practices remain as rich and life-giving in the year 2006 as they were when practiced by the early Christians and by our Jewish forbearers.

Fasting reminds us of our hunger for God, which no worldly thing can satisfy. Almsgiving reminds us that love of God and love of neighbor are inextricably intertwined, and that we bear responsibility for each other. Prayer reminds us to center our lives on God who alone gives meaning to all we do.

Lent is a most special time. The liturgies and devotions of Lent call us to a kind of spiritual "spring cleaning," identifying relationships that are disordered and sins that imprison and then seeking forgiveness and healing. We root out the darkness of sin so as to enter the Easter mysteries with a clean heart bathed in the healing, life-giving light of Christ.

Guidelines for Lent

1) The time of Lent is to be observed by Catholics as a special season of prayer, penance and works of charity.

2) Ash Wednesday, March 1, and Good Friday, April 14, in particular, are the most important penitential days of the liturgical year. They are days of both fast and abstinence. All Fridays in Lent are days of abstinence.

3) The rule of fasting states that only one full meal a day can be taken. Two small meals, "sufficient to maintain strength," are allowed, but together they should not equal another full meal. Eating between meals breaks the fast, but drinking liquids does not. The rule of fasting binds all Catholics from age 18 to 59.

4) Abstinence refers to the eating of meat. Under the present law, it does not include egg or milk products, meat stock soups or gravies. The rule of abstinence binds all Catholics 14 years old and older.

5) The substantial observance of the laws of fast and abstinence is a serious obligation. Those whose work or health would be impaired are excused from fasting and abstaining. The individual conscience can decide if there is a proper cause to excuse. A more serious reason should be present to excuse from Ash Wednesday and Good Friday penance.

6) Self-imposed fasting on the other weekdays of Lent is recommended. Abstinence on all Fridays of the year is also highly recommended. The Peace Pastoral of the American Bishops, stating that prayer is incomplete without penance, urges Friday abstinences as something all American Catholics should offer up for the sake of world peace.

7) Parents and teachers should see to it that even those who are not bound by the laws of fasting and abstinence because of age are brought up in an atmosphere that is conducive to a sense of penance.

8) The faithful should be clearly and positively encouraged to receive the sacrament of reconciliation during Lent. There should be adequate time scheduled for confessions before Easter. Group reconciliation services should not be scheduled for the last days of the Holy Week. At no time is it permitted to schedule a group reconciliation service for the purpose of giving general absolution without individual confessions.

9) The liturgical directions of the Sacramentary and the Lectionary must be faithfully observed regarding all the special Holy Week rites.

10) Funeral Masses are not allowed on Holy Thursday, Good Friday or Holy Saturday. The funeral rite outside of Mass can be held either in church or at the chapel on those days, with a funeral Mass later.

11) The RCIA is incorporated into the liturgy during Lent. The Rite of Election is celebrated on the first Sunday of Lent. On the third, fourth and fifth Sundays of Lent, the Scrutinies take place during Mass.

CSS program assists grandparents raising kids

Imagine that a woman walks into her kitchen to prepare dinner. She glances at the stack of bills on the counter and wonders how they will all get paid this month. Reaching for a skillet, she grimaces — her back has been aching all day.

Suddenly a 3-year-old bundle of energy runs into the room, toy motorcycle revving at top volume. Little arms demand to be picked up. Despite her aches and pains, the woman holds the child, kisses him, and remembers that she is the only living being that this child can depend on for love and care.

This woman is 70 years old.

There are currently 5,174 grandparents who are raising their grandchildren in Charlotte. The challenges are daunting. While most grandmas and grandpas get to spoil and dote over their grandkids and then say "bye-bye" at the end of the day, there are people who are spending their "golden years" parenting one or more of their grandchildren, or even great-grandchildren.

Their own child is incapable of doing this job due to death, incarceration, addictions or mental illness. Now these grandparents are dealing with tantrums and diapers, immunization schedules and car seats.

They are the primary source of love and comfort for their grandchildren. Parenting "tools" that they used more than 20 years ago are dusted off and applied in this era of cell phones and

The good news is that tremendous hope and help are available through New Horizons for Families and Children. With a grant funded by Smart Start of Mecklenburg County, Catholic Social Services has developed a program to help grandparents access every support available to allow them to raise healthy and happy children.

New Horizons serves the unique needs of these families by providing:

- information and referrals;
- assistance in obtaining benefits, including Medicaid;
- assistance with daycare needs for those who qualify;
- parenting education and parental coaching;
- family, marital and individual counseling;
- ongoing support groups;
- case management; and
- advocacy.

Through New Horizons, grandparents are given help in integrating new parenting skills in the areas of discipline, setting healthy boundaries, developing positive daily routines and improving communication techniques.

They are given a place to talk about their experiences and concerns and to form strong bonds with case managers, counselors and each other. Together, New Horizons and grandparents are forming a community of hope in which children can grow up healthy and happy.

Imagine that a 70-year-old woman wakes up to a pair of big brown eyes watching her.

"Grandma," she hears, "can I have oatmeal for breakfast?"

She turns her head toward the bedroom window and sees a bright sunrise on the horizon. She smiles. It's going to be a good day.

Pope asks for prayers for his ministry on feast of Chair of St. Peter

The Pope Speaks

POPE

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — With hundreds of candles lighting a sculpture of the Chair of St. Peter behind him, Pope Benedict XVI encouraged Catholics to grow in their faith and asked for prayers for his ministry as the successor of St. Peter.

Celebrating the Feb. 22 feast of the Chair of Peter, Apostle, Pope Benedict held part of his weekly general audience in St. Peter's Basilica, where Gian Lorenzo Bernini's statue is located, and part in the Vatican audience hall, where he announced he would create 15 new cardinals.

In greeting Italian students in the basilica and in his talks in 10 languages in the audience hall, the pope offered a reflection on the ministry of St. Peter as Jesus' choice as leader of the Apostles.

He encouraged the estimated 8,000 people in the audience hall to spend some time in St. Peter's Basilica, looking at the Bernini statue specially lighted for the feast day "and to pray in a particular way for the ministry which God has entrusted to me."

"Raising your gaze to the alabaster window just above the chair, invoke the Holy Spirit so that with his light and his strength he would always sustain my daily service to the entire church," the pope said.

Pope Benedict explained that the feast day celebrates the ministry of St. Peter as bishop of Rome, a ministry symbolized by his chair, the symbol of his responsibility for teaching the faith and of his authority.

"Providence led Peter to Rome, where he ended his service to the Gospel with martyrdom," the pope said.

"For this reason, the see of Rome, which received great honor, also received the responsibility Christ entrusted to Peter to serve all of the particular churches for the edification and unity of the entire people of God," he said.

As successor of St. Peter, he said, the pope is called not only to serve the church in Rome, but to guide the universal church.

"Celebrating the chair of Peter means, then, attributing to it a strong spiritual significance and recognizing it as a privileged sign of the love of God, the good and eternal pastor, who wants to gather the entire church and guide it on the path of salvation," the pope said.

Shaking hands in the middle of Mass

Q. Who started this new ritual of shaking hands in the middle of Mass?

I've had my arthritic fingers crushed. I've had parishioners blow their nose and then offer their hand to me. I often sit in front to see and hear the Mass, but I'm tempted to isolate myself in back. I think this entire scenario is unnecessary and superfluous. (Illinois)

A. Let's start with your first question. The rite of the sign of peace is not new. It is among the oldest rituals connected with the Sacrifice of the Mass. At least five times the New Testament speaks of Christians greeting each other with a "holy kiss" or a "kiss of love."

We know that at least by around the year 150, this "kiss" was already a regular part of the eucharistic liturgy, as an expression of unity and peace among Christians.

For centuries, the Pax (peace) as it was called was exchanged by everyone at Mass. Beginning in the late Middle Ages the practice was observed only by attending clergy, and other signs, such as an embrace, usually substituted for an actual kiss.

This continued until our present time when the kiss, or sign, of peace is again prescribed in some manner for all the faithful. Instructions for Mass prescribe that before the breaking of the bread each person offers a sign of peace to those nearby.

The church in this way asks for peace and unity for herself and for the whole human family, and the faithful offer a sign of their communion with the church and of their love for each other before receiving Communion together (General Instruction of the Roman Missal 82).

Despite of your misgivings, therefore, the sign of peace has deep roots as a fitting expression of the Catholic Christian meaning of the Mass and holy Communion, the sacrament we still refer to as "the sign of unity and the bond of love."

A touch such as a handshake, an embrace or a kiss may not be the perfect possible sign of peace. But it can still carry a message we need to understand if we are to celebrate the Eucharist together as Christ intended it to be celebrated.

Many Catholics share your arthritis problem. But don't isolate yourself. Your difficulty can be handled in a charitable manner.

Just look at the persons next to you, smile, and say "Peace be with you." No one will be offended, and you will be sharing a moment of the Mass that can be most prayerful and precious.

Supreme decisions

Court to consider constitutionality of partial-birth abortion ban

BY JERRY FILTEAU
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The U.S. Supreme Court said Feb. 21 that it will consider the constitutionality of the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act.

The court agreed to hear a Bush administration appeal of a U.S. appeals court ruling that the 2003 law is unconstitutional because it does not include an exception for the health of a pregnant woman.

Deirdre A. McQuade, spokeswoman for the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities, welcomed the court's decision to take up the case.

"Partial-birth abortion is not necessary for women's physical or emotional health," she said. "Extensive testimony reveals that there is no maternal health reason why such a gruesome and inhumane procedure must be performed."

The appeal is the first abortion case the high court has agreed to hear since Justice Samuel Alito Jr. replaced Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who retired. O'Connor was often a swing vote on abortion cases and many observers regard Alito as more likely than her to favor legal restrictions on abortion.

Three federal appeals courts have found the 2003 law unconstitutional. The first such ruling came last July from the St. Louis-based 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which said that "a health exception is constitutionally required" in any law restricting abortion.

In separate rulings Jan. 31 two other appellate courts, the 9th Circuit in San Francisco and the 2nd Circuit in New York, also found the law's lack of a health exception unconstitutional.

The 9th Circuit added that the law imposes "an undue burden" on women's access to abortion and called the language of the law too vague for consistent enforcement.

In 2000 the Supreme Court ruled 5-4 that a state law in Nebraska banning partial-birth abortion was unconstitutional because it did not include a health exception.

O'Connor was part of the court majority in that ruling, which not only nullified the Nebraska statute but also made similar laws in a number of other states unenforceable.

The Supreme Court is to hear arguments on the federal law during its next term, which begins in October.

'Cruel and dangerous practice'

Douglas Johnson, legislative director for the National Right to Life Committee, said, "Unless the Supreme Court now reverses the extreme position that five justices took in 2000, partly born premature infants will continue to die by having their skulls punctured by seven-inch scissors."

In the abortion procedure banned by the federal law, after the body of the live human fetus is delivered through the mother's birth canal, the doctor pierces its skull and suctions out the brain, causing death and collapsing the head so that it may be drawn through the birth canal more easily.

When President George W. Bush signed the Partial-Birth Ban Act in November 2003, he called the procedure "a terrible form of violence ... directed against children who are inches from birth."

Abortion opponents have opposed a health exception in partial-birth abortion laws because the Supreme Court's 1973 companion abortion decision Doe v. Bolton, issued in conjunction with Roe v. Wade, defined the health rationale for an abortion to include any factor that related to a woman's well-being — a definition so broad as to cover virtually any perceived benefit to the woman.

When the appellate court in St. Louis ruled last July that the absence of a health clause made the federal law unconstitutional, Gail Quinn, executive director of the bishops' pro-life secretariat, urged that the Supreme Court overturn that decision.

"It makes no sense to say one must kill a child who is more than half born to advance the mother's health instead of simply completing a live delivery," she said.

"There is no place in a civilized society for this cruel and dangerous practice," she said.

After the high court agreed to take up the case, McQuade commented, "Abortion advocates once said the (partial-birth abortion) procedure was rare and used only on women whose lives were in danger or whose unborn children were dying or severely disabled.

"But Ron Fitzsimmons, then executive director of the National Coalition of Abortion Providers, admitted in 1997 that partial-birth abortions are 'primarily done on healthy women and healthy fetuses,'" she said in her Feb. 21 statement.

"The Alan Guttmacher Institute estimates that 2,200 abortions were performed in 2000 using this grotesque method," she said.

POPE SAYS GOD LOVES HUMANS IN ALL STAGES OF LIFE, EMBRYO TO OLD AGE

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI said God's love for humans does not differentiate between the stages of embryo, adult or old age.

That is one reason why the church proclaims the sacred and inviolable character of all human life, even in the form of a pre-implanted embryo, the pope told participants at a Vatican conference Feb. 27.

The conference, sponsored by the Pontifical Academy for Life, was examining the theme "The Human

interior repentance,

GASTONIA — Lent is a "beautiful, sacred season" during which we should expect a "very profound encounter with God," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis.

Bishop Jugis distributed ashes during the Ash Wednesday Mass at St. Michael Church in Gastonia March 1.

Ash Wednesday marks the start of Lent, the period that runs through Holy Thursday and is considered a period of penance.

"The Lord is summoning us to a change of heart. It is a journey of the heart of a child of God into the heart of God, where we will find mercy, forgiveness and love," he said.

Receiving ashes is an external sign of interior repentance, said Bishop Jugis.

"It is an interior conversion — a change of heart, renewing our life, and that is something marvelous," he said.

A TASTE OF MOTHERHOOD

'Baby Think It Over' program teaches girls motherhood is no easy task CHICAGO (CNS) — For Sandra Avorywoskie, it was the way her baby would cry every time she rolled over and tried to go back to sleep.

That was when her school project — caring for a computerized baby doll for the weekend — suddenly seemed like a lot more than she had signed up for.

"I thought it was going to be easy," said Avorywoskie, a senior at Notre Dame High School for Girls in Chicago. "I knew it would be challenging, but it was more work than I thought."

Avorywoskie took the doll home as part of Marcia Berke's family development class, an elective offered to juniors and seniors.

Each student takes a baby home one weekend, and the doll records how well they handle the task. Did they let it cry too long without responding? Let it go too long between feedings or diaper changes? Handle it roughly?

All of that comes out on the report Berke generates when the dolls are returned.

Each student gets an electronic tag on a wristband that cannot be removed without being cut. The baby only responds when the person wearing the tag cares for it.

This is all part of a program called "Baby Think It Over," which uses dolls made by a Wisconsin company. The baby program is intended to teach students parenting skills while showing them just how much taking care of an infant would affect their everyday lives.

Most of the Notre Dame students who take the class can't wait to take a baby home on Friday, said Berke. By the time they return Monday, most can't wait to turn the dolls in.

Except for the ones who don't show up at school on Monday.

"They're too tired," said Berke. "But when they come back, I remind them that when you really have a baby and a job, you can't take every Monday off."

The babies are meant to look real, and each gets sent home with a diaper bag full of supplies — including diapers and bottles that set off the doll's electronic sensors — and an infant car seat.

Since the girls must keep the babies with them all weekend, they also get a taste of how people regard teenage mothers.

Some people were nice, others were not, said Avorywoskie. Junior Jazleen Rosado and senior Marilin Torres both got some dirty looks, and even unsolicited advice.

The babies follow their own schedules — they are programmed after real infants and can be fussy, medium or easygoing.

Even easygoing babies are difficult to care for, said Rosado, who acknowledged the project made her want to postpone parenthood.

"I thought about it more thoroughly. It stops you from so many things," she said.

Theft of figurine, cemetery vandalism bring hate crime charges

NEW BRUNSWICK, N.J. (CNS) — Three New Jersey teenagers face hate crime charges in connection with the theft of a baby Jesus figurine from St. Stanislaus Kostka Church in the Metuchen Diocese and damage to the parish's cemetery.

A Middlesex County grand jury returned an indictment charging Christopher Olson, 18; Nicholas Hess, also 18; and Michael Payne, 19, with bias intimidation and conspiracy to commit bias intimidation, prosecutor Bruce J. Kaplan announced Feb. 16.

The suspects also were charged with criminal mischief and two counts of theft and conspiracy to commit criminal mischief. Olson also was charged with receiving stolen property.

Hess and Payne face a total of 40 years in prison and $370,000 in fines if convicted on all charges. Olson faces 45 years in prison and $385,000 in fines.

Two 15-year-olds from Old Bridge,

N.J., also faced charges of bias intimidation, theft, criminal mischief, harassment, desecration of venerated objects and tampering with a witness. Their names were not made public because they are minors.

According to the indictment, Olson, Hess and Payne committed or conspired with each other to commit third-degree criminal mischief against the property of St. Stanislaus Kostka Church in Sayreville with "a purpose to intimidate an individual or group of individuals because of religion, or under circumstances that caused any victim of the criminal mischief to be intimidated."

Ralph Cretella, assistant prosecutor, said Feb. 21 that evidence presented to the grand jury showed a "specific group was targeted and the grand jury accepted it."

None of the defendants has had a court arraignment, when a plea of guilty or not guilty to the charges is made, Cretella said. Their trials were not expected to begin for several weeks.

Pope says Lenten practices like fasting express faith, not burden

Time of Lent should be faced with 'new spirit,' says Pope Benedict XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Lenten practices like fasting should be experienced as an expression of faith, not as a difficult burden, Pope Benedict XVI said.

The pope made his remarks at the Vatican Feb. 26, three days before he was to open the Lenten season with an Ash Wednesday liturgy in Rome.

"During this period, one abstains from singing 'Alleluia,' and people are invited to practice appropriate forms of penitential sacrifice," he said.

"The time of Lent should not be faced with an old spirit, as if it were a heavy and bothersome burden, but with the new spirit of one who has found in Jesus and in his mystery the meaning of life and understands that everything now refers to him," he said.

The pope was preparing for his own Lenten retreat March 5-11. During that time, papal appointments are canceled and the pontiff joins Roman Curia officials twice a day to pray and listen to Lenten sermons.

Preaching the pope's retreat this year will be Cardinal Marco Ce, a theologian and biblicist and the retired patriarch of Venice, Italy. Cardinal Ce has used his free time in recent years to conduct many spiritual retreats for bishops, priests, religious orders and lay groups.

The theme of this year's papal retreat is "Walking With Jesus Toward Easter, Guided by the Evangelist Mark."

Pope says Bible helps youths through dark times, deceit, false ideas

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Bible should be the constant companion of young people so that it can help them navigate through life's dark moments and past the deceit and erroneous ideas present in today's world, Pope Benedict XVI said in his message for World Youth Day.

Reading, studying and meditating on the word of God would help young people get to know Jesus and help them live "a life of consistent fidelity to Christ and his teachings," the pope said.

"I urge you to become familiar with the Bible and to have it at hand so that it can be your compass pointing out the road to follow," the pope said Feb. 27.

The theme of the XXI World Youth Day message is "Your Word Is a Lamp to My Feet and a Light to My Path," a passage chosen by Pope Benedict from the psalms. Celebrations this year will be held April 9, Palm Sunday, on the diocesan level.

The pope urged young people to love and be faithful to the word of God and the church.

Just as a jewelry box keeps a precious gem safe for successive generations, the church has been the depository safeguarding Jesus' word of salvation, he said.

"Without the church, this pearl runs the risk of being lost or destroyed," the pope said.

He urged young people to "love the word of God and love the church, and this will give you access to a treasure of very great value and will teach you how to appreciate its richness."

The church's mission is to show people the way to true happiness in a world "where people are often held captive by the current ways of thinking," he said.

While some people may think they are free by being rid of God and his laws, "they are being led astray and become lost amid the errors or illusions of aberrant ideologies," he said.

"The darkness in which humankind is groping needs to be illuminated," he said, and "the lamp that dispels the darkness of fear and lights up the path even when times are most difficult" is God's loving presence through his word.

Supreme Court again finds for clinic protest rights

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The Supreme Court's 8-0 decision rejecting attempts to use racketeering laws against abortion clinic protesters was hailed by one of the successful petitioners as a victory for free speech.

It was the third time the high court had ruled in the case, which dates back to 1986 when the National Organization for Women attempted to use racketeering laws in class-action lawsuits against abortion clinic protesters.

The Feb. 28 ruling reversed the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals' interpretation of the Supreme Court's 2003 ruling in the case.

The lower court had found that the Supreme Court's decision for Joseph Scheidler and Operation Rescue neglected to deal with four out of 121 instances in which a jury had found abortion protesters violated laws that prohibit acts or threats of violence to person or property.

Scheidler, head of the Pro-Life Action League, said the "court was right when they ruled in 2003, but the National Organization for Women refused to acknowledge defeat."

In the latest decision, Justice Stephen Breyer wrote that to violate the Hobbs Act — a 55-year-old law prohibiting extortion — physical violence or threats of violence must be related to extortion.

In the 2003 ruling, the Supreme Court had found that the protests did not constitute extortion under the Hobbs Act because they did not involve attempts to obtain property. The court also said there was no basis for claims under the 1970 Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act.

Scheidler said, "The Supreme Court seems to take the First Amendment more seriously than the (circuit courts) do."

Raising awareness

Speaker, recent accident shed light on dangers of drinking and driving

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Some people think it isn't possible for one decision to change countless lives forever. Brandon Silveria, unfortunately, knows better.

Silveria told the juniors and seniors of Charlotte Catholic High School Feb. 27 how two beers and one bad decision destroyed his hopes and plans for his future.

In 1987, Silveria was a popular, athletic junior at Los Gatos High School in Los Gatos, Calif. Just a few weeks before his junior prom, Silveria drank two beers at a party and decided to drive home.

During the four-mile drive, Silveria fell asleep at the wheel, crashing into a tree. He was driving 45 mph in a 50-mph zone.

Silveria spent the next two-and-a-half months in a coma. When he awoke, he was unable to walk, talk or eat. What followed were three years of intensive therapy, relearning the most basic functions.

Silveria suffers from brain damage, affecting his memory and his abilities to speak clearly and walk. He has suffered seizures that nearly killed him.

In the nine years since his accident, Silveria has dedicated his life to making sure young people learn from his mistakes instead of repeating them.

He and his father, Tony Silveria, travel throughout the United States talking to teenagers about the dangers of alcohol. Their work is sponsored by the Century Council, a group that fights drunken driving and underage drinking and is funded by leading U.S. distillers.

In slow, distorted speech, Silveria encouraged the students to make responsible decisions about alcohol, including resisting peer pressure to drink.

"You can disagree with each other and still be friends," said Brandon Silveria. "The test of your friendship is when you know your friend has made the wrong choice and you take responsibility for him."

His address was followed by a 1992 segment of the television show "Rescue 911." The video re-creates Silveria's accident, detailing his recovery as he relearned how to use his hands and walk.

"When I go to college, this will remind me to be responsible for everything I do," said Mario Acitelli, a senior who will be playing football at Appalachian State University in the fall.

Tony Silveria, Silveria's father, also spoke to the students, sharing a parent's viewpoint, as well as facts about alcohol-related fatalities and injuries.

"Seven out of 10 families come apart at a time like this," he said. "Imagine going to a party Saturday night, having a couple of beers ... and never seeing your family again."

Tony Silveria said his son's medical expenses have exceeded $3 million. His anti-seizure medication, which he will take for the rest of his life, costs $394 a month.

"We have paid the price for you — you don't have to pay this price," said Tony Silveria. "You still have an opportunity to make decisions that keep you away from this."

"I know now that one bad decision can take away everything I want — friends, a boyfriend, college," said Addie Shapack, a senior at Charlotte Catholic.

The Silverias' message wasn't just for the students. Tony Silveria said he wants parents to take responsibility for their kids.

"If I had the chance to go back and do something different, I would make sure Brandon knew he could always call (home for a ride), no matter what the circumstances."

Unfortunately, Silveria's story isn't unique. In 2005, there were 553 alcohol-related traffic fatalities in North Carolina, and 75 of those drivers were underage.

Less than two weeks ago, 18-year-old Brock Franklin drove the wrong way down Charlotte's I-485 and collided with another car, killing its driver and passenger.

State troopers found empty beer cans in Franklin's car. A "MySpace" Web page under the name Brock Franklin shows the teen against a backdrop of whiskey bottles. The site also says he enjoys "getting drunk and getting high."

"(Teenagers) are going to drink — I wish we could stand up here and tell them not to drink, and they would listen," said Tony Silveria. "But reality says they're going to, so let's prevent a result like Brandon's."

"The bummer of all this is that I created this mess for myself, because of making stupid choices," Brandon Silveria said. "First, the choice of thinking I was cool enough to drive. After all, I was invincible — nothing was going to happen to me."

Bishop Jugis makes unique pastoral appointment

BISHOP TO SERVE AS INTERIM PASTOR OF ST. MICHAEL CHURCH

BY DAVID HAINS
SPECIAL TO
THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

GASTONIA — It isn't often that parishioners of any one church can claim the bishop as their pastor, but that is exactly what members of St. Michael the Archangel Church in Gastonia will be doing for the next few months.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis will serve as interim pastor of the 735-family parish.

The unusual move became necessary when Father James Solari retired for health reasons in February. Father Solari came out of retirement to serve as interim administrator of St. Michael Church in June 2005.

The appointment of a bishop to a pastoral assignment is atypical. Bishops are responsible for a long list of administrative duties that are combined with sacramental calls at the parishes and missions of the diocese.

The Diocese of Charlotte has 92 churches.

"We don't always have extra priests that we can call upon when a situation like this arises," said Msgr. Maurico W. West, vicar general and chancellor of the Diocese of Charlotte.

For Bishop Jugis, the assignment is a return to familiar routines. He served as a parochial vicar, administrator or pastor of 10 churches in the diocese in the 19 years prior to his ordination as bishop in October 2003.

"I am looking forward to spending time with the families of St. Michael Church," said the bishop between Masses on Ash Wednesday.

"My schedule won't permit me to be present here as much as another pastor might be, but I will be celebrating the sacraments here as often as I can," he said.

Father Christopher Gober, director of vocations for the Diocese of Charlotte, said there are 16 men currently in formation for the priesthood in six seminaries.

"I am excited that Bishop Jugis is taking the opportunity to shed light on the importance of priestly vocations in our rapidly growing diocese," said Father Gober. "Personally, as a brother priest, I am inspired by his pastoral zeal."

Although the bishop's decision to serve as pastor of the church has no definitive end date, the appointment is expected to last for several months.

Youths experience hunger to help world's poor

BY DEACON GERALD POTKAY
CORRESPONDENT

HIGH POINT — Going hungry can be a good thing.

Youth groups from seven churches, including 89 youths from Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point and 41 youths from St. Paul the Apostle Church in Greensboro, participated in World Vision's 30 Hour Famine at Christ United Methodist Church in High Point Feb. 25-26.

The 30 Hour Famine is an international youth movement to fight hunger around the world. Last year's project raised $11.6 million for World Vision, a Christian relief and development organization, and utilized in areas such as Africa, Asia, Central and South America and the United States.

According to World Vision's Web site, groups raise money through donors and sponsors to help millions of starving and hurting children in some of the world's poorest countries.

Youths from Immaculate Heart of Mary Church have participated in the famine for the past 10 years, contributing $20,000 during the last seven years.

St. Paul the Apostle Church's youths joined the successful project last year, which raised more than $13,000, making it the top North Carolina fundraising group.

"This worldwide event not only brings in money to feed the poor, but it helps our youth experience what it is to be hungry so they might have more compassion for those who are living in extreme poverty," said Terry Aiken, youth minister at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church.

At the same time, they get the opportunity to "grow in their faith as they share time with their friends and meet new friends," said Aiken.

During the 30 hours, the youths learned about hunger and homelessness throughout the world. They also worked in groups to perform community service projects, such as helping at the Evergreen Nursing Home and making 128 bag lunches for a soup kitchen in High Point.

"This is my first time (in the project). It has been a good experience while enabling me to get another view of life and to understand what is going on in other places," said Joe Risi of Immaculate Heart of Mary Church.

Samantha Bonham from St. Paul the Apostle Church returned for her second famine.

"I came back this year because I had so much fun last year. We meet a lot of new people. Most importantly, I learned that I can do without," she said.

The famine ended with a potluck supper for the participants, their parents and friends, and the youth group leaders and helpers from churches involved with the weekend event.

"The fasting helps me to realize what it means to be hungry. Joining in with the different denominations helps to make this an incredible experience," said Risi. "It's been hard, but it is well worth it."

Pope says God loves humans in all stages of life, even embryos

Embryo Before Implantation: Scientific Update and Bioethical Considerations."

The pope said the topic was fascinating but very difficult, one that science alone cannot fully fathom.

From the church's point of view, neither Scripture nor ancient Christian tradition offers explicit treatments of the subject of embryos, he said, but the Bible does reflect an awareness of and respect for human life at its earliest stages.

He quoted God's words as recounted in the Book of Jeremiah: "Before I formed you in the womb I knew you. Before you were born I dedicated you."

The meaning of that passage becomes clear, the pope said, when one considers that "God intervenes directly in the creation of the soul of every new human being."

"The love of God does not distinguish between the newly conceived still in the womb of his mother, and the child, or the youth, or the man or elderly person," he said, adding that in each one is God's image.

The connection between man and his Creator gives the human being a unique dignity at every stage of his life and is the reason the church proclaims such life sacred, he said.

"This moral judgment is valid already at the beginning of the life of an embryo, even before it is implanted in the maternal womb, which protects and nurtures it for nine months until the moment of birth," he said.

The pope said that while scientific advances have shed great light on aspects of nascent life science alone could never decipher the mystery of human life.

"In fact, as soon as reason succeeds in overcoming one limit that was thought insuperable, other limits, until then unknown, challenge it. Man will always

"Before I formed you in the womb I knew you. Before you were born I dedicated you."

— Pope Benedict XVI, quoting God's words remain a profound and impenetrable enigma," he said.

At the beginning of the third millennium, he said, humanity has greatly increased knowledge on many fronts, but "it seems too difficult for human intelligence to recognize that, when looking on the created world, one encounters the imprint of the Creator."

To grasp the true significance of man and creation, people have to move beyond the limits of the scientific method and begin "the adventure of transcendence," he said.

"As we advance with scientific technology, we are humbled as we realize that it is the touch of our Creator who gives us life," said Maggi Nadol, Respect Life director in the Diocese of Charlotte.

The diocesan Respect Life program educates and raises awareness of life issues, such as abortion.

"It is the breath of God, visited upon each person, that calls us into being," said Nadol.

South Dakota Legislature bans nearly all abortions

If signed into law, bill would be most sweeping ban on abortion since 1973

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

PIERRE, S.D. — By adopting legislation that would prohibit all intentional abortions except those to save a mother's life, the South Dakota Legislature moved toward a direct challenge of the U.S. Supreme Court's 1973 Roe v. Wade decision.

If signed into law it would become the most sweeping ban on abortion adopted in any state since 1973.

The South Dakota House of Representatives passed the bill Feb. 24 by a vote of 50-18. The Senate had approved it Feb. 22, by a vote of 23-12, after slightly amending an earlier version adopted by the House.

The House vote Feb. 24 incorporated the Senate's amendment.

The amendment, an addition to the introductory legislative findings of the bill, said the Legislature finds that "the guarantee of due process of law under the constitution of South Dakota applies equally to born and unborn human beings" and that the mother and her unborn child "each possess a natural and inalienable right to life."

The bill, called the Women's Health and Human Life Protection Act, specifically exempts women from any criminal conviction or penalty for obtaining an abortion. But it says that anyone who performs an abortion except to save a mother's life commits a Class 5 felony, which is punishable by a fine up to $5,000 and up to five years in prison.

The legislation says the law does not apply to medical treatment "that results in the accidental or unintentional injury or death to the unborn child."

In 2004 Gov. Mike Rounds vetoed, on technical grounds, an anti-abortion bill that also contained an exception for the health of the mother. But he recently said at a news conference that he would "look favorably" on any bill that meets the concerns he raised about the 2004 legislation.

He said it was his understanding that the new legislation sought to address those concerns.

The new legislation strikes some current South Dakota abortion restrictions that would no longer be relevant in light of the broader ban, but it also provides that if implementation of the new statute is enjoined, suspended or delayed by a court order, or if the new law is found unconstitutional, the laws it replaces will automatically be reinstated.

Planned Parenthood, which runs the only abortion facility in South Dakota, said it would file suit to block the legislation if the governor signs it.

According to LifeNews.com, legislators in at least four other states — Georgia, Indiana, Ohio and Tennessee — have proposed legislation that would prohibit most or all abortions.

In the 1990s Utah, Louisiana and Guam, a U.S. territory, passed laws prohibiting most abortions. They were struck down in lower courts and the Supreme Court refused to review the cases, letting the lower-court rulings stand.

Young woman chooses life, adoption for child

A month later, Shaw took a pregnancy test, which came back positive.

"My parents took the news better than I did," she said. "My father said, 'Mary, this isn't the end, this is just the beginning. From now on, you make the decisions for your unborn child.'"

After telling her family about her pregnancy, Shaw went to visit Msgr. Anthony Marcaccio, her pastor at St. Pius X Church in Greensboro.

"My biggest concern was that I would bring shame and embarrassment to my family," said Shaw.

Shaw's father is Deacon Bill Shaw, permanent deacon at St. Pius X Church.

"Msgr. Marcaccio told me, 'We are a right-to-life parish. If we cannot walk where we talk, we shouldn't be talking at all,'" she said.

After her meeting with Msgr. Marcaccio, Shaw said she knew "everything was in God's hands."

A choice to make

The birthfather wanted Shaw to have an abortion, an option she didn't even consider. She has only spoken to the birthfather twice since the night their child was conceived.

Shaw also didn't consider raising the child herself.

"I knew that I could not provide the life that I desired for my child," she said. "I wanted my child to be raised in a home with a mother and a father who love him."

Shaw turned to Catholic Social Services (CSS) to help her make the best decision for her and her child.

"We strongly believe we are here to help each woman to make her own decision about her pregnancy, not tell her what to do," said Becky DuBois, adoption and pregnancy support counselor for the Piedmont-Triad CSS office in Winston-Salem.

"The mother has to decide what is best for her and for her baby," she said.

After meeting with DuBois, Shaw opted for an open adoption.

And open, or identified, adoption allows the birthparents to select the adoptive family. After the adoption, the birthparents and adoptive parents have as much interaction as they choose.

Shaw and the adoptive parents have a verbal contract that allows Shaw to see her child on his birthday, at Christmas and on special occasions, such as his baptism. She also communicates with her child's adoptive parents regularly.

"Some people thought I placed my child up for adoption so that I wouldn't have to take care of him," Shaw said. "Placing my child up for adoption was the hardest decision and action of my life."

COURTESY PHOTO

Mary Shaw holds her son on the day of his baptism. Shaw placed her child up for adoption through Catholic Social Services rather than having an abortion or raising him without a father. She chose an open adoption, which allows her to maintain contact with her son.

"Anyone who says 'You took the easy way out' has no idea how many days I cried my eyes out," she said.

A promising future

Shaw hopes that as her child grows up, they will have a relationship like that of a loving aunt and nephew. She also hopes he will want her to be a part of his life.

"I want my child to know that I love him, and that the reason I made this decision was because I loved him," said Shaw. "He will know he has an entire birthfamily who loves him with all their hearts and who thinks about him all the time."

Shaw said DuBois, and CSS, provided a lifeline throughout her pregnancy. In the final weeks of her pregnancy, Shaw's belly became too large for her to drive her car. So DuBois drove to Shaw's home for their weekly counseling sessions.

When Shaw's pregnancy became high-risk and she had to cut her work schedule to 20 hours a week, CSS helped pay her bills.

"I don't know what I would have done without Catholic Social Services," Shaw said. "Becky told me from the beginning that this was my choice, and if I decided not to put my child up for adoption ... that they would support me in any decision I made."

Shaw wanted her child's transition to his adoptive parents to be as easy as possible. She slept with a receiving blanket, so that her child could have something in his crib with her scent on it.

Shaw also had the adoptive family record themselves talking and going about their daily lives. She played that tape every night, with the tape player on her belly.

Immediately after the baby was born, the adoptive father stood next to his bassinet and said, "Hey there, little guy."

"(The baby) turned his head and looked at him," Shaw said. "There was a connection already. I knew that I had done the right thing for my child."

Father Duffy serves as the church's pastor, while Father Schratz serves as parochial vicar at both Our Lady of Consolation Church and St. Thomas Aquinas Church. Father Zampino is the pastor of St. Thomas Aquinas Church.

Also in attendance were former pastors of Our Lady of Consolation Church; diocesan representatives; city and county government officials; and members of the Capuchin Franciscan Friars Province of the Stigmata of St. Francis, who staff the parish.

"This has been a long journey," said Sporty Gerald, chairman of the building committee. Gerald said fundraising began in 2001 and ground was broken in August 2004.

"This is the fulfillment of a dream," said Father Duffy. "We have a place for our diverse community to learn about each other and to share their lives."

The $1.9 million Community Life Center consists of a multipurpose room that is also a full-size basketball court, five classrooms and a youth lounge. The facility will be used for community outreach programs including computer education, English as a Second Language classes, Boy and Girl Scouts, senior citizens' events, Bible study and a variety of educational and cultural enrichment activities.

"The love of Christ cannot stop at the church doors," said Bishop Jugis in his homily. "It must be carried with us out into the community."

Our Lady of Consolation Church is located in an area with a rapidly growing Hispanic population.

"We want to reach out and embrace all the members of our community," said Gerald.

The dedication of the Community Life Center is not the end of expansions at Our Lady of Consolation. With more than 600 families worshipping at Our Lady of Consolation Church each weekend, Father Duffy said the parish will soon begin plans for building a new church, replacing the existing 50-year-old structure.

Many enjoy Mardi Gras

Adults, children partake in 'Fat Tuesday' education, celebration at basilica

BY CAROLE MCGROTTY
CORRESPONDENT

ASHEVILLE — An early Mardi Gras celebration helped catechesis participants focus on the Christian roots of the event.

Adults and children meet separately for catechesis, formerly known as religious education, at the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville on the first Sunday of each month.

The two groups came together last month to study the religious aspects of Mardi Gras, or "Fat Tuesday," which traditionally provides an opportunity for festivity and merrymaking the day before Ash Wednesday and the penitential season of Lent.

Like many Catholic holidays and seasonal celebrations, Mardi Gras likely has its roots in pre-Christian traditions based on the seasons. As early as the middle of the second century, the Romans observed a fast of 40 days, which was preceded by a brief season of feasting, costumes and merrymaking.

In his Sunday homily, Father C. Morris Boyd, parochial vicar of the basilica, said the Catholic Church's rules on fasting during Lent used to be stricter; also, that people ate all the meats and sweets they had before Lent, hence the term "Fat Tuesday."

Mardi Gras came to the Americas in the late 17th century. Eventually the French in New Orleans celebrated Mardi Gras with masked balls and parties.

The official colors of Mardi Gras, with their roots in Catholicism, were chosen years later: purple, a symbol of justice; green, representing faith; and gold, to signify power.

The colors adorned the hall at the basilica for the catechesis celebration. Children decorated masks and wore beads. Both children and adults participated in a cakewalk and other games.

The event ended with the cutting of a king cake, whose round shape symbolizes unity of faith. A small, plastic baby (representing the baby Jesus) was baked in the cake; the person who finds it is said to have good luck for a year.

Second-graders at St. Matthew School in Charlotte celebrate Fat Tuesday with king cupcakes and Mardi Gras masks Feb. 28. Student Connor Geoghagan became "king" for the day when he found the baby doll in his cupcake.

Mardi Gras, or "Fat Tuesday," traditionally provides an opportunity for festivity and merrymaking the day before Ash Wednesday and the penitential season of Lent.

Mindful of miracles

Portuguese cardinal is 'objective fan' of soccer, sainthood causes

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Editor's note: This is the second of an occasional series based on interviews with heads of Vatican offices. The articles describe the work of the agencies and the main challenges they face and briefly profile the people who head them.

VATICAN CITY — The Portuguese cardinal who heads the Congregation for Saints' Causes has been given extra duties by Pope Benedict XVI.

The pope, having decided not to preside personally over most beatification ceremonies, usually delegates the responsibility to Cardinal Jose Saraiva Martins, the 74-year-old congregation prefect.

While no one expects Pope Benedict to match the super record-setting pace of canonizations and beatifications set by Pope John Paul II, Cardinal Saraiva Martins said the amount of work done by his office is not expected to slow any time soon.

"I foresee the rhythm continuing as it has been," he said. "With 2,200 causes open here, it is clear things will continue."

"Even if no other causes were submitted, we would have enough causes to study to keep us busy for years and years, but new causes always are arriving," the cardinal said.

During his first 10 months, Pope Benedict has personally presided over the canonization of five people and proclaimed another 31 candidates blessed.

None of the causes were introduced or speeded up by Pope Benedict, who is letting them follow their normal path from introduction in a diocese through the often years of study at the Vatican.

One notable exception, however, was Pope Benedict's decision to set aside the five-year waiting period and allow the sainthood cause of Pope John Paul to begin.

Cardinal Saraiva Martins said Pope Benedict "has not decided the outcome — absolutely not. He has just said the study and research can begin."

"The process for Pope John Paul is the same as the process for anyone," he said.

Although some may find the very idea shocking, the cardinal said, the process is serious and not just a matter of formality.

"It is possible, as has happened in other cases, that there could be a negative outcome," he said. "Nothing is guaranteed."

Asked about the impact of public reaction to the causes of Pope Pius XII and Pope John Paul, the cardinal said, "Just because some people are very much in favor or very much opposed to a cause cannot influence our decisions. We want the historical facts, reality and that alone."

An 'objective fan'

The Portuguese cardinal describes himself as an "objective fan," both when it comes to soccer and when it comes to evaluating material submitted in sainthood causes.

A well-known supporter of Lazio, one of Rome's two premier-league soccer teams, he said he is sad when Lazio loses, "but I know it will help them learn to play better."

The cardinal said his job as prefect of the congregation handling sainthood causes is a role that requires even more objectivity.

"For us, the process for a pope or for a cloistered nun is the same," he said. "Holiness is a very personal thing. What matters is that the individual lived his or her life in a holy way, whether the person was a prince or a chimney sweep."

Extraordinary efforts

Like the other Vatican congregations, Cardinal Saraiva Martins' office has about 30 full-time employees.

They handle requests for Vatican approval to begin the local phase of sainthood causes, ensure that causes follow the procedures outlined in church law and coordinate the historical and theological review of materials submitted in support of a claim that an individual lived a saintly life.

Separate studies are conducted on miracles alleged to have occurred through the candidate's intercession.

Cardinal Saraiva Martins said his congregation actually has substantially more people working with it than any other Vatican office.

"We have 62 consultants," including theologians and historians who review all the written material submitted for each cause, and 70 physicians prepared to examine the clinical data submitted in support of miracles, he said.

In addition, about 200 postulators — the official promoters of sainthood causes — are in regular contact with the congregation, he said.

Rules and procedures

The Catholic Church's process for recognizing saints is marked only by the rarest of exceptions; for the vast majority of causes, the process is very methodical and very orderly.

For the cardinal, a fan and former ice hockey player, the rules are the rules.

While the congregation does not have a penalty box, it does have nine tall, doublewide cupboards filled with material belonging to causes that have officially stalled and are unlikely to proceed.

The cupboards line the hallway leading to what the cardinal describes as "one of the greatest treasures of the Catholic Church" — the congregation archives.

The huge rooms contain not only information on every sainthood cause submitted to the Vatican since 1588 but also Vatican records dealing with every aspect of the Latin-rite liturgy from 1588 to 1969.

For 381 years, the former Congregation of Rites handled both the causes of saints to be added eventually to the church's liturgical calendar and the liturgy itself.

When the Congregation for Saints' Causes and the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments were separated, Cardinal Saraiva Martins' office was given responsibility for the historic archives.

Even without looking in the archives, the cardinal can tell visitors that the five-year waiting period the church usually requires before opening a sainthood cause is nothing compared to what it used to be.

"At first, it was 50 years, then it was reduced to 30 and now it is five," he said. "Why? For scrupulousness and objectivity."

"The 50-year period was instituted because it was unlikely that anyone who knew the person would still be alive and, therefore, the process would be much more objective. Certain passions generated when someone dies cool off and the remaining impressions are more objective," he said.

The cardinal said the current five-year period allows the excessive emotional response to slacken, but still gives the church access to the invaluable testimony of people who actually knew the candidate.

Delaware priest uses podcast to spread God's word

BY GARY MORTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

DOVER, Del. — "Greetings, everybody, this is Father Stanislao, and I welcome you to another issue of 'The Daily Walk Heavenwards.'"

That's how the soothing, Italian-accented voice of Father Stanislao Esposito welcomed listeners to one recent episode of his spiritual "podcast."

The associate pastor of Holy Cross Church in Dover, Father Esposito — who goes by "Father Stanislao" on the podcast — uses the Internet medium to preach God's message of love.

That has been the priest's mission since young Stanislao — inspired by a book given to him by the pastor of his parish near Naples, Italy — would read parables from the Gospels to his fourth-grade classmates during recess.

Father Esposito, 37, entered the digital world in 1994, developing a Web site to expand on a Bible study group he had formed. Last summer a seminarian friend suggested he try a podcast.

Early one morning in mid-November, in his bedroom in the rectory at Holy Cross, he produced his first podcast.

"It was recorded at 5 o'clock; I had the 6 o'clock Mass," he said. "I was whispering into the microphone so I did not wake up the other priests."

Since then, each of the approximately 50 episodes of "The Daily Walk Heavenwards" has begun with an invitation to join Father Esposito on a walk toward heaven. He reads the day's Gospel, provides a short reflection and offers a prayer.

Some days he will talk about items of current interest. Sometimes he will answer questions from listeners or play some recorded music.

Weekday podcasts run about 10 minutes and are produced and posted on Web sites Monday through Thursday most weeks. Sunday podcasts are longer but rarely exceed 30 minutes.

Once on the Web, the podcasts can be downloaded to iPods or MP3 players around the world.

Father Esposito said he has heard from listeners across the United States and from Europe.

"I feel like my parish is way larger than Holy Cross, and Holy Cross is a large parish" with more than 3,200 families, he said.

Marty O'Toole of Cleveland listens to "The Daily Walk Heavenwards" while driving to work.

"It's like being able to dial up Father Stanislao at my convenience for a bit of theological teaching with a personal touch," O'Toole said.

Closer to home, Lisa Smith of Clayton, Del., checks for a new episode every morning.

Father Stanislao Esposito of Holy Cross Church in Dover, Del., wears headphones with a built-in microphone as he records his podcast, "The Daily Walk Heavenwards," in late January. Father Esposito said he has heard from listeners across the United States and from Europe.

"It is wonderful to be able to start the day with prayer and the Liturgy of the Word," she said.

Podcasts are just the latest way Father Esposito has found to communicate the Gospel message.

In Italy, before he came to the United States in 1992 as a novice of the Holy Cross brothers, "I used to do voiceovers. I used to do theater, musicals, play the guitar, whatever it took to bring out the fact that God loves you," he said.

"There are so many ways to minister," said Father Esposito, who left the Brothers of the Holy Cross in 1998, then taught at St. Peter the Apostle School in New Castle before entering the seminary. He was ordained in 2003.

He would like to start a book club and a program called Words of Life, which each month takes a sentence from Scripture and asks members to make it a part of their lives.

Words of Life is part of Focolare, a Catholic lay spirituality movement.

The priest hopes to have several podcasts on "The DaVinci Code" ready before May, when the movie based on the novel is released. He also envisions a commentary on the "Our Father" and programs to help people learn ways to pray.

Editor's Note: "The Daily Walk Heavenwards" is available at heavenwards.mypodcasts.net. It is also available for iPod and MP3 feeds through iTunes (www.apple.com/itunes; go to the Music Store and type in "Father Stanislao") or Podcast Alley (www.podcastalley.com; type "Heavenwards Walk" in the box titled Search for a Podcast).

It's a blessing to be in God's hands

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

About this time last year, our family was looking death in the face, and death wasn't pretty. In fact, it was rather a shock.

Of course we had experienced the deaths of loved ones before. All my grandparents had died in their old age, but it was to be expected. They lived full lives and succumbed, like most of the very elderly do, to the ravages of diseases that take their course.

My husband's parents recently had died, but they too had suffered with lingering illnesses, and so their deaths, while painful for us, brought some measure of peace.

But this time it was different. This time it was my dad, the quintessential "Energizer Bunny," who slowed down for nothing and was hardly ever sick, who went to see his family doctor (reluctantly, at my mother's insistence) about a sinus infection and came back with the diagnosis of the dreaded "c" word: pancreatic cancer.

We all knew that people died of this stuff, relatively quickly. I was numb. What followed over the ensuing weeks was surreal, since I live 1,000 miles away and didn't see him or what he and my mom went through on a daily basis.

I only knew I was scared and didn't want to be. And when his surgeon confirmed the malignancy, I knew that he was in real danger.

It was also then that my faith told me even while I prayed earnestly for his recovery that I had to start the process of "letting go" whether I was ready or not. His life was truly "in God's hands," and the phrase took on a significance that was frighteningly immediate and oddly comforting at the same time.

Abraham, when asked to give up a son whom he loved and wasn't ready to lose, must have gone through an even more intense test of faith.

My dad's story had a happy ending: After the tumor's timely surgical removal and a successful round of chemotherapy, he is as active and energetic as ever, albeit a little thinner. He'll probably be around for a while longer, and I'll get a second chance to be his daughter.

But I wouldn't trade the realization that our lives are truly not ours to hold or the blessing of closeness it brought to our extended family.

We are all in the hands of God, and being reminded of that fact is indeed a blessing.

Questions:

What is God asking you to "let go of" right now? How can this letting go make a new space in your heart for God's blessing?

'16 Blocks' a good trip

Bruce Willis and Mos Def star in "16 Blocks," a far-fetched but surprisingly diverting New York story about a world-weary alcoholic cop (Willis) assigned to drive a jailed trial witness (Def) to the courtroom 16 blocks away. They quickly find corrupt cops are out to kill the witness before he exposes them, prompting an unlikely alliance between detective and criminal.

Willis and Def are so believable, one readily overlooks the loopholes in the formulaic thriller, while the corny but inspiring themes of breaking with the past, embracing new beginnings, and sacrificing for others resonate.

Violence and language quotients are refreshingly low for this sort of film, and allow recommendation for older adolescents and up. Scattered rough and crude words, mild action violence, a couple of murders, shooting, alcoholic character, brief crime scene gore.

The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

Living the dream

Catholic college graduate to compete on 'The Apprentice'

BY MARY FRANCES MCCARTHY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ARLINGTON, Va. — Tarek Saab does not even own a television, but the Catholic college graduate is appearing on television screens across the nation in the fifth season of NBC's "The Apprentice," where he competes with 17 other men and women for a chance to work for Donald Trump.

The fifth season premiered Feb. 27 on NBC.

Saab, a 27-year-old Maronite Catholic, lived in war-torn Lebanon as a child before he and his family moved into public housing projects in New Bedford, Mass.

He earned a scholarship to a boarding school in Massachusetts and later earned a bachelor's degree from The Catholic University of America in Washington in 2001. Saab now works as a global marketing manager for Texas Instruments in Dallas.

In an interview for "The Apprentice," Saab said he has lived the American dream because he achieved a successful business career "with little guidance and without a dime" in his pocket.

At the Manchester college, he worked with campus ministry and participated in an alternative spring break in Maine building a home in a poor community.

Benedictine Father Jonathan DeFelice, president of St. Anselm's, still keeps in touch with Saab and described him as "a young man of great ability and great values."

"I certainly hope he is successful on the show, but I know that Tarek will make a positive difference in the world wherever he works," he said.

Saab was also involved in campus ministry at Catholic University, where he led a spiritual retreat for athletes and helped organize a spring break trip to build a meeting room for cloistered nuns in Connecticut.

Therese Bermphohl, former associate campus minister for community outreach at Catholic University, described Saab as "a bit of a schmoozer," but added, "Tarek wants to do the right thing and wants to live his faith out. He really embraced his faith in a more profound way at Catholic."

Tarek Saab, a Maronite Catholic, appears on NBC's "The Apprentice."

Saab attends daily Mass and is godfather to nine children. He mentors youths and speaks at high schools on how faith can influence success. During his college years he also gave chastity talks to high school students.

"He has enough confidence in himself to say, 'I believe in this message and I will try to live it out,'" Bermphohl said.

When asked how she thinks he will fare on reality TV, Bermphohl said, "I'm hopeful that his faith life will help him, and the fact that he's a charmer."

Joe Camm, one of Saab's friends from Catholic University, is worried that his friend's confidence might come across as cockiness on the reality TV show, and his honesty could also help or hurt him.

On the show, he said there is "a tendency to point a finger at other people." Camm does not think Saab will fall prey to that behavior.

"He's not like that," Camm said. "If he makes a mistake, he'll own up to it."

Buzzing about geography

Sixth-grader wins Geography Bee at St. Pius X School

BY KAREN GRAVES
SPECIAL TO
THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

GREENSBORO — Andrew Scheppegegrell, a sixth-grader at St. Pius X School in Greensboro, recently won the school-level competition of the National Geographic Bee in January.

The school-level geography bees, held by participating schools Nov. 14, 2005-Jan. 13, 2006, determine school winners to compete in the state-level bees in March and the national bee in Washington, D.C. in May.

The nationwide geography competition is designed to encourage fourth-through-eighth-grade teachers to include geography in their classrooms, spark student interest in the subject and increase public awareness about geography.

As the school winner, Andrew took a written test to qualify for the state bee. The National Geographic Society will provide all-expense-paid trips for the state winners and teacher escorts to the national bee in Washington.

The first-place winner of that competition will receive a $25,000 college scholarship and a lifetime membership in the National Geographic Society.

The following students won in their homerooms and participated in the final-round competition: Fourth-graders: Connor Cooke and William Johnson; fifth-graders: Alex Errington and Connor Speetjens; sixth-grader: Brian Jordan; seventh-graders: John Perry and Nicholas Cook; and eighth-graders: Ethan Miele and Ellis Murray.

Move over, 'American Idol'

Those who make real differences are real celebrities

I knew celebrity had reached a strange new status in America when William Hung hit the stage in 2004. The tone-deaf college student was rejected by "American Idol" and then embraced by a cult following of Americans.

It was never quite clear whether fans were mocking Hung's lack of talent or saluting his abundance of energy, and it didn't really matter. Across the globe, people bought his album and attended his concerts.

Regardless of what creates stardom, one thing's for sure: Americans adore the stars.

As a reporter, I've had the opportunity to interview a few better known folks. I bragged to everyone in earshot about interviewing Joe Mauer, a catcher playing for his hometown team, the Minnesota Twins. I kept his number in my cell just to show off.

I recently interviewed Omarosa, the villain of NBC's 2004 "The Apprentice," and Matt Hoover, the winner of NBC's 2005 "The Biggest Loser," for a magazine feature. My reality-TV-viewing friends (and most are) wanted to hear all the juicy details afterward.

It got me thinking about the range of people I've interviewed in my young career. But when I'm honest with myself, the most admirable ones are working quietly in their corners — outside the headlines.

An engineering professor devising hunger fighters for women in Africa. Two sixth-graders asking their classmates to donate to youth victims of Hurricane Katrina. A busy mom making time to teach catechism every Wednesday night.

People making a difference.

It makes me wonder about the criteria by which we choose our celebrities. Why do we picture someone's face on a magazine cover or drop her name in a headline?

Some reasons seem just plain bad. Take Paris Hilton. The laudable feat she accomplished? Inheriting money.

Now, week after week, magazines

Coming of Age

CHRISTINA CAPECCHI

illustrate her spending it frivolously, wearing those oversized sunglasses and miniskirts.

The good news is that Catholics have a well-cloaked celebrity who is also well qualified to stand on a pedestal: the pope. Unlike Paris Hilton, the 78-year-old Pope Benedict XVI earned his position through decades of dedication to the church.

I joined 1 million other Catholics to participate in Mass with the new pope at World Youth Day in Cologne, Germany, last August. It was awesome to see so many teens gather for a real star.

I even spotted a celebrity magazine on a Cologne newsstand that had printed a picture of Pope Benedict on its cover with the headline "The Star of World Youth Day." It featured a two-page foldout of the pope on the inside.

Of course, that's not what Pope Benedict is seeking. The day he was elected pope he told a packed St. Peter's Square: "I am a humble worker in the vineyard of the Lord." Pretty different from a vain star in the Hollywood spotlight.

And as opposed to the 15 minutes they score, workers for the Lord land an eternity in paradise. Way better than a Prada purse, Paris.

Recently I took a trip to Rome, where I attended the pope's Wednesday general assembly. Again, he spoke of humility, this time reflecting on Mary's response to bearing Jesus.

But since I still haven't mastered that virtue, I will indulge in my moment of glory: I got to shake hands with Pope Benedict. I looked directly into his smiling eyes and I said "Papa!" in awe.

When he continued down the aisle, tears spilled down my cheeks. How good it feels to find a worthy celebrity.

Pope says Bible meditation leads to conversion, charity during Lent

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Lent should be a time for deeper meditation on the word of God, which will lead to conversion and to concrete acts of charity, said Pope Benedict XVI.

"Lent stimulates us to allow our lives to be penetrated by the word of God and in that way to know the fundamental truth about who we are, where we come from, where we are going and what is the path we must follow in our lives," the pope said March 1, Ash Wednesday.

Speaking at his weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square, the pope urged Catholics to allow themselves to be "nourished with the abundance of the word of God" during Lent.

The pope looked at the two phrases used when distributing ashes: "Remember that you are dust and to dust you will return" and "Turn away from sin and be faithful to the Gospel."

The first, he said, is a reminder that people have fallen and have limits, and it "is meant to urge us to place all our hope in God alone."

Lent is a time of "fasting, penance and vigilance over ourselves, knowing that the struggle against sin never ends because temptation is an everyday reality, and fragility and disillusionment are experienced by everyone," the pope said.

The admonition to "convert and believe in the Gospel," he said, "places firm and faithful adherence to the Gospel at the foundation of personal and communal renewal."

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

"The Christian life is a life of faith founded and nourished on the word of God," he said. "In the trials of life and before every temptation, the secret of victory consists in listening to the word of truth and decisively refusing falsehood and evil."

"This is the real program of the Lenten period: to listen to the word of truth, to live, speak and act in truth and to refuse falsehood, which poisons humanity and is at the root of all evil," the pope said.

One who follows the truth, meditates on the Gospel and draws closer and closer to God, he said, also "sees others with new eyes. He discovers his brothers and sisters and their needs."

"Because the truth of God is love, conversion to God is conversion to love," Pope Benedict said.

The "climate of Lent," he said, "is precisely the climate of love for our brothers and sisters" because it is a time for learning to see others with Christ's eyes.

Pope Benedict said because conversion includes a growing realization of the obligation to demonstrate love for one's neighbors charity and almsgiving are central to the Lenten practice.

Letters to the Editor

Altar server article a worthy story

I was pleased and moved to read the article in The Catholic News & Herald about the three altar servers with Down syndrome at St. Paul the Apostle Church in Greensboro ("Serving at the Lord's Table," Feb. 10). As my sister was born with Down syndrome, stories such as this really touch my heart.

My younger sister, Leslie, died before having such an opportunity, but I know, had she had the chance, that she would have been as fine a server as those featured in the article. I am not only pleased that this is happening here in the Diocese of Charlotte, but that it is also considered worthy of a front-page article in the diocesan newspaper.

My prayers are with these servers, their families and the pastoral staff of St. Paul the Apostle Church.

St. Vincent de Paul Church, Charlotte

Confusion over B.C.E., C.E.

I have come across the terms B.C.E. (Before Common Era) and C.E. (Common Era). This terminology appeared in secular publications so I dismissed their use as a manifestation of political correctness. Still to me, as a Christian, the terms were a bit annoying.

But I was taken aback to see these terms appear several times in the articles about the Dead Sea Scrolls ("Hidden treasures uncovered," Feb. 24). Have I missed something? When did B.C.E. and C.E. become the accepted term for B.C. (Before Christ) and A.D. (Anno Domini, the Year of our Lord)?

— Joseph Gerardi, Brevard

Editor's response: When it comes to grammar and language usage, we defer to two sources: the Associated Press Stylebook and the Catholic News Service Stylebook.

The AP Stylebook does not mention C.E./B.C.E. However, the CNS Stylebook reads as thus:

"C.E., B.C.E. — The Jewish equivalents respectively of A.D. and B.C. ... Use with dates only in quoted matter or in stories dealing with Judaism or Jewish-Christian relations in which the term has significance."

Although the scrolls and the Old Testament are central to our Christian faith, they are not exclusively Christian documents. Since the scrolls were written by Jews before the time when Jesus lived, using C.E./B.C.E. was appropriate.

To note, the scrolls exhibit at Discovery Place in Charlotte uses C.E./B.C.E.

'O Dio mio'

The happiness in an arsenal of prayer outbursts

Looking back on my life, I often wonder what it was that made my grandparents happy people — people you enjoyed being around.

During my childhood, we lived downstairs from my Italian grandparents. Grandpa would rise at 5:30 a.m. and take the streetcar to work. He was a sewer contractor. He would dig the ditches between the street sewers and new homes, and fit them with sewer tiles.

Even though it was tough manual labor, he always came home with a smile on his face.

My grandmother was the same. Even though she and my grandfather watched one of their sons die in their home of tuberculosis, she never lost her sense of humor.

I used to think that their secret to happiness came from being Italian and coming from sunny Italy. As we know, the sun does wonders for the disposition.

Recently I came across a book on various methods of prayer that revealed my grandparents' real secret.

It was common to hear my grandparents periodically cry out in Italian, "O Dio mio," meaning, "Oh my God." Although this could be interpreted as alarm over something, it was also said in praise of an unexpected wonderful happening.

This short prayer is relatively common today. How many times have we seen an athlete perform an awesome feat, or come upon exquisite beauty and blurted out, "O my God!" meaning: This reflects God's power and beauty?

The secret to my grandparents' happiness was that their day was dotted with prayers of aspiration.

What is a prayer of aspiration? It is a fervent elevation of the mind to God composed of a few words that in a moment are hurled toward heaven to make known to God the good affection and holy desires of our heart. It springs from a heart of love, just as a flame springs from a burning furnace.

It is a short prayer, composed of only a few words that may be mental or oral.

Spiritual writers remind us that those who love little and those who are negligent will think this practice is impossible. Indeed it is, until we give ourselves seriously to mental prayer and fill our minds with good thoughts and affections that build up an arsenal of prayer outbursts.

The secret of my grandparents' happiness was the gift of experiencing something beautiful, awesome and divine, and being able to throw their heart into it. They could let their love fly. They celebrated life when the moment presented itself.

This method of prayer speaks worlds to an age that is making us uptight because of terrorism and the fears it spawns. This prayer method asks us: "When did you last see something beautiful and let go with a short prayer of wonder? When did you last release your affections and feel them shoot out like a flame from a burning furnace?"

"When last did you see God's awesomeness in something you experienced and feel compelled to blurt out, 'O Dio mio!'"

Lenten abstinence from television

We at the Roadkill Theological Roundtable do not want to take total credit for this, but we are very confident that a groundswell of support is building for something we began advocating more than eight years ago.

But, we would love some of the credit; 72 percent sounds like a good number.

I know it is on the tip of your tongue: CATSCAN, which stands for Catholics Abstaining From Television: a Spiritual Campaign for a Nation. It was born in 1998 in the wake of the U.S. bishops' vote not to reinstate abstinence from meat on Fridays at the same time they issued a pastoral letter on the media.

We RTR members took their leadership to the next logical step: Let's abstain from TV on Fridays.

This was met with much confusion and many questions.

For example, would it be licit to tape one's favorite Friday programs and watch them later? Would it be fudging to watch videos on TV instead or to watch TV on one's laptop? Would Eternal Word Television Network apply for an exemption?

Why single out TV? Why not also abstain from radio, movies, streaming-screaming videos, cell phones, etc.?

There are a couple of answers to the last question. First, TV is the only medium that has been accepted as a legal drug. Second, it would screw up the acronym — although we could change the campaign from CATSCAN to MRI (Media Reflection and Insight). That said, CAMSCAN does kind of roll off the tongue.

At least two Catholic columnists in recent weeks suggested that Catholics take a hard look at their TV consumption.

—Father Peter Daly hinted that others might want to follow his lead in cutting way back on television (and radio) news, admitting it tends to have just about the in-depth content of product labels, only with less accuracy.

—Media writer Mark Pattison floated the notion of giving up television for Lent. It would certainly unmask any TV addictions we might have — like having it on for background noise or building one's entire week around the next episode of "American Idol" or "Survivor."

Whether one decides to abstain from TV on a Friday, for Lent or just for a while, it certainly seems like a healthy exercise.

And if you happen to use the time to visit a friend, a library or a shut-in, tell them RTR sent you. Well, about 72 percent of the way anyhow.

Comments are welcome. E-mail Uncle Dan at cnsuncle01@yahoo.com.

The three kings

Q. What can you tell us about the three kings who came to worship Christ after he was born? Do we know their names? Are they considered saints? If so, when is their feast? Where did they die? (Pennsylvania)

A. We know very little about these men, except that the Gospel of Matthew presents them as the first gentiles to believe in Christ (Mt 2:1-12). In the New Testament they are called sages (in Greek "magoi") who came apparently from the East to offer gifts to the Christ child.

The third-century theologian Tertullian was the first to raise the idea that they were kings; he called them "almost kings."

Some centuries later they were commonly honored as kings, probably based on the passage in Psalm 72, which says of the Messiah, "The kings of Tarshish and the Isles (the far west) will offer gifts; the kings of Arabia and Seba (the far south) shall bring tribute. All kings shall pay him homage."

Many passages in the Gospels and other parts of the New Testament find their roots in prophetic writings of the Old Testament.

The Bible says nothing about how many there were. The numbers fluctuated greatly, but eventually there were said to be three, probably because of the three gifts offered in Bethlehem.

Balthasar are first mentioned in the sixth century.

By the Middle Ages devotion to the Magi was popular all over Europe. They were venerated as saints, and their images appeared widely in all forms of art. Much later, in the 15th century, artists started depicting one of them as a black African nobleman.

A feast in honor of the "Three Wise Men" is listed in Butler's Lives of the Saints for July 23. It is not widely observed, however, and is not on the Catholic liturgical calendar.

No one has a clue, of course, about where or when they might have died. Catholic authorities in Milan claimed to have their bones after these were brought to Italy from Constantinople around the year 500.

In 1162, the Holy Roman Emperor Frederick Barbarossa took them to Germany and gave them to the archbishop of Cologne. They are still enshrined in the Cologne Cathedral.

Are they genuine? For a variety of reasons, no one can know. That the relics in Cologne are those brought from Milan in the 12th century seems certain. Where they originated, however, and what happened to them during the thousand years before that, no one can say.

Albertines prepare for Lent in culinary fashion — making paczki

BY STEVE EUVINO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

HAMMOND, Ind. — Things are heating up in the kitchen at the Albertine Home in Hammond where the sisters are preparing for Lent in Polish culinary fashion.

In a word, that's paczki.

A pastry associated with pre-Lenten activities, paczki are very popular with the Albertines, and Sister Patrycja Bryniarska is the unofficial "pro" at making them.

She came to this country several years ago from Poland. Having learned cooking from other sisters, Sister Bryniarska is now in charge when it comes to paczki.

Working with Sister Donata Stachowiak as her interpreter, Sister Bryniarska said that paczki are not just for "fat Tuesday," the day before Ash Wednesday. That, the sisters said, is more of an American tradition.

In their native Poland, paczki are prepared on the previous Thursday.

So, in keeping with the traditions of two paczki-loving countries,

Father Matthew Kish sneaks a paczki as Albertine Sister Patrycja Bryniarska forms dough for the Polish pastries at the Albertine Home in Hammond, Ind., Feb. 23. The traditional doughnutlike pastries are said to have come about as a way to use rich ingredients that could not be consumed during Lent.

Sister Bryniarska may make up to 200 in two days.

"No one knows how this tradition got started," said Sister Stachowiak, noting that paczki may go back to the 17th century.

According to one account, religious

Poles, knowing that they had to give up all their favorite foods for Lent but not wanting to let anything go to waste, took all the rich ingredients, mixed them in a batter, and came up with paczki.

That story makes some sense to Sister Stachowiak. She recalled that people in her native country would eat all they could just before Lent, because once Lent arrived, "they stopped celebrating."

Back in the kitchen, Sister Bryniarska had the batter ready and was waiting for it to rise to three times its original size. She starts with flour, sugar and eggs; mixes them; and then covers the batter to allow it to rise on its own — with the help of a well-heated kitchen. The entire process takes about two hours.

"The most important part is to take time to prepare the dough," Sister Bryniarska said.

Sister stresses the need to make the dough "poofy." Otherwise, she said, the batter becomes "doughy."

After the batter rises, Sister Bryniarska then kneads the dough. About 40-50 minutes later she starts forming dough balls that become paczki.

She will then add rose marmalade for filling. After adding a little vodka — to the batter, not the cook — she places the balls in oil for frying.

The alcohol, Sister Bryniarska explained, keeps the grease in the cooking oil from saturating the paczki dough.

Sister Bryniarska fries the paczki until they are a light brown color. As to the filling, some people use chocolate, pudding, or jelly, and they have a specific means of getting the filling into the center.

Sister Bryniarska recalled that while growing up in Poland, paczki were a real treat — something the children looked forward to every year.

"Everyone (in Poland) has to eat at least one," Sister Stachowiak said of paczki.

That was not a problem at the Albertine Home, where residents were treated to two days of paczki — the Thursday and Tuesday prior to Lent — and where the sisters wouldn't think of selling their popular pastries.

"It's a big treat here," said Sister Stachowiak. "Sometimes the people ask for more than one."

"No one knows how this tradition got started ... everyone (in Poland) has to eat at least one."

EMBRACING FAITH

Dr. Daniel Greene holds infant MacKenzie Grace Couch at Crittenton Hospital in Rochester Hills, Mich., in early January. Greene, a gynecologist and parishioner of St. Mary of the Hills Church, said his faith led him to a decision that he will no longer prescribe birth control. He joins a minority of doctors who have a natural family planning-only practice.

Gynecologist employs natural family planning principles in practice

ROCHESTER HILLS, Mich. (CNS) — For Dr. Daniel Greene, there's no more debating the point: God made the human body and he knows what's best for it.

As a result, Greene, a gynecologist and member of St. Mary of the Hills Church in Rochester Hills, decided that natural family planning is the only form of birth control he will prescribe.

"It's crystal clear to me," said Greene, who has practiced obstetrics and gynecology for 11 years. "It makes perfect sense as to why one would choose to live the culture of life or practice natural family planning or embrace the church's teaching on human sexuality."

"I think a lot of people just haven't looked at it," he said.

Natural family planning (NFP) refers to forms of birth regulation, which, in conformity with Catholic teaching, do not involve the use of any artificial means of contraception. Different natural methods all share two basic elements: monitoring of the woman's monthly fertility cycle and abstinence during her fertile period except when the couple wants to have a baby.

When used properly, modern NFP methods have greater success rates than the most effective contraceptive, have no side effects and never lead to abortion. Some birth control methods are considered abortifacients by the church.

Greene spent his early medical career as most gynecologists do, examining patients, delivering babies and presenting women with a wide array of artificial birth control methods.

But as he grew more deeply in his faith, he began to have questions. He listened to lectures, read books and examined both the medical and religious sides of the debate.

In medicine, he knew that artificial birth control had side effects and potentially could cause physical harm to his patients. The risks and societal harms of contraception, he said, were glossed over in his traditional medical training, and NFP was given only a passing mention.

"Everything was saying, 'This is the right thing to do and it's what God wants and it's going to honor God.'"

Finally, he received the consent of his colleagues at Contemporary Obstetrics and Gynecology and became a doctor who prescribes only NFP.

"I've had some Catholic patients who have been like, 'Yes!' — they can see it's God's work," said Greene. "And other patients kind of gave me a deer-in-the-headlights kind of stare and I got a transfer-of-records form within a week."

Though he has lost some patients, Dorothy Staple, NFP coordinator for the Archdiocese of Detroit, could see him being flooded with more.

"I constantly get calls from women who are using natural family planning and ask whether we have natural family planning-only doctors," Staple said. "These women are tired of going to doctors and not being heard."

Bishops hail abortion ban, urge more efforts to build culture of life

PIERRE, S.D. (CNS) — Two Catholic bishops hailed South Dakota's new law banning nearly all abortions, but they also urged efforts to transform people's hearts and minds to reject abortion and build a culture that respects all life from conception to natural death.

On March 6, Gov. Mike Rounds signed into law a bill prohibiting all intentional abortions except those to save a mother's life.

Bishop Blase J. Cupich of Rapid City said South Dakota citizens and their elected officials "can be justifiably proud of their efforts to restore the rights of the unborn child," but said "a change in law and structures is not sufficient."

Society must build a culture of life that "begins with the unborn" and also ensures livable wages, education, health care, help for single mothers and "an end to the death penalty," he said.

Bishop Samuel J. Aquila, apostolic administrator of the Sioux Falls Diocese, said:

"None of us can claim the right directly to destroy an innocent human being."

"Regardless of court rulings and laws, we must be ardent in our efforts to transform the hearts and minds of our fellow citizens," he said.

South Dakota's new law is the most sweeping ban on abortion adopted in any state since 1973, the year the U.S. Supreme Court legalized abortion virtually on demand in its Roe v. Wade decision.

The law specifically exempts women from any criminal conviction or penalty for obtaining an abortion. But it says that anyone who performs an abortion except to save a mother's life commits a Class 5 felony, which is punishable by a fine up to $5,000 and up to five years in prison.

The South Dakota House of Representatives passed the bill Feb. 24. The Senate had approved it Feb. 22, after slightly amending an earlier version adopted by the House.

Pope says business owners must avoid worker exploitation

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Business owners must avoid every form of worker exploitation, and they must recognize the importance of family life for their workers, Pope Benedict XVI told a group of Italian entrepreneurs and business leaders.

Upholding the importance of people in the workplace and in the world of business and respecting their needs and talents are values that "often risk not being pursued by business owners who lack solid moral inspiration," especially in the current climate of "economic difficulties," he said.

Pope Benedict made his comments during a March 4 audience at the Vatican with some 8,000 members of Italy's Union of Christian Entrepreneurs and Business Executives.

Citing his first encyclical, "Deus Caritas Est" ("God Is Love"), the pope reminded his audience that justice and charity were "two inseparable facets of a Christian's social duty" and that the lay faithful must work for a just ordering of society.

He said the Compendium of the Social Doctrine of the Church is a useful and educational tool for all people who "intend to let themselves be guided by the Gospel in their professional and work-related activities."

He praised a "charter of values" that had been drawn up by the union's youth association. Of the six points outlined, the pope said he most admired placing value on each person and praised the recognition of the "importance of the family and of personal responsibility."

So as to better adhere to what the church teaches about social justice in the workplace, the pope said it was crucial that business owners "nurture and renew" their Christian formation and education.

SALISBURY VICARIATE

Vatican removes title 'patriarch of the West' after pope's name

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In the 2006 edition of the Vatican's official yearbook, the pope is no longer referred to with the title "patriarch of the West," a change with potential ecumenical implications.

The Vatican press office confirmed the deletion of the title March 1, but offered no explanation for the change.

In the 2006 book, the pope is described as "bishop of Rome, vicar of Jesus Christ, successor of the prince of the apostles, supreme pontiff of the universal church, primate of Italy, archbishop and metropolitan of the province of Rome, sovereign of Vatican City State and servant of the servants of God."

The 2006 edition, which was presented to Pope Benedict XVI Feb. 18 and was to be on sale to the public by March 10, is the first edition printed since Pope Benedict's April 19 election.

In previous editions, the title "patriarch of the West" had been listed after "supreme pontiff of the universal church."

The last time the list of titles was changed was with Pope Paul VI's publication of the 1969 edition of the yearbook, the Annuario Pontificio. Pope Paul added the title "servant of the servants of God" and deleted the phrase "gloriously reigning."

Theologians and ecumenists contacted by Catholic News Service in Rome said the ecumenical impact of the removal of the "patriarch of the West" title would depend on the Vatican's reason for deleting it.

Cardinal Achille Silvestrini, retired prefect of the Congregation for Eastern Churches, said the deletion was a "sign of ecumenical sensitivity" on the part of Pope Benedict.

The cardinal said that in the past some people used the title to provoke negative comparisons between the claims of universal jurisdiction by the worldwide "Patriarchate of the West" and the more restricted size and jurisdiction of the traditional Orthodox patriarchates.

Other experts, however, warned that the deletion could provoke concern if it is seen as the Vatican saying patriarchal authority is meaningless when the pope has universal authority over the church.

Fun on 'Fat Tuesday'

Father John Schneider, pastor of St. Eugene Church in Asheville; Zoe Howard, a student at Asheville Catholic School; and Pete Hutchens, fourth-grade teacher, show off their costumes for the school's Mardi Gras parade March 1.

The fourth-grade class, dressed in costumes and pulling floats they made, marched behind a local jazz band around the school playground. Father Schneider, dressed as the Mardi Gras king, rode on a float pulled by Hutchens and tossed beads to the crowd.

The parent-faculty association sponsored the celebration.

Mardi Gras ("Fat Tuesday") traditionally provides an opportunity for festivity and merrymaking the day before Ash Wednesday and the penitential season of Lent.

Knights' quest assists Holy Angels

Council leads fundraising in NC

BELMONT — As part of their annual Operation LAMB campaign, Knights of Columbus St. Matthew Council 10852 presented Holy Angels with a check for $20,000.

The presentation was made at the Holy Angels campus Feb. 25.

"The Knights of Columbus feel blessed to be able to contribute to such a wonderful organization as Holy Angels, a place that strives on a daily basis to make a difference in the lives of those who are not able to totally help themselves," said Richard White, the council's deputy grand knight and Operation LAMB director.

Council 10852 raised more than $56,000 for the LAMB Foundation in 2005. It is the second year in a row the council has led the state councils in fundraising.

"Our organization is founded on charity, with the LAMB campaign comprising our primary labor of love," said White.

"This year alone, more than 200 knights and family members from our council contributed more than 1,300 man hours to raising the $56,000 for developmentally disabled individuals in our community," he said. "We are humbled and grateful to be able to help."

The Knights of Columbus raise funds for their LAMB (Least Among My Brethren) drive through corporate and private donations and their famous Tootsie Roll campaigns at area retailers and churches. The LAMB Foundation of NC is an IRS non-profit public charity benefiting the developmentally disabled with 100 percent of the monies raised going to local and statewide organizations like Holy Angels, the Allegro Foundation, Special Olympics, Lifespan and others.

Founded in 1882, the Knights of Columbus is a Catholic fraternal and service organization with more than 1.7 million members. Knights are found in every state as well as Canada, Mexico, the Philippines and many other parts of the world.

Holy Angels is a private, nonprofit corporation that provides programs and services for children and adults with varying degrees of mental retardation, some of whom have physical disabilities and are medically fragile.

Holy Angels unveils newest children's home

BELMONT — There is now room for more holy angels in Belmont.

Holy Angels' residents, staff and supporters joined Gaston County Chamber of Commerce members for a ribbon cutting ceremony at Holy Angels' newest intermediate care facility Feb. 21.

Moody Place, named in honor of Holy Angels' president and CEO, Regina Moody, is a 20,000-square-foot, state-of-the-art facility that will provide home to 15 children, ages 6 to 21, with mental retardation.

Assisting with the ribbon cutting was Moody; Maria Morrow, Holy Angels' first resident; and Kevin Loftin, Holy Angels' board of directors' chair; and two Holy Angels community group home residents.

"We are so thrilled with our new home," said Moody. "It is truly beautiful and fills such a vital need here at Holy Angels. This new facility ensures that our children can continue to call Holy Angels' their home as they age."

The new home features recreational space, nursing and therapy areas and a sensory stimulation room. The building was made possible with financial support from various foundations and individual donors.

Moody Place is one of seven homes that make up McAuley Residences on McAuley Circle, named for Catherine McAuley, founder of the Sisters of Mercy in Dublin, Ireland.

Holy Angels, a nonprofit corporation, was founded in 1956 by the Sisters of Mercy to provide specialized service for children and adults with varying degrees of mental retardation and physical disabilities, some of whom are medically fragile.

Programs include intermediate care facilities, group homes, Little Angels Child Development Center and Cherubs Café & Candy Bouquets in downtown Belmont.

Bishop Jugis celebrates Rite of Election catechumens and candidates to be introduced to Bishop Peter J. Jugis during the Rite of Election and Call to Continuing Conversion at Holy Cross Church.

Each year, the Catholic Church welcomes tens of thousands of adults into full communion through the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (RCIA). Nearly 800 of these neophytes, or new Catholics, join the church in the Diocese of Charlotte annually.

RCIA is the rite in which adults undergo an intensive period of preparation to be baptized, confirmed and receive the Eucharist. RCIA was restored by the Second Vatican Council in the 1960s as the suitable way adults prepare to receive these sacraments.

Bishop Jugis has welcomed several hundred of these soon-to-be Catholics from the diocese at three rites taking place in the diocese this month.

During his homily at the rite at St. Michael Church in Gastonia March 5, the bishop addressed the catechumens and candidates, saying, "Lent is a season of repentance and conversion, and you, the elect and candidates, bring the whole church along with you through this season."

"God speaks to our hearts, calling us to come back to him, and he draws our hearts into his own heart, where we find mercy, forgiveness and love," Bishop Jugis said.

The rite of election consists of the official enrollment of the names of those unbaptized adults, or catechumens, who seek baptism at the Easter Vigil Mass. Adults who were baptized in other Christian faiths, or candidates, are also introduced to the bishop at this time.

On March 4, catechumens and candidates from the eastern counties of the diocese participated in the rite at Holy Cross Church in Kernersville. Parishes from the western counties will gather March 11 at St. Eugene Church in Asheville.

The diocesan commission on the RCIA designed the liturgical celebrations for the Diocese of Charlotte.

A journey of faith

The rite of election and call to continuing conversion is one of several steps along the journey, following a period of discernment and study of the Catholic faith.

Before formally beginning the RCIA process, an inquirer considers his or her relationship with Jesus Christ and interest in joining the Catholic Church. This period is known as the period of evangelization and pre-catechumenate.

After discerning their desire to join the Catholic Church, the inquirers may decide to continue the process and enter the period of the catechumenate, when they study the history and practice of Catholicism. This stage can last for a few months or for as long as several years.

The third formal stage is the celebration of the sacraments of initiation, which occurs during the Easter Vigil Mass on Holy Saturday.

During the Mass, catechumens receive the sacraments of baptism, confirmation and Eucharist, and candidates are confirmed and receive the Eucharist. At this time, they become fully initiated members of the Catholic Church.

Following initiation at the Vigil Mass, a final period of formation and education continues in the stage known as mystagogy. During this period, which lasts until Pentecost or later, the neophytes reflect on the events of the Easter Vigil Mass and continue to learn more about the Scriptures, the sacraments and the teachings of the Catholic Church.

Celebrating the call

In a continuing effort to reach out to the increasing number of Hispanics in the diocese, the Rite of Election and Call to Continuing Conversion was celebrated in both English and Spanish.

The readings alternated between the two languages, and hymns were sung in both as well. Bishop Jugis completed his homily with a special welcome to the Hispanic participants in Spanish.

Bishop Jugis said the Rite of Election was a joyful celebration and the joy of all the participants was apparent.

"I was delighted as bishop to see such evidence of the work of the Holy Spirit throughout the diocese," said Bishop Jugis. "It was inspiring to see so many individuals wanting to celebrate the sacraments of initiation."

"The conversion and transformation of neophytes is essentially the work of the Holy Spirit and our first response to this increase is one of gratitude to God," said Cris Villapando, director of programs for diocesan faith formation.

"This is not to undercut the value of the works of the more than 1,200 presenters and sponsors in the diocese who assisted in stoking the embers of faith in these 'converts,'" he said.

In the Diocese of Charlotte, the RCIA ministry is currently undertaken by the Office of Faith Formation and is supported by funding from the annual Diocesan Support Appeal.

"I've spent most of my life trying to find the right 'spiritual path,'" said Palmer, who will be baptized, confirmed and receive first Communion at St. Paul the Apostle Church in Greensboro this Easter.

"I have finally found that in the Catholic Church," he said.

The Office of Faith Formation is one of the ministries supported by contributions to the Diocesan Support Appeal, an annual campaign in the Diocese of Charlotte that helps support 30 ministries that provide 50 programs. The 2006 DSA runs Feb. 4 to March 12.

Standing-room only Masses a sign of shifting New Orleans population offers a closed-circuit video feed to bring Mass to about 100 people in a community room adjacent to the main church who cannot fit inside its 550-seat worship space.

The community room is set up with folding chairs and has glass doors that people can use to enter to receive Communion. A sound system and television set provide the liturgy live "so that the people are participating in the Mass and hearing and seeing everything that goes on," said Father Rodney Bourg, St. Luke Church pastor.

Slidell is north of New Orleans and near the north shore of Lake Pontchartrain. And like most other north shore parishes, St. Luke Church has experienced a 22 percent increase in Mass attendance in the last several months as displaced residents from various parts of New Orleans have migrated north to find temporary or permanent homes.

St. Luke Church currently offers five weekend Masses, and Father Bourg said three of the four Sunday Masses are standing room only.

At Mary Queen of Peace Church in Mandeville, Father Ronald Calkins said while the parish officially had registered 150 new families in the four months after Katrina he knows there are many new churchgoers who have not yet registered.

"We are definitely seeing a lot more people in church," he said.

A common experience among north shore pastors, Father Calkins said, is that each week the congregation seems to be dotted with different people.

"I think that's maybe a sign of uncertainty in people's lives," he said. "They're moving around a lot and haven't really decided where they are going to settle in."

"One of our biggest challenges is to minister to the evacuees, and I have to say our parishioners have really stepped up to the plate," he said.

Mary Queen of Peace Church launched a Faith in Action Committee that handles a special outreach to evacuee families. The parish asked evacuees what their needs were, and they held job fairs and helped them find housing.

Mary Queen of Peace School, with a relatively small enrollment of 235 students before Katrina, took in 80 new students. Father Calkins said parishioners have opened their homes not only to relatives but also to strangers.

Msgr. Frank Giroir, pastor at St. Anselm Church in Madisonville, said his small, 300-seat church is packed for all five weekend Masses. Even the benches that have been placed along the side aisles fill up.

The parish is planning for the construction of a new 850-seat church.

St. Peter Church in Covington officially has received 80 new evacuee families since Katrina, but coordinator of ministries Ruth Prats suspects many more have yet to register. The parish put together a task force of parishioners who keep in regular contact with the new families.

"Every two weeks we send them a letter or make a telephone call to let them know of some special events in the parish and to see how they're doing," said Prats, whose own home was destroyed in the storm.

"We've put chairs up and down the side aisles and in the back, and still people are standing," she said.

The north shore may get some relief from its crowded conditions with the planned establishment of a new church parish in the Mandeville area in June. Father Bourg will become pastor of the new Holy Trinity Church, which will take territory from St. Peter Church in Covington and three other area parishes.

"Holy Trinity is probably going to become a megaparish," Father Bourg said. "If it's not divided (in the future), it should easily be home to about 4,000 to 5,000 families."

As for the current elbow-to-elbow conditions, Father Bourg urges his parishioners to take it in stride.

"We understand why it's crowded," he said. "They know if they want to sit down, they've got to come early."

Concerned with consecration

Vatican official: Spiritual reform must begin with religious orders

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI is seeking to revitalize the faith life of the church, a “spiritual reform” that must begin with the world’s men and women religious, said Archbishop Franc Rode, head of the Vatican office that oversees religious orders.

That means religious congregations must take stock, recover their “apostolic dynamism” and shed the excessive secularism of the post-Second Vatican Council period, Archbishop Rode said.

Archbishop Rode, prefect of the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life, spoke with Catholic News Service about the challenges facing religious life and the directions being set under Pope Benedict.

After the CNS interview, Pope Benedict named Archbishop Rode a cardinal Feb. 22; he is to be elevated March 24.

The 71-year-old Slovenian, a member of the Vincentian order, said the vitality of religious orders has always been essential for spiritual reform in the church.

“Throughout the history of the church, religious orders and congregations were always the ones pushing forward, bringing dynamism and a call for holiness. They were always on the front lines,” he said.

For that reason, the “in-depth reform of consecrated life” is one of Pope Benedict’s goals, as it was for Pope John Paul II, he said.

Fresh energy

For some congregations, such a reform will include the recovery of their original charism and the refocusing of apostolic energy, the archbishop said.

Since the Second Vatican Council, he said, some orders have abandoned their traditional fields of apostolate, only to lose themselves in uselessness or unproductive activities. The result is Editor’s note: This is the third of an occasional series based on interviews with heads of Vatican offices. The articles describe the work of the agencies and the main challenges they face and briefly profile the people who head them.

stagnation, he said.

Archbishop Rode said he’s already seeing signs that the church is responding to the challenge with fresh energy and new forms of religious life.

He said he met with the pope in January to present a list of 25 requests for pontifical approval from new religious congregations and secular institutes. They shared some key characteristics, including the wearing of a religious habit as a visible sign of identity, significant time reserved for daily prayer, and an emphasis on fraternal and community life.

“Far from the kind of dispersion that was widespread after the council, they are taking great care to promote cohesion of the religious community,” he said.

“The pendulum is swinging from, shall we say, a secularist euphoria back toward a certain severity. But note that this is not an imposed severity — these young people want it and demand it,” he said.

Expanding horizons

Another positive sign that’s receiving considerable Vatican attention is the growth of lay movements, many of which are tied to religious orders for their spiritual formation.

For example, the Legionaries of Christ, with about 600 priests, has a companion lay movement of more than 60,000 men, women and families.

This type of lay-religious cooperation is not entirely new in the church, but there’s been a significant flowering in recent years, Archbishop Rode said.

“They are attracting a lot of people. They are really mass movements that grow through spontaneous communication and the enthusiasm of their members,” he said.

An associated phenomenon is the birth of new forms of religious life, institutes whose various branches may include men who are ordained, men who take vows, women who take vows and families. So far, six of these institutes have received pontifical approval, Archbishop Rode said.

The form is so new that the Vatican is not sure which department should oversee them — Archbishop Rode’s congregation or the Pontifical Council for the Laity; most likely, an interdepartmental commission will have to be created.

“All this demonstrates the great vitality of the Catholic Church. New things are continually springing forth,” he said.

Archbishop Franc Rode, prefect of the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life, speaks Sept. 27 during a symposium on consecrated life at the Vatican. Archbishop Rode said that Pope Benedict XVI is seeking to revitalize the faith life of the church and that this must begin with the world’s religious orders taking stock and recovering their “apostolic dynamism.”

Archbishop Rode was named prefect of the congregation in 2004. He heads a staff of 40 people, most of them men and women religious, who closely follow the life and work of religious institutes on every continent.

The archbishop said the global picture of religious life is quite diverse. In Western Europe, the United States and Canada, the statistics are frankly depressing, he said.

In Canada, for example, he said it is “mathematically certain” that, if things do not change, by the year 2040 the majority of existing religious congregations will disappear. He said that would be a shame, considering the important role of religious orders in Canada’s history.

To illustrate the situation in the United States, the archbishop pointed to the two conferences of women’s major superiors — the Council of Major Superiors of Women Religious, considered more traditional, and the Leadership Conference of Women Religious, which he said “goes more in the direction of secularization.”

The archbishop said that, according to the information reaching him, the more traditional council accounts for the vast majority of new vocations, although their membership comprises only 10 percent of the women religious in the United States.

He said the real increases in religious vocations are coming in the Third World, as “Catholicism moves toward the South and toward the East.”

Asia has enjoyed a boom in vocations, up about 40 percent in recent years, he said.

If China loosens restrictions on church activity, that number could skyrocket, he said.

Among religious orders, he said, “everyone is more or less preparing for this, either in neighboring countries or already inside China.”

“Certainly the church is aware that it wants to be ready for the day China opens up. The church is awaiting this moment and preparing for it,” he said.

Archbishop Rode said Africa has witnessed a tremendous increase in religious vocations, but with the higher numbers have come “huge problems.” At present, the Vatican is carefully studying the situation there.

“The error, if one can speak of error, is that we simply transported our structures of formation and programs of study to Africa. But they are not appropriate to the situation in Africa, to the African person,” he said.

He said it was not that Africans were less suitable for religious vocations, but that formation needs to be tailored to the cultural, economic and psychological situation of Africans.

Ongoing challenges

Across the globe, Archbishop Rode said, the challenge facing religious orders is to move away from relativist and secularist currents toward greater “evangelical authenticity.”

He said this means rejecting misinterpretations of Vatican II, as Pope Benedict said in his talk to Roman Curia officials in December.

Above all, religious must not understand the council as “an invitation to go uncritically toward the world,” the archbishop said.

He said education remains an important field for religious. The shrinking of some religious orders and the loss of their teaching apostolate has had severe repercussions, he said.

In France, for example, for centuries the country’s leaders typically passed through church-run schools and thus had familiarity and at least cultural appreciation of the faith.

“Today we see the emergence of a generation of politicians or cultural leaders who are completely ignorant of the Christian tradition,” Archbishop Rode said.

He said that while it is unlikely that older religious orders can return to teaching on a large scale, he thinks some of the new congregations and institutes will recognize the importance of education and make it their primary field of activity.

Israel-Palestine peace still possible, U.S. religious leaders say

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Clergy representing different branches of Christianity, Judaism and Islam at a Feb. 28 press conference reiterated a message they have delivered before: They believe peace can be achieved between Israel and Palestine, even now with the victory of the militant Islamic group Hamas in January's Palestinian parliamentary elections.

In a Feb. 13 letter to President George W. Bush, the clergy, who are members of the National Interreligious Leadership Initiative for Peace in the Middle East, urged Bush to "let Palestinians and Israelis know now that, following the formation of their new governments, you and your administration will work with determination and urgency to achieve peace."

Following the press conference, some members of the clergy group, including Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick of Washington, met with Karen Hughes, undersecretary of state for public diplomacy and public affairs, to press their case.

Cardinal McCarrick told Catholic News Service the next day that the interfaith group "made our point" in a brief, cordial meeting with Hughes. "We asked them to stay with the 'road map,'" he said. "Now is not the time to let go."

The road map, supported by the religious leaders, calls for a "permanent, two-state solution" to reach an Israeli-Palestinian peace. The road map, developed in 2002, was to be monitored by the United States, the United Nations, the European Community and Russia.

Its phases include: ending terror and violence and normalizing Palestinian life; making the transition to an independent Palestinian state; and reaching an agreement on permanent status for Palestine and ending Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The original timeline had all of the phases completed by 2005.

"Things have changed in the Holy Land, but that's all the more reason to stay with the road map," Cardinal McCarrick told CNS March 1.

The group also sent letters to each member of Congress Feb. 15, noting that the clergy had urged the Bush administration, among other things, to "press for an immediate, comprehensive and lasting cease-fire" and "appoint an on-the-ground special envoy to manage and monitor negotiations."

They added the religious leaders were "committed to work with their congregations across the country to urge bipartisan congressional support" for "active, fair and firm U.S. leadership for Israeli-Palestinian peace."

POPULATION OF THE HOLY LAND

The total population in the Holy Land, including the West Bank and Gaza, is approximately 8.6 million.

- 4.7 million are Israeli
- 3.9 million are Muslim
- 150,000-160,000 are Christian

In the 1950s, Christians represented 25 percent of the population. Today, Christians account for less than 2 percent.

Christians in Jerusalem:

- In 1944: 29,000 Christians.
- In 1967: 13,000 Christians.
- In 2003: fewer than 10,000 Christians among a population of 600,000 people

Bethlehem: In the late 1960s, 80 percent of the population was Christian and 20 percent was Muslim. Today, it is 91 percent Muslim and 9 percent Christian.

Ramallah: In the 1970s, the Christian population was 60,000. Today it is fewer than 5,000.

Church leaders predict that if the current exodus continues, Christianity could easily cease to exist in the Holy Land within 60 years.

FOREIGN IMMIGRANTS:

In 2002, 200,000 foreign workers replaced Palestinians who were kept from their places of employment by strict city and border "closures."

Palestinian workers average 8-9 dependents. The loss of employment for Palestinians because of foreign immigrant workers, thereby affects approximately 1 million people.

Palestinian Christian minority living in the Holy Land. He spoke to congregations at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte Feb. 18-19.

Approximately 150,000 Christians currently live in the Holy Land. Only 11,000 Christians live in Jerusalem, a city of more than 600,000 citizens.

"Holy Land" is a religious term for the region east of the Mediterranean Sea that is sacred, in varying degrees, to Christianity, Judaism and Islam. Geographically, it corresponds to the modern state of Israel, and the Palestinian and occupied territories.

Christians living in the area that was known in biblical times as Palestine are known as Palestinian Christians.

"In 1900, 13.2 percent of the population in the Holy Land was Christian," Father Vasko said. "Today it's less than two percent in Israel, including the West Bank and Gaza."

Thirty-five years ago, the population of Bethlehem was 80 percent Christian and 20 percent Muslim. Today, the city of Christ's birth is 91 percent Muslim and nine percent Christian.

For these Christians trapped in a hostile environment of ethnic distrust, the Franciscan foundation is the only organized voice for justice and positive change, said Father Vasko.

No reason to stay

According to the foundation's Web site, inadequate housing, high unemployment and greatly reduced educational opportunities are causing widespread suffering and a mass exodus of the Christian population from the Holy Land.

The goal of the foundation is to raise $30 million to create job opportunities for Christians by providing training for positions in schools, churches, parish centers and medical facilities; and by providing academic scholarships for talented but underprivileged Christian students.

As of December 2002, the foundation has given more than 60 scholarships and four educational grants amounting to $1 million.

The foundation is also building 500 subsidized housing units for Christian families and restoring the tomb of Jesus in the Church of the Holy Sepulcher in Jerusalem.

the rosary for peace in the Middle East at 2003. Father Vasko is the president of the whose is to safeguard the basic human rights of the Holy Land.

Caught in the middle

For the last 40 years, Palestinian Christians have been caught in the middle of an intense religious and ethnic power struggle.

"The Israeli government looks upon them as Palestinians, therefore the enemy," Father Vasko said. "To Muslims, they're traitors and pro-West."

The United States provides aid money to the Israeli government and to the Palestinian Authority, but none of this money goes to Palestinian Christians, Father Vasko said.

"They have no major resources or organizations helping them, and they are the ones who are leaving," he said. "We're trying to provide motivations and incentives for our young Christians to stay."

More hardships were inflicted on all

Palestinians with the construction of the 480-mile barrier across Israel. Although it was built to keep both Israelis and Palestinians safe, 320,000 people lost their jobs because they can no longer cross the border to their jobs into major cities. A great many of those affected are Christian, said Father Vasko.

A relative peace

Despite persistent violence throughout much of the Middle East, Father Vasko said members of the three faiths — Judaism, Christianity and Islam — live in relative peace in the Holy Land.

"There really is no persecution of one religion against the other," Father Vasko said.

Rather, the violence is politically based.

"The political situation has polarized the people against one another," he said. "If we don't do something soon, we could have no one visiting our religious monuments and museums or worshipping at our churches."

Father Vasko said that, despite what people might read and see in the news, it is quite safe to visit the Holy Land.

"All the holy sites of Christendom are in East Jerusalem," he said. The attacks that do take place occur in the Jewish section of West Jerusalem.

"When you go on pilgrimage, you're coming to seek the Lord," said Father Vasko. "I've led pilgrimages in the Holy Land for 21 years, and there's never been even one pilgrim who has been the victim of an attack."

Father Vasko said the Catholics of North Carolina can help Palestinian Christians by praying for peace among the three religions of the Holy Land.

Christians in the Holy Land need to know that their western counterparts care about what happens to them, Father Vasko said.

"Palestinian Christians feel invisible to the West," said Father Vasko. "By coming to the Holy Land, you're giving them economic and moral support."

THE HOLY LAND

ECONOMICS:

- The politically motivated "closures" of the West Bank and Gaza to the remainder of Israel have a strong negative impact on the Palestinian economy. Millions of dollars in revenue are lost every day within the West Bank and Gaza because Israel controls all the borders and prevents imports or exports from coming into or going out of these regions.
- In 2002, unemployment among Palestinians, largely due to forced closures and travel restrictions enacted by the Israeli government, reached 60 percent in Gaza and 50 percent in the West Bank.
- The average income for Israelis in the Holy Land is $25,000-$26,000 per year.
- The average income for Palestinians in the Holy Land is $4,000-$6,000 per year.
- The majority of Palestinians live in the West Bank and East Jerusalem.
- Most of the Christians living in the Holy Land are of Palestinian descent. Though they are blameless bystanders to the Muslim-Israeli conflict, Palestinian Christians are severely handicapped by the political side effects of aggression on both sides. The fact that there are currently thousands of Christians in the Holy Land whose way of life is threatened is not commonly known in the United States and Western countries.
- 65 percent of Palestinians live below the poverty level, i.e. under $3,000 per year, affecting two out of three Palestinians, of which three percent are Christian.
- Currently, 50 percent of Palestinian men and 85 percent of Palestinian women are unemployed.

FOREIGN AID:

- Israel received $6 billion in foreign aid in 2001 ($3 billion in foreign aid and $3 billion in additional U.S. government assistance in public and private sectors). This total breaks down into $15.5 million per day, 365 days a year.
- In 2001-2002 the Palestinian Authority received international aid total in $2.1 billion. None of this aid reaches the outnumbered and previously unspoken-for Christian minority population.

Minnesota teen's book aims to give voice to Muslim women

BY CHRISTINA CAPECCHI
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ST. PAUL, Minn. — In February 2005, when most teen girls were hoping for roses or chocolates, 17-year-old Chiara Kovarik received her dream valentine: the acceptance of her book manuscript by a Minneapolis publishing company.

The teen stands out from her peers in many ways, including the subject she chose to explore in her 174-page book, "Interviews With Muslim Women of Pakistan."

"Most young adult books focus on teen body image or dating tips," Kovarik said.

Her book offers a fresh perspective on a nation that became a partner in the war on terror.

Kovarik, a senior at Convent of the Visitation School in Mendota Heights, spent a month in Pakistan in the summer 2001. The then-13-year-old found herself fascinated by the Muslim women she encountered.

"I'd gone with the typical ideas that the women were oppressed and they're all covered up and they don't have the right to speak, and I was finding that a lot of those previous notions I had were not true, or at least were a bit skewed in the way they had been presented to me," said Kovarik.

Kovarik, a parishioner of St. John Neumann Church in Eagan, wanted to correct misconceptions about the Muslim women and to amplify their voices. Thus began the challenging process of conducting interviews.

Many women declined Kovarik's interview request, and even after some agreed, she still had to obtain an OK from a male relative in each case. More than half of the men said no.

But despite obstacles, Kovarik persisted, eventually setting up 10 interviews.

There was still a language barrier to surmount, as well as some of the men insisting upon being present to answer for the women or dismiss their responses. But with a translator and plenty of patience, Kovarik gathered the information she wanted.

She asked the women 10 questions, including how their lives differed from their mothers' and grandmothers'. Today, Muslim women have significantly better medical and educational access and more jobs, Kovarik learned.

She also asked about the women's priorities, a tough question to raise because it was so personal. Every woman ranked religion as No. 1, with family and friends coming second.

Kovarik also asked the women how they felt about being Muslim, being women and their expected gender roles.

"None expressed regrets," she said. "Many said they didn't feel oppressed, although they did realize that more changes need to occur regarding women's rights. They were very optimistic that things would improve, at least for their children's generation."

The Muslim women in turn asked Kovarik about her Catholic faith and her life as an American teen. The younger ones inquired about American dating norms.

"Some seemed to think that all the women in the United States are like Paris Hilton," Kovarik said. "I tried to convince them that we're not like that at all."

Of course, she understood that the stereotype came from TV, confirming a lesson both she and the Muslim women learned: One must seek sources outside the media for the whole story.

Just weeks after Kovarik returned from Pakistan, the Sept. 11 attacks occurred, heightening the significance of the teen's interviews. She contacted every Muslim woman again, asking about the impact of terrorism on them.

"They were as shocked and horrified as we were," Kovarik said. "They kept stressing that Islam does not in any way condone the terrorists' actions, and they really wanted people to know that."

Though her endeavor began as an intellectual one, it became spiritual in nature, too. "Seeing how these women integrate their faith made me want to stimulate my faith," she said.

Kovarik hopes her book will compel readers to strive for something she has been practicing.

"These women have taught me that you really can't judge a book by the cover. You have to dig deeper," she said.

Sacrilege won't defeat message, power of Jesus

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Some weeks ago the news was rife with incidents of sacrilege — specifically in the Muslim world where Iraq's rival Shiite and Sunni sects traded destructive attacks on one another's mosques. This occurred just days after scores died in rioting over what many considered blasphemous cartoon depictions of the prophet Muhammad.

The Christian world witnessed a string of church burnings in Alabama. At a university near where I live, some students were up in arms over a disrespectful characterization of Jesus-at-college in a comic strip in an online campus magazine.

These aren't new trends. Years ago there was an uproar over a famously unflattering portrayal of the crucifixion in a publicly funded artistic work, and

Jesus was satirized on "Saturday Night Live" and, some thought, cast in a not-so-divine light in the book and movie "The Last Temptation of Christ."

People of faith tend to be offended — and many are moved to action — when their God is profaned or treated with irreverence.

Today's Gospel suggests that Jesus, too, reacted strongly to such shameful treatment of the sacred. He drove the salespeople and money changers out of the temple with an admonition against destroying its holy purpose by making it a marketplace.

Jesus' action tells us how he views the exploitation and misuse of the places where God dwells, which one assumes would include the poor and oppressed as well as other human "temples."

We should share his zeal for these temples by showing respect for God's presence there. But this passage reminds me of a remark I heard a bishop make once in a private conversation.

"I always hate to hear the stories of someone going into a burning church to rescue the Blessed Sacrament," he said. "They're going to save Jesus? From what?"

Destroy the temple, vandalize the holy places and symbols, mock his name and message, even exploit God's beloved people — the damage won't hold. Jesus won't die; he won't stay down.

He always will rise, and the fact that he will rise up for our sake demands respect and awe. But we should remember that Jesus saves us — we don't save him.

This 'Shaggy' is for the dogs

Tim Allen stars in "The Shaggy Dog," a lame reworking of the 1959 Disney comedy, incorporating elements of its 1976 follow-up, about a workaholic Los Angeles deputy district attorney (Allen) who, while trying a case involving a sinister scientist (Robert Downey Jr.), is bitten by a mutt and soon finds himself turning into one. This leads to nutty canine complications with his neglected wife (Kristin Davis) and two teenage children.

Even Allen's comic dexterity can't make this dog of a film hunt, resulting in slapstick silliness that is strictly for the pups.

CCC offers Lenten retreats in English, Spanish on radio

WASHINGTON (CNS) — For people too busy to go on a Lenten retreat, they may want to take their retreat via the radio or the Internet.

Franciscan Radio developed a series of six half-hour programs in English and six in Spanish for the Catholic Communication Campaign, the U.S. bishops' mass-media ministry that develops media programming, projects and resources.

The CCC has made the retreat programs available to radio stations, but for those who cannot find the programs on their local stations, the series is also available on the Web at: www.radioretreat.org.

The programs, hosted by Elia Castillo, feature a bishop as a retreat guide and homilist. Different bishops were lined up for each of the English and Spanish programs, except for the Third Sunday of Lent, when Bishop Gerald R. Barnes of San Bernardino, Calif., is to deliver both the English and Spanish homilies.

Each show features a sung version of the Our Father, a song for meditations and a question-and-answer segment with the bishop on his homily theme, plus a wrap-up from host Castillo and a blessing from the bishop.

The first of the programs was to be available both over the air and on the Web Ash Wednesday, March 1. The Web site will have retreat programs archived for retreatants to catch up on any individual programs they missed.

The Web site will contain descriptions of each program, background information on the bishops, and links to other Lenten spiritual resources. The programs can be downloaded as MP3 files for podcast or personal use.

Pat Ryan Garcia, executive producer and CCC director of distribution, said the idea for the radio retreats was sparked by U.S. Archbishop John P. Foley, head of the Pontifical Council for Social Communications.

In 2004, in an address to the U.S. bishops' communications committee, "Archbishop Foley suggested ways of outreach and evangelization that might take advantage of the increased interest in using the media for spiritual assistance, including radio retreats," Garcia said in a statement.

John Feister, Franciscan Radio's coordinator of the project, said in a statement, "The English and Spanish versions are culturally tuned for their audience. ... We think this is inspiring programming for any radio station that seeks an uplifting message for the weeks before Easter."

Franciscan Radio is a ministry of the Franciscans and St. Anthony Messenger Press.

FROM THE COVER

Deacons recommit to ministry

to renew our ordination vows," said Deacon Andrew Cilone, director of deacons for the Hickory region and permanent deacon at Immaculate Conception Church in Forest City.

In the Catholic Church, the diaconate is the first of three ranks in ordained ministry. From about the fifth century until the Second Vatican Council in the 1960s, it was used in the Latin rite almost exclusively to describe the final stage in preparation for ordination to the priesthood.

The council decreed that the diaconate also could be restored as a permanent and separate rank in the Latin rite and that married men may be ordained to this rank. Pope Paul VI restored the permanent diaconate in 1967.

Like the diocesan priests, who recommit themselves to the bishop at the chrism Mass during Holy Week each year, the permanent deacons gather for a similar recommitment Mass.

"This comes at an appropriate time during the Lenten season, when we are renewing our spiritual life as well," said Deacon Cilone. "At the same time, we are renewing our own profession of faith that we accepted at baptism to reject Satan and all his empty promises."

In his homily, Bishop Jugis likened the deacons' call to ministry to the call of the first disciples from their positions in the marketplace.

"Follow me' is the summons of Lent ... a command to draw close to him and he will draw close to you ... in order to turn us from sin," said Bishop Jugis. "Follow me' is also spoken to all of us in the ordained ministry. Jesus is the love of our life, the joy of our soul, who must be followed willingly."

"Where the Lord is, there we also will be," said the bishop. "I thank all deacons for being where the Lord is. I thank your families for helping make your ordained ministry shine."

Because Christ chose to identify himself with sinners, said Bishop Jugis, "salvation is the primary mission of the church ... to help our brothers and sisters come to eternal life."

This mission of salvation is helped through the deacons' ministry at the altar, he said, where the "food of salvation, the body and blood of Jesus Christ, is given to hungry souls."

"The Eucharist is the life of the parish ... the life of the church, which animates everything else," said Bishop Jugis. "May the Lord make your ministry shine with the light of the risen Christ."

"For me, Lent is a time for sinners. It is a new beginning, a recommitment to the bishop, and a time for renewal," said Deacon David King, permanent deacon at Our Lady of the Highways Church in Thomasville.

"The Catholic Church gives us this time every year to renew and recommit ourselves," said Deacon King. "For this, I am grateful."

Our plugged-in pope

Holy Father, and all Catholics, can use technology to enhance faith

A small news item from Catholic News Service caught my eye this week. Pope Benedict XVI has an iPod.

To be precise, it is an iPod nano with two gigabytes of memory. It was presented to him as a gift from Vatican Radio. The pontiff recently visited the broadcasting headquarters of the Vatican for the first time.

If the Holy Father is like most people who purchase these pencil-thin devices, he will soon be a regular listener. Why? Because iPods give you exactly what you want to listen to, when you want to listen to it.

The device makes everyone a radio programmer and, while that may be bad news for real radio programmers, it is liberation for the rest of us.

Originally introduced as a music listening device and marketed primarily to young people, the iPod and MP3 players have branched out to create a new broadcasting domain — podcasting. Podcasting is like Internet blogging, except that instead of the written word published for the entire world to find, podcasting uses the spoken word, delivered regularly to subscribers.

A podcast can be a radio program without the commercials, a talk show, a commentary or anything else the creator cares to record. There are tens of thousands of podcasts to choose from and hundreds that are specifically for Catholics.

Nearly all of them are free. That may change as some programs become very popular, but for now there is a cornucopia of free programs.

Imagine driving to work and, instead of listening to an endless barrage of screaming car dealer commercials, you could choose prayer podcasts, a program that explains our faith or perhaps the latest sacred music.

In the iTunes store, there are currently 24 free programs that can be found when using the search term "Vatican." You can even listen to the podcast version of this column by using the search term "Catholics and the Media." Suddenly, the morning commute could be something you look forward to.

What does the Holy Father listen to? The pope's player was loaded with a sampling of the Vatican radio's programming in English, Italian and German, and musical compositions by Ludwig van Beethoven, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Frederic Chopin, Peter Tchaikovsky and Igor Stravinsky.

Once the pontiff gets the hang of using the click wheel on his iPod, he can listen to a radio drama of the life of St. Thomas Becket or a perspective program on the transition from Pope John Paul II to Pope Benedict XVI. He doesn't have to tune in at a certain time to hear what he wants; he can pause a program, and replay all or part of it.

Catholics & the Media

GUEST COLUMNIST

Podcasting is a threat to traditional forms of radio programming because of its accessibility. These iPod-type devices are updated by plugging them into a personal computer. Once connected, the device does the rest, updating itself with new music selections and podcasts.

Podcast creators use an Internet protocol named RSS (Really Simple Synchronization) that lets the device automatically find and download programs the user has subscribed to. And although iPods and MP3 players are small in size, they typically hold hundreds of hours of music, podcasts and audio books.

Online articles about podcasting indicate that advertisers are trying to figure out a way to insert ads into podcasts. No doubt some content will eventually carry ads, but since virtually anyone can create a podcast, the majority probably will not.

When he was given the iPod, Pope Benedict is reported to have said, "Computer technology is the future."

The Holy Father, and anyone else, can hear the future now thanks to these personal listening devices.

An anniversary not worth repeating

Different approach needed for Iraq war

March 19 marks the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq. Unless there is a monumental shift in American policy toward that suffering nation, there will be a fourth anniversary — and many more beyond.

And such a shift seems highly unlikely now.

The war goes on — with no end in sight. Europe had its 30-years war, and now the United States is on a devastatingly similar track.

The great number of deaths related to the war prove that Pope John Paul II was correct in objecting to the U.S. decision to launch a pre-emptive attack against Iraq. As he wisely said, "War is a defeat for humanity."

The American presence in Iraq seems to fuel the conflict. It's like pouring gasoline on a house fire.

There is a military principle that says, "If you find yourself in a hole, stop digging." As if reflecting on that rule, Lt. Gen. William E. Odom recently wrote that the United States should withdraw rapidly from Iraq.

The retired general and current Yale University professor wrote:

"Iraqis are already fighting Iraqis. Insurgents have killed far more Iraqis than Americans. That's civil war. We created the civil war when we invaded; we can't prevent a civil war by staying."

"For those who really worry about destabilizing the region, the sensible policy is not to stay the course in Iraq."

Dave Robinson, executive director of the Catholic peace movement Pax Christi USA, told me that the Bush administration has not stated clearly that it intends to completely leave Iraq. Robinson explained that we have at least five long-term military bases there.

Making a Difference

TONY
CNS COLUMNIST

Robinson said the Bush administration's plan is to "maintain Western control over Iraqi oil production and distribution. Instead, however, the United States needs to declare that it intends to totally leave Iraq — including all military bases."

Robinson added that since the president refuses to make such a declaration, it is up to the American people to pressure Congress.

But a total military departure does not absolve America from its moral obligation to rebuild Iraq.

"The United States needs to commit to a type of Marshall Plan," said Robinson.

However, relatively little cash thus far actually has gone into reconstruction, he added.

Commenting on the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' call for a nationwide "serious and civil dialogue" on Iraq, Robinson said, "Such a dialogue would require every priest in every parish to proclaim the Gospel of peace. And in the light of Catholic social teaching, it would be necessary for them to lead discussions around different approaches to the Iraq war."

Amen to that.

Letter to the Editor

Pro-life articles deliver powerful messages

Two articles from your March 3 edition struck me as delivering powerful messages.

Mary Shaw moves me with her story of love ("Young woman chooses life, adoption for child"). The private details that explain her unplanned pregnancy and her journey through her open adoption show spiritual maturity, authentic love and, above all, humility.

In "Pope says God loves humans in all stages of life, even embryos," Pope Benedict XVI said life is sacred "... even before it is implanted in the maternal womb." At one time, I did not know the implications of such a statement. I fear many Americans and Catholics don't either.

Life is fundamental — a foundation on which everything else hinges. With renewed respect and love for the Catholic Church, the teacher of these truths, my husband and I tried natural family planning and have never looked backed.

The forgotten victim

'Abortionists' need forgiveness, healing

Abortion destroys everyone it touches, killing a child and devastating that child's family. Often overlooked, however, is the one who performed the procedure. The abortionist is wounded, too.

Every year, on March 10, pro-abortion groups observe the "National Day of Appreciation for Abortion Providers." They seek to affirm those who kill babies for pay, and honor them as hero-servants of society.

I am happy to announce that this year, Priests for Life has declared March 9 a National Day of Invitation to Abortion Providers — an invitation to repentance and to the healing grace of the Lord.

We invite people to read the testimonies of abortionists who have converted (see www.priestsforlife.org) and to write letters and make calls to media outlets in order to share these stories. It is precisely because we appreciate these people that we want to free them from the misery of being abortionists.

I'd like to explore in the next several columns the topic of abortionists, why they do what they do, what life is like for them and how we can call them to conversion.

Let me address some preliminary issues.

First of all, the abortion movement chose March 10 for this "Day of

Guest Column

FATHER FRANK PAVONE

Appreciation" because that was the date in 1993 when abortionist David Gunn was shot and killed outside his abortion mill in Pensacola, Fla. Killing abortionists is a course of action we reject.

Secondly, some object to using the word "abortionist," saying such a term is harsh and cruel. That's odd.

Someone who practices psychology is called a "psychologist." Someone who practices therapy is called a "therapist." And one trained in gynecology is a "gynecologist." I fail to see the problem with calling someone who performs abortions an "abortionist."

If people are uncomfortable with the word, maybe their consciences are telling them there's something wrong with the practice — and with that, we heartily agree.

Third, if we call an abortionist a "victim," we do not mean to say that he or she is helpless or guiltless. We are all responsible for our actions and have to be held accountable. The point here is that abortionists hurt themselves by their actions, throwing their lives into chaos.

Finally, I write about abortionists from the perspective of having conversed with many of them who are still performing abortions, and having guided many of them through spiritual healing after they have stopped performing abortions.

We collaborate and interact with psychiatrists and others who are doing unique research into the lives of abortionists. Moreover, Priests for Life has access to a lot of inside information from the abortion industry, including information gained by infiltration. We rely on original, and often unique, sources.

The more we can understand why someone, especially if he or she is associated with the medical profession, would perform abortions, and the more we can understand what would cause them to stop performing abortions, the closer we will be to understanding how our whole society can reject this violent practice.

Frank Pavone is national director of Priests for Life.

Pope says prayer, repentance, retreat can strengthen faith

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Editor's note: Due to the pope's weeklong Lenten retreat, there is no story from his weekly audience.

VATICAN CITY — As he prepared to begin his weeklong Lenten retreat, Pope Benedict XVI said Lent is a time to examine one's life in an atmosphere of prayer and repentance.

Citing the ancient Israelites who wandered in the desert and Jesus who retreated to the desert before beginning his public ministry, the pope said a period of withdrawal and face-to-face confrontation with temptation strengthens one's faith.

Before leading the midday Angelus address March 5, the pope said his March 5-11 Lenten retreat "will help me and my collaborators in the Roman Curia to enter into this characteristic Lenten climate with greater awareness."

Meditating on biblical desert scenes, he said, "We understand that in order to fully realize our lives in freedom, the trial that freedom itself brings, that is, temptation, must be overcome."

"Only freed from the slavery of falsehood and sin thanks to obedience to the faith that opens him to the truth can the human person find the full meaning of his existence and obtain peace, love and joy," the pope said.

He asked Catholics to pray for him and top Vatican officials while they were on retreat, and he promised to keep everyone in his own prayers.

The retreat, which includes formal prayer, spiritual lectures and eucharistic adoration, includes morning and late-afternoon sessions.

Pope Benedict asked 80-year-old retired Cardinal Marco Ce of Venice, Italy, to preach the retreat.

The cardinal chose to use the Gospel of Mark as the basis for his series of talks on "Walking Toward Easter With Jesus."

Cardinal Ce said he chose the Gospel of Mark in part because it is known as "a guide for catechumens preparing for baptism at the Easter Vigil."

The central message of his talks, he said, "is the message of Easter: God loves our world and wants to save it through the death and resurrection of Jesus."

"I want to give everyone a message of hope," the cardinal said.

Cardinal Ce said the Lenten practices of prayer, fasting and almsgiving "are three works capable of forming a lifestyle that can change the world."

A bishop's coat of arms

Q. Why do bishops still need a coat of arms? Is it a holdover from the days bishops had temporal, civil power? (Wisconsin)

A. Episcopal coats of arms are, at least in part, a vestige of a custom that began in a militaristic, political context.

Insignia on military dress and equipment became customary in the 12th century. When warriors of all sides wore pretty much the same armor, the king's or leader's emblem served to distinguish one combatant from another.

Soon the blazon design appeared also on seals, for example, as evidence of authenticity of documents.

As you note, Catholic prelates, who often held political and religious as well as military authority, adopted the use of coats of arms and related seals, but not only for their value in battle.

Prelatical coats of arms served to indicate episcopal status and ecclesiastical approval for such things as books, vestments and church buildings. Gradually they also served as designs in architecture and other art forms.

The number and color of tassels on the "shields" denote the prelate's rank as bishop, archbishop or cardinal.

Coats of arms, whether for Catholic or secular use, have a complex history, going through numerous evolutions. As the New Catholic Encyclopedia notes, however, after nine centuries of existence ecclesiastical heraldry is alive and will continue flourishing.

Whatever its origins, apart from the decorative attractiveness, its function today is primarily juridical.

The white cloth atop caskets

Q. Our family would like to know why a white cloth is placed on top of the casket at a funeral Mass. I told them that when our Lord was taken from the cross and laid in the grave, his body was wrapped with a white cloth. Is this the reason? (Maryland)

A. That may be one interpretation, but the primary reason has to do with baptism. When the deceased Catholic was baptized as an infant or adult, water was poured, of course, and a white cloth or dress was placed on him or her.

The ritual with the cloth is inspired by the words of St. Paul, "For all you who were baptized into Christ have clothed yourselves with Christ" (Gal 3:27).

Ceremonies at the beginning of the funeral liturgy are intended to recall that event, which begins our Christian life, to thank God for his goodness and to remind everyone present of our own baptism commitments as we continue our journey.

The words suggested to accompany these rites focus on this meaning.

As the water is sprinkled on the casket, the priest says, "In the waters of baptism (this man or woman) died with Christ and rose with him to new life. May he/she now share with him eternal glory."

As the pall is placed over the body, the ritual has suggested words like this: "On the day of baptism, he/she put on Christ. In the day of Christ's coming, may he/she be clothed with glory."

Holy Redeemer parish is small in number, large in spirit

ANDREWS — While Holy Redeemer Church in Andrews wasn't built until 1962, Catholic presence in the area dates back decades earlier.

In 1937, Father Howard Lane, a priest from the Diocese of Raleigh, was appointed pastor of St. John the Evangelist Church in Waynesville. At that time the parish boundaries included all of North Carolina west of the town.

Father Lane led a lecture series at the Murphy courthouse feeding the spiritual hunger of area Catholics.

Following Father Lane's brief series of talks, there wasn't another regular pastoral presence in the region until Glenmary Father Joseph Dean arrived in Murphy in December 1954.

There were eight Catholic families living in Murphy in Cherokee County during the time of Father Lane's presence. Just two Catholic families lived in neighboring Clay County, with one Maronite Catholic family living in Andrews. It was in the home of those Maronite Catholics, the El-Khouris, who had no Eastern-rite priest to celebrate Mass for them, that a new Catholic community was born.

Father Lane returned to Andrews in 1955 and celebrated Mass for the first time in Andrews on Christmas Day in the El-Khouris family home. Within a few years, Andrews had officially become a mission of Murphy, although regularly celebrated Masses didn't occur in Andrews until 1958.

In June 1962, the Catholic community of Andrews gathered for the first time in their new church. Called Holy Redeemer Church, the building was the first large project completed by the Glenmary Brothers' Building Crew.

status in June 1976, and installed Father August Guppenberger as the first pastor.

While the year-round Catholic population in the Andrews area has grown slowly over the past quarter-century, visitors to the North Carolina mountains fill Holy Redeemer Church to capacity during the tourist seasons.

The parish celebrated its silver jubilee in June 1987. Taking part in a diocesan evangelization project, the Legion of Mary came to Andrews to help celebrate by leading a community education program focusing on ecumenism.

In 2002, Glenmary Father Robert Bond retired and diocesan clergy assumed pastoral duties of Holy Redeemer Church. This signaled the end of an era, as there are no longer any parishes in the diocese staffed by Glenmary priests.

On Oct. 15, 2004, Father Michael Kottar was assigned as the first diocesan pastor of the church.

To accommodate the rapid growth in the local Hispanic population, a Sunday Mass and other sacraments are now offered in Spanish. The celebration of traditional Hispanic customs, such as the feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe and Las Posadas (Christmas novena), have added a new dimension to parish life.

"Growth at the Spanish Mass has increased to the point where at times it exceeds the population of the Mass in English," said Father Kottar.

The clergy and parishioners of Holy Redeemer Church are active in community and ecumenical events and projects, taking leadership roles in founding a food bank for the poor, a shelter for local and migrant persons and an organization to help those people with mental handicaps find employment.

The parish also supports Divine Mercy Outreach, a support group for the sick and homebound of the parish and Institution of Angel Tree, in conjunction with Catholic Social Services Western Regional office in Asheville, to provide for those in financial need at Christmas.

Spiritual life of the parish is enhanced by eucharistic adoration each Friday. Adoration on the first Friday of each month is offered for all active service members, especially those stationed in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"Although we are small in number, we are blessed in many other ways," said Father Kottar. "We have a very warm parish where everyone knows each other by name."

CHARLOTTE — America needs immigrants, and it needs to make it easier for immigrants to come to this country legally, said an official with the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

"When the faith community looks at the current state of our immigration system and the effect that current laws have on immigrants and our society at large, we conclude they are woefully inadequate and in need of significant reform," said Mark Franken, executive director of Migration and Refugee Services.

CHALMETTE, La. — Six months after Hurricane Katrina, St. Bernard's Parish, a civil entity just east of New Orleans, looked as if the hurricane just occurred.

There was no longer standing water, but the businesses, homes and shopping centers in the small towns and neighborhoods were completely in shambles.

Houses, moved by the 20 feet of water that submerged the area after storm surges toppled the levees, sat at odd angles in the streets. What were once yards contained piles of debris or uprooted trees.

QUILTING MORE THAN IT SEAMS

Growing number of fans thinks quilters' work is anything but sew-sew

TUTWILER, Miss. (CNS) — Virginia Thompson, 78, is grateful for the income she makes as one of the Tutwiler Quilters, but a deeper seam runs through her participation in a local quilt-making group.

"It's more than just a job, seems more like family to me," said Thompson as she sat quilting in her home.

Quilter Janice Mitchell, 39, said she lays out pieces of cloth for a special-order quilt, and then waits for the material to "speak to her."

"The fabric pretty much tells you what it wants to be," said Mitchell, who quilts full time. "From these pieces, I can see that red and yellow are going to have to give life to the rest of the fabric."

Thompson and Mitchell are two of the 20 women who make up the Tutwiler Quilters, organized in 1988. It is a program of the local Catholic-run education center.

Currently, the group's work, which gained national attention in 1990 when members appeared on the CBS news program "60 Minutes," was being featured in a special showing at the Rocky Mountain Quilt Museum in Golden, Colo.

The exhibit, "Improvisation: An African-American Tradition," features 20 pieces including quilts, wall hangings and table runners.

"People are thrilled with it," said Paula Pahl, the museum's executive director. "And they have been very supportive of the organization as well."

In the exhibit, Pahl said the African-American designs in the quilts, passed down from generation to generation, are emphasized.

"They are not traditional and not contemporary art quilts; it is sort of a blending of the two," she said.

Dominican Sister Joann Blomme, who works part time with the quilters, and Mary Ann Willis, assistant to the director of the education center, do quality control for the quilting program.

"I inspect the quilts and other items for the quality of sewing, the size, things like that," said Sister Blomme. "I try never to judge the design because it's that person's own artistry."

Many quilters don't consider themselves artists, said Pahl.

"But quilting is a very artistic, creative expression. They (quilters) don't think about what design elements they are using, what composition elements they are using, like a professionally trained artist does," she said. "Yet, that is exactly what they are doing."

The Colorado exhibit is not the first one for the Tutwiler Quilters, according to Sister Maureen Delaney, a Sister of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary, who helped start the quilting group back in 1988. She is the director of the education center.

Getting their work out to people is so important, said Mitchell.

"I can't keep my work. It has to go to a home in order to be really appreciated," she said. "I want someone to love it when they get it home."

Bush urges groups to bid for funding for faith-based initiatives

WASHINGTON (CNS) — President George W. Bush urged faith-based charities to bid competitively for federal funding March 9.

In a speech at a daylong National Conference on Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, Bush said progress has been made but much more needs to be done to give faith-based social service programs equal footing with secular nonprofits in federal, state and corporate grant-making.

"It used to be that groups were prohibited from receiving any federal funding whatsoever because they had a cross or a star or a crescent on the wall," Bush said. "And that's changed for the better."

He called faith-based service organizations America's "armies of compassion."

White House figures indicated that last fiscal year 10.9 percent of the federal funding for social services from seven government departments went to faith-based organizations. Grants to such organizations amounted to more than $2.1 billion out of nearly $20 billion in total grants.

Bush highlighted two other areas where his administration is trying to end funding discrimination against faith-based organizations: state and local government, and corporate philanthropy.

The president said his administration has been encouraging state and local governments to rethink their approach to social service funding, and now about 30 governors and more than 100 mayors around the country have offices handling the funding of services provided by faith-based organizations.

Bush also announced that he had just signed an executive order creating a Center for Faith-Based and Community Initiatives in the Department of Homeland Security. The center is to coordinate the department's efforts to remove regulatory, contracting and other obstacles to the participation of faith-based and community organizations in its provision of social and community services, including disaster relief.

Pope, Egyptian president discuss nuclear arms, religious tolerance

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI met Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak March 13 to discuss the situation in the Middle East, tensions surrounding Iran's nuclear program and religious tolerance in Egypt, the Vatican said.

Mubarak returned to Rome specifically to meet the pope at the end of a March 9-13 series of visits with European leaders.

Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said Pope Benedict and Mubarak spent about half an hour together and began their meeting by discussing "the good relations between the Holy See and the Arab Republic of Egypt and the situation of interreligious relations in the country."

The two spoke English and spent about 20 minutes together without aides present.

"The meeting allowed them to review themes relative to the prospects for a stable peace in the Middle East," Navarro-Valls said. "There was a profound exchange of ideas about the situation in Iraq and also a look at issues regarding the Islamic Republic of Iran."

Neither the Vatican nor the Egyptian government provided more information.

Meeting March 11 with German Chancellor Angela Merkel, Mubarak called for a nuclear-free zone in the Middle East, including Israel.

"We need to take steps to prevent the spread of atomic weapons," he said.

Throughout his European trip, Mubarak also urged the European Union to continue giving financial assistance to the Palestinian Authority, and he asked European leaders to try to convince Israel to recognize the authority's new Hamas leadership.

Hamas, he said, also must recognize Israel's right to exist and pledge to participate in the peace process.

Pope says every Christian must share love of God with others

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The first obligation of every Christian is to share with others the love of God and his promise of salvation in Jesus Christ, Pope Benedict XVI said.

The pope met March 11 with people from about 100 countries attending a conference on the 40th anniversary of the Second Vatican Council's decree on the church's missionary obligation.

Pope Benedict said the Vatican II document gave new energy to the church's missionary work, outlined the theological foundations of missionary activity and emphasized its "value and relevance in the face of global transformations and the challenges that modernity poses for preaching the Gospel."

The document reminded all Catholics that in every age they are called help others hear "the truth of the Gospel message and, in that way, open for them the way of salvation," the pope said.

The Christian vocation, he said, always includes a missionary obligation.

"The proclamation and witness of the Gospel is the first service Christians can give to each person and to all humankind, called as they are to communicate to all the love of God which was manifested fully in the one redeemer of the world, Jesus Christ."

Through Christ, "who died and rose, the provident tenderness of the Father reaches every man and woman in forms and ways that he alone knows," the pope said.

While each Christian is called to share the good news through their words and actions, he said, it is the Holy Spirit who makes Christian witness effective by transforming their lives, freeing them from sin and helping them show the world that God is love.

Pope Benedict said the church has felt it necessary in the last few years to reaffirm its belief that preaching salvation in Christ is essential because missionary activity seems to have slowed down.

The pope said it also is clear that missionary activity cannot be focused only on people in far-away lands who never have heard of Christ, but also must try to reach people who live nearby, but far from the Gospel.

The task is not easy, Pope Benedict said. It requires "patience, farsightedness, courage and humility, listening to God and carefully discerning the 'signs of the times.'"

Catholics must give what they can of their time and resources, but must recognize that the one who accomplishes everything is the Lord, he said.

FORMER POLISH COMMUNIST REGIME OFFICIAL FINED FOR INSULTING LATE POPE

WARSAW, Poland (CNS) — Poland's former communist regime spokesman has been fined for insulting Pope John Paul II in a 2002 newspaper article, in the first binding court judgment of its kind.

In a March 7 ruling, the Warsaw Appeal Court rejected a claim by former spokesman Jerzy Urban that he acted "within the bounds of free criticism" in writing the article, in which he described the late pope as a "hoary idol" and "living corpse."

The court said Polish law did not permit free speech to be cited for "violating the honor of public figures."

Urban, who gained notoriety in the 1980s as spokesman for the regime of Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski, published the front-page article, "Mobile Sado-Masochist," in his satirical weekly, Nie (No), on the first day of Pope John Paul's August 2002 visit; he urged the then 82-year-old to "die and save us all embarrassment."

In his article, the spokesman urged "all sensible people" to write to the pope, advising him to "go to bed" and "stop making a scary spectacle of himself."

Youth receives Knights' scholarship award

KERNERSVILLE — Knights of Columbus Council 8509 at Holy Cross Church in Kernersville recently presented a scholarship to a young member of the parish.

The Staddon-Cain Scholarship Award was presented to Elizabeth Ann Lawrence, a junior at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School, during a fish fry fundraising dinner March 3. Grand Knight Lance Cancro presented this year's $500 award.

The scholarship fund is to perpetuate the education of young individuals in the Catholic faith. Candidates are considered based on their academic achievements as well as community- and church-related accomplishments.

Elizabeth's activities include volunteering with Habitat for Humanity, Special Olympics and the Columbiettes, the Knights' sister organization. She is also an active member of Holy Cross Church's youth group.

The Staddon-Cain scholarship is named after John Staddon and Frank Cain, two men who married Catholic wives and supported the Catholic Church and its teachings.

The annual award was first presented by the Knights in 1987.

Sisters of St. Francis vote to conserve farmland

Decisions, leadership established during assembly

TIFFIN, Ohio — Sisters of St. Francis from the Diocese of Charlotte recently participated in their congregation's general assembly.

During the assembly at the motherhouse in Tiffin, Ohio Feb. 5-11, the sisters voted to place 396 acres of their property's farm and woodland into a land conservation easement.

After nearly six years of study and community dialogue, the Sisters decided to protect the land originally purchased between 1869 and 1879 by the congregation's co-founder, Father Joseph Bihn.

"Our community began in 1869 out of a need at that time to care for the elderly and the orphans in the area around Tiffin," said Franciscan Sister Andrea Inkrott, director of Hispanic ministry for the Diocese of Charlotte.

Sister Inkrott and Franciscan Sister Joan Ann Gilsdorf, who works at the Franciscan discernment house in Charlotte, attended the assembly from the Diocese of Charlotte.

Under the land conservation easement, the land will continue to be farmed and the woodlands and wetlands will be preserved from significant building projects.

The farm was established in 2005 to grow and sell vegetables free of chemicals.

The land conservation was one of several decisions made during the assembly, including electing new leadership to serve until 2010.

'A magnet of hope'

Dominicans anchor French Quarter revival

BY THERESA LAURENCE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW ORLEANS — Nestled in the heart of the famously rowdy French Quarter of New Orleans is an oasis of learning and discipline, run by Dominican nuns from a congregation based in Nashville, Tenn., and catering to some of the city's most at-risk children.

Cathedral Academy is a spiritual presence in an area struggling to be reborn in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

The sisters, in their black-and-white habits, "don't have to say a word to proclaim God," said Sister Mary Rose Bingham, principal of Cathedral Academy, the parish school of St. Louis Cathedral.

Several years ago the sisters were recruited to run the elementary school, not only for their teaching skills but particularly for the prayerful witness they give to people, said Sister Mary Rose.

"Maybe every city needs it," she said, and maybe none as much as the fragile city of New Orleans.

While certain neighborhoods, such as the French Quarter, are tentatively coming back to life, others remain in shambles. Homeowners are confused about when or if they will be able to rebuild; many of the city's residents are growing frustrated with feeling like transients in their hometown.

The Dominicans are working hard to provide these displaced and disheartened families of New Orleans with some stability in their lives.

Following the storm Cathedral Academy was the first school, public or private, to reopen in Orleans Parish, a civil entity, and it welcomed anyone.

"The parents were so desperate and so relieved," said Sister Mary Rose.

"It's hard to overestimate the importance of that school coming back so quickly and so well" after the hurricane, said Father William Maestri, superintendent of schools for the Archdiocese of New Orleans. "It served as a magnet of hope for the city."

Families won't return to a city without the assurance that their children can be enrolled in school, so "infrastructure begins to develop when schools reopen," Father Maestri said.

Cathedral Academy serves a predominantly African-American population; many of the students come from poor or broken homes.

Since Katrina, Cathedral Academy has nearly doubled in size, from 125 to 250 students, and nearly all pay drastically reduced tuition. While the racial makeup of the student body is basically the same, most of the students who started school last August have resettled elsewhere.

The students now enrolled at Cathedral Academy have come from all over the city, and about one-quarter of them are from public schools. Many families are still living on cruise ships or in hotels or trailers.

Some students are having an especially difficult time adjusting to life in temporary housing or to being in their own home with extra family members around.

Some children, shuffled around after the hurricane to as many as six schools in four months, are at Cathedral Academy because their own school was destroyed or has yet to reopen.

Sister Mary Cecilia tries to keep an open dialogue with students about their Katrina experiences, and sometimes uses the storm as a springboard for religion class.

While the sisters "grieve for the kids who evacuated and had to leave us," their mission is to "live in the spirit of the present moment" and serve the people "placed in our path" by the hurricane, Sister Mary Rose said.

Catholic groups to run clinic

boarded-up storefront windows were closed. Fast-food restaurants appeared to have collapsed and their metal signs remained twisted.

Ten percent, or 7,000 residents, have returned to an area with almost no electricity or running water.

Services for these residents were still extremely limited, existing primarily in temporary disaster relief centers dotting the main roads.

Still in need

On Saturday afternoon March 4, the parking lot of the Wal-Mart Supercenter in Chalmette was as packed as it may have been in its pre-Katrina days, but no one was there to shop.

Instead, they were there to get free lunches from a charity-run food tent, consult officials from the Federal Emergency Management Agency or insurance workers in trailers on-site, or receive health care at a triple-wide trailer run by three local doctors with financing and staffing assistance from the U.S. Public Health Service.

At the entrance to the health clinic was a spray-painted sign on a piece of plywood that read: "No knives No weapons."

The federal contract for the clinic, which has been seeing about 150 patients a day, is about to run out, which would leave the area without a health care facility since Hurricane Katrina destroyed all of them, including its only hospital, Chalmette Medical Center.

Thirty-five doctors offices that had been in the area are now closed.

Two Catholic health care systems — Franciscan Missionaries of Our Lady Health System based in Baton Rouge and Ascension Health in St. Louis — have stepped in and are planning to run the clinic in the near future. FEMA is setting up a 22,000-square-foot metal building on the parking lot to handle more patients and emergency care.

FEMA will not provide funds to run the facility because the parish did not qualify for long-term assistance since it did not have public health care before Katrina.

Committed to care

The new clinic site, still under construction, was one of several visited by nearly three dozen members of the Catholic Charities USA board of trustees who toured the Gulf region March 4 for an update of post-Katrina recovery efforts.

"There is a huge need, and we're trying to meet that need," said Michael Pisciotta, clinical administrator for the Franciscan Missionaries of Our Lady, who will be the operating manager for the Chalmette clinic.

"We are committed to the health care recovery of the St. Bernard community," he said, adding that the health care systems will continue to run the clinic "as long as we need to be there."

Pisciotta, whose own home was flooded with 3 feet of water, noted that the Chalmette area was 75 percent Catholic prior to Katrina and that the Catholic health systems' sponsorship of the clinic was an "incredible opportunity for a Catholic organization" to help the local community.

On March 1, the first Catholic school reopened in St. Bernard Parish for 30 students. The school, Our Lady of Prompt Succor Central, is located on the grounds of the church where eight parishes are being consolidated into one.

Despite the devastation around him, Pisciotta was optimistic about the region's eventual recovery.

"We will come back. I believe it," he said.

Youths paint apartment for refugee services

CHARLOTTE — Youth group members from St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte recently painted an apartment to be used by refugees.

Jordan Raniszkeski, youth group leader, guided 28 youths armed with painting equipment as they washed, primed and painted the Charlotte apartment Feb. 25. A local home supply store donated the paint.

The apartment had served as an English as a Second Language classroom for refugees. Currently 251 refugees are enrolled in ESL classes provided by the Catholic Social Services' Refugee Resettlement Office.

In 2005, CSS resettled 387 refugees. December was the busiest month with 89 arrivals: 64 Montagnards came from the Central Highlands of Vietnam, and various others came from Vietnam, Sudan, Cuba, Somalia (Bantu), Eritrea and the Soviet Union.

Refugees are provided with housing and stocked refrigerators of their ethnic food upon arrival. CSS also connects them with schools, health and banking services, and assists with employment training and placement.

CSS seeks volunteers to help provide tutoring in English, transportation and housing preparations. Household items and furniture, except appliances, are a continuous need. CSS will pick up large furniture pieces.

Growing in the faith

Catholic Daughters welcome junior court in Sylva

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

SYLVA — Good example inspired Stormy DeLucia to become a founding member of the Junior Catholic Daughters of the Americas (JCDA) court at St. Mary, Mother of God Church in Sylva.

DeLucia, 14, was impressed with the members of Court St. Mary, Mother of God No. 2534 of the Catholic Daughters of the Americas.

"I was attracted because I noticed that the ladies who were in the Catholic Daughters were very active in the church," DeLucia said. "It just seemed like they really knew why they were Catholic and what they stood for."

"I think (JCDA) will help me understand my faith more and to appreciate my church and everyone who's involved in it," she said.

Catholic Daughters, the largest organization of Catholic women in the Americas, is open to Catholic women 18 and older. JCDA serves girls ages 6 through 17. Chapters are called "courts."

The local Catholic Daughters wanted to sponsor a JCDA court "to stimulate the young people to get them interested in projects that are of value to the Church," said Rita Goffinet, the court's recording secretary.

On Feb. 12, the JCDA worldwide celebrated its 80th anniversary. To commemorate the occasion, Court St. Mary, Mother of God sponsored a JCDA court, the first in the Diocese of Charlotte.

Father Ray Williams, pastor of St. Mary, Mother of God Church and the sponsoring court's chaplain, celebrated the installation Mass at the church Feb. 12.

Maryann Grabasky, Catholic Daughters state regent (president); Sheila Storey, first state vice regent; and Sandy Beauchemin, local court regent, presided at the installation ceremony.

They received five girls into the JCDA court: Kathryn Hayes, president, Camille Ensley, Kristin Geier, Arianna Holt and Kaitlyn Karcher.

"I've always liked participating in the church and helping out in the community," said Kathryn, 16, who is an altar server at St. Mary, Mother of God Church and has volunteered with the Harris Regional Medical Center auxiliary and at a daycare center.

At a post-Mass reception, Father Williams read the national JCDA's anniversary proclamation.

Inclement weather prevented seven other potential JCDA members from attending the Feb. 12 ceremony, but they were received into the court March 4 during the JCDA's first official meeting.

Gwen Parris, the sponsoring court's first vice regent, installed Stormy as vice president; Ana Maria Balta as secretary; and Mary Jo Cope as treasurer.

Sara Freeman, JCDA facilitator and chairman of the local Catholic Daughters youth committee, installed Madeleine Franzen, Emily Gonzalez, Anna Pierce and Regina Stanton.

The girls' mothers were invited to join them to celebrate the occasion at a luncheon after the meeting.

Court St. Mary Mother of God, founded in 2004, has 47 members. They help the parish with such things as fundraising events, including one that provided money to help the Catholic Center at Western Carolina University. They also assist with receptions after funerals.

During Lent last year, the Catholic Daughters were in charge of a 24-hour period of adoration of the Blessed Sacrament and plan to do that again this year. They also sponsored a WRAP project, encouraging people to Wear a white Ribbon Against Pornography.

The JCDA court is planning its first project, a vocations exhibit to foster interest in religious vocations.

DID YOU KNOW?

The Catholic Daughters has nearly 95,000 members in 1,400 courts in the United States, Puerto Rico, Mexico, the Dominican Republic, Guam, Saipan, and the Virgin Islands, the Web site notes.

The Catholic Daughters and JCDA promote the development of the whole person through programs of self-identity and personal growth; serve the parish and community; encourage spiritual growth; and encourage programming that is open and creative to meet current needs and concerns.

There are currently seven Catholic Daughters courts in the Diocese of Charlotte

Thousands rally at Capitol to protest House-passed immigration bill

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Thousands of people, many of them Spanish-speaking immigrants, loudly voiced their displeasure about a House-passed immigration bill with a large rally outside the Capitol March 7.

The bill would stiffen penalties for undocumented immigrants and their employers, and Cardinal Roger M. Mahony of Los Angeles has said church and charitable organizations would be subject to prosecution if they aid immigrants. The Senate is considering its own versions of immigration legislation.

Father Jose Hoyos, head of the Spanish apostolate for the Diocese of Arlington, Va., drew cheers from the crowd when, at an interfaith prayer service that was part of the rally, he said, "I want to pray for all the representatives and the senators and the president of the United States, because they have become atheists — because if they were Christians they would not pass this kind of law."

The bill, the Border Protection, Anti-Terrorism and Illegal Immigration Control Act, sponsored by Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., passed the House Dec. 16 by a vote of 239-182.

The day of the rally the Senate Judiciary Committee began consideration of an immigration bill drafted by Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., committee chairman.

It includes provisions to criminalize violations of immigration law, including the act of providing aid to illegal immigrants; would make it harder for legal immigrants to become citizens; and would penalize state and local governments that do not pointedly enforce immigration laws, currently only a responsibility of federal agencies.

It would eliminate a visa lottery program that allows up to 50,000 people a year from certain countries to enter the United States legally and would build 700 miles of new fence along the 2,000-mile border with Mexico.

The bill also would expand the employment authorization verification program, but not replace what many say is a flawed database currently used by employers for checking documents.

The National Capital Immigration

Coalition, sponsors of the rally, said they were expecting 20,000 to attend. No crowd estimate was offered by U.S. Park Police. Among the 44 coalition members are the Archdiocese of Washington's Office of Justice and Service, Catholic Charities of the Arlington Diocese and the Catholic social justice lobby Network.

"Neither Sensenbrenner's bill nor Specter's markup is a solution to our immigration problem," said coalition chairman Jaime Contreras. "In fact, their proposal will only create more problems instead of fixing them."

"What we need is real, comprehensive immigration reform," he said, touting the Secure America and Orderly Immigration Act, co-sponsored by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Ted Kennedy, D-Mass., as the preferred alternative.

The McCain-Kennedy bill includes provisions for border security, temporary worker visas and family reunification. It would require efforts by foreign countries to help control the flow of emigrants, cover the costs borne by hospitals that provide emergency care for undocumented immigrants, promote citizenship, and take various steps to prevent fraud.

The Catholic bishops of Arizona stated their support of the bill last year, saying it took "a comprehensive approach to a complex issue."

Eduardo Castro, 35, came to the rally from a Catholic church in Baltimore. Castro, who owns a small construction firm, said he came to the United States in 1988 to flee the civil war in his native El Salvador.

He said the reaction he gets from people in America about immigration is far removed from the language in the Sensenbrenner bill.

"Most people I talk to about the bill, they look at me and say, 'Oh, my God! Is this true?' ... It's like they're trying to build the perfect race, like in Germany," he said.

Immigration system needs reform topic, "Welcome the stranger among us — unity in diversity," on the Sisters of Mercy campus in Belmont March 11.

In a phone interview, Franken said Catholics have a responsibility to develop a "gospel attitude" toward immigrants, regardless of their legal status.

"As people of faith, we look at how laws affect people from a moral perspective," he said. "Are these laws humane? Do they uphold the God-given right to human dignity?"

While the U.S. bishops' don't condone breaking any criminal or civil law, they do believe the current policies are morally unacceptable, Franken added.

"We must look at why so many people are compelled to come here by illegal means," he said. "These people leave their homes because of lack of opportunities."

"Many people in Central America live in conditions marked by poverty and exclusion," said Terri Jarina, program director of the diocesan Office of Justice and Peace. "They face an increasing gap between the rich and the poor, and they have inadequate educational and public health systems."

Reforming the system

While Catholic Relief Services, the U.S. bishops' international relief and development agency, supports the right of the government to enforce the law and protect the national security interests, it also recognizes that the existing "complex and unworkable immigration system" has made it nearly impossible for many immigrants to achieve legal status, according to its Web site.

"A comprehensive package of reforms will provide Americans with an immigration system that safeguards the homeland, restores the rule of law and maintains our ideals as a nation of immigrants," Franken said.

The U.S. bishops support the Secure America and Orderly Immigration Act, which was introduced to Congress in May 2005. The act would not increase immigration in the employment area, but legalize it, since immigrants are already entering and working without documentation.

By legalizing the undocumented workforce, wages for all workers increase because the undocumented are better able to organize and assert their rights in the workplace.

Undocumented immigrants have broken a civil law, not a criminal one, Franken said. "Have they broken the law, or has the law broken them?"

The argument people use to protest immigration — they won't adapt to American culture, they don't learn English, they're criminals — are the same arguments that were used a century ago against immigrants.

"The facts don't bear out that there is any greater criminal activity among today's immigrants than there was in previous generations," said Franken. "If we had a more rational immigration system, allowing fewer people to live on the margins of society, we could direct our resources to violent criminals."

"Cities with large percentages of foreign-born in their population are typically low-crime, not high-crime

"We need to remember our own ancestors' stories of how they came to the United States and why they came."

"I think Jesus would expect the Catholic Church to treat all people with love and compassion, as he did," she said. "He saw persons with his heart and helped them in their need."

Stemming the flow

Franken said it's a myth that better security will stop illegal immigration.

"It will make it more difficult, but will in no way stem the flow," said Franken. "People will always risk their lives for a better way of life."

Franken is convinced tightened border security will result in increased tunnels, smuggling, organized crime and, eventually, boat people landing in California and in the Gulf Coast states.

"We must ensure the best we can, that people are not coming here to do us harm," Franken said. "Our nation's trade, economic aid, debt relief and other types of economic and social policies should help to create conditions in which people are not compelled to leave their homes."

On Dec. 16, 2005, the U.S. House of Representatives passed the Border Protection, Anti-Terrorism and Illegal Immigration Control Act, which would stiffen penalties for undocumented immigrants and their employers.

"We need to remember our own ancestors' stories of how they came to the United States and why they came," said Sister Inkrott.

An economic necessity

Jaime Contreras, National Capital Immigration Coalition chairman, said cities," Stephen Moore wrote in his essay, "Immigration and the Rise and Decline of American Cities," published by Stanford University's Hoover Institute.

"For example, the 17 cities with the most immigrants in 1990 had a 1991 crime rate of 8.7 per 1,000 population. The cities with the fewest immigrants had a crime rate 17 percent higher, or 10.5 per 1,000 persons," he said.

The cities with the most immigrants in 1980 also had lower crime rates on average (9.2 per 1,000) than the low-immigration cities (11.1 per 1,000), according to Moore.

"In sum, crime is more rampant in cities with few immigrants than in cities with many immigrants," Moore said.

"I do not condone breaking the law, but I am very much concerned that we do not seem to be asking 'Why are people breaking the law?'" said Franciscan Sister Andrea Inkrott, director of diocesan Hispanic Ministry.

Magdalena Schwartz makes a statement with symbolic handcuffs during an immigration rally on the west lawn of the Capitol in Washington March 7. The crowd was protesting a House-passed immigration bill that they contend would allow law enforcement authorities to prosecute social service workers and others who help illegal immigrants.

each year immigrant workers contribute $90 billion in income taxes, up to $7 billion in Social Security taxes and receive only $5 billion in services.

Contreras spoke at a March 7 rally in Washington protesting the border protection act.

According to the U.S. bishops' Web site, studies show that immigrant workers are employed in jobs in industries that do not attract sufficient U.S. workers.

The U.S. Department of Labor has predicted that the United States will experience a labor shortage in many "unskilled job categories" by as early as 2008.

More than 80 percent of agricultural workers are foreign-born, as are the majority of laborers in the meatpacking and poultry industries. More than one-third of all dishwashers, janitors, maids and cooks are also foreign-born.

"Our country has always been a country of immigrants, who bring with them many gifts as well as their hands to do the manual labor in our fields and factories," said Sister Inkrott. "As Catholics they bring with them their faith and their values — gifts that the local Catholic community can benefit from in a mutual sharing of faith and values."

Understanding sacrifice is theme of Virginia Catholic writer's novel

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

BLACKSBURG, Va. — Killing spiders on Good Friday, building bonfires to burn Judas in effigy on Holy Saturday, draping purple cloths over crucifixes and holy pictures — welcome to Holy Week in the recollections of Catholic author Irma Silva-Barbeau.

These memories also are found in the pages of her first novel, "A Sweet Oblation."

Silva-Barbeau, of Blacksburg, Va., explores the joy of loving sacrifice through the open heart of a child who is learning the meaning behind the religious and cultural practices of Lent and Easter.

She places the story in the colorful culture of her native Cape Verde in the years before the Second Vatican Council. The country is a group of islands in the North Atlantic Ocean, west of the African country of Senegal.

She takes the reader on a spiritual journey of discovery with her character, 12-year-old Isabel, as she probes the questions — and the answers — about self-denial and love of Jesus and the poor.

Isabel learns that giving up something as small as a candy bar can help her detach herself from the things of the world so she can draw closer to God.

"I wanted the sacrifice to be something small — a very simple gift for a child — a candy bar or Isabel just holding back in class at school to allow someone else to shine, to show that the littlest sacrifices can bring us close to God," Silva-Barbeau said.

The author's story of Isabel, who is based largely on her own childhood and spiritual experiences — is told in the language of a mother explaining to her daughter the value of a penitential season and the difference between suffering in the context of love and simply suffering.

Silva-Barbeau also celebrates some older Catholic practices — such as the veiling of crucifixes and sacred images and rigorous fasting — through the lens of post-Vatican II understanding.

An active member of St. Mary's Church in Blacksburg, Silva-Barbeau was 14 years old when she immigrated to the U.S. with her parents and siblings from Cape Verde, then still a Portuguese colony.

The family went to Massachusetts, which has a large population of Cape Verdeans. That connection was made in the early 19th century, when whaling ships from New Bedford, Mass., would stop periodically in the islands as they sailed their route.

With a doctorate in international nutrition from Cornell University in Ithaca, N.Y., Silva-Barbeau has traveled extensively in developing countries in West Africa and South and Central America.

She specializes in research and development projects in the field of hunger and malnutrition and has worked on numerous projects for organizations such as the U.S. Agency for International Development and Catholic Relief Services, the U.S. bishops' overseas relief and development agency.

She and her husband, Bill, a professor at Virginia Tech, a state university in Blacksburg, co-published a report on a successful project in Gambia in the Food and Nutrition Bulletin of the United Nations.

She said she had never thought of the idea of writing as a vocation, but as she got older she became "more introspective" and realized she had some stories to tell.

"I realized how blessed I've been with opportunities and education — I've worked with presidents and the lowliest farmers. I learned that for me, as I understand it is for many writers, the characters come to you," she said. "As I remembered things from my own past, the story started writing itself."

Jesus' love is unconditional

BY BEVERLY CORZINE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

For weeks our evenings had been inundated with a deluge of prerecorded telephone calls urging us to vote for or against someone or something. Our latest strategy was not to answer if we didn't recognize the number.

Recently, on an evening of incessant ringing, my husband brought me the phone. I thought, "Why in the world did he answer it?"

After being hammered with unwanted calls for days, I guess I had temporarily forgotten that sometimes we did want to talk to the person calling.

However, I realized that this particular call was high priority when I hear the familiar salutation: "Hi Grandma. This is Olivia." Olivia has a case of First Reconciliation butterflies.

We had a conversation about what she might say when she visits with the priest and how God sent Jesus to let us know how much we are loved no matter what. We talked about her hopes of getting a priest she knows.

Then she said, "Would you like to hear me say the Our Father?"

"Of course," I replied. I listened to the words of this ancient prayer and heard the innocence in the voice I love so much.

I told her she did a wonderful job and did not miss a word. She told me she would call back soon with the Hail Mary.

The conversation ended with our declarations of love for each other.

My husband asked, "What was that all about?"

Glowing, I answered, "Olivia wanted me to hear her say the Lord's Prayer." I was struck with her confidence in Jesus.

On this fourth Sunday of Lent, all the readings assure us that God has always loved us. However, that assurance may have been blocked by a lifetime of thinking that God is just waiting to zap the unsuspecting into oblivion.

John's Gospel says otherwise, especially in one of the most memorized verses in the Bible that illustrates the depth of that love — John 3:16: "God so loved the world that he gave his only Son."

As my granddaughter said, "Jesus loves us no matter what."

Questions:

What experiences or conditions in your life make you tend to forget God's unconditional love? What Lenten practice can help keep you conscious every day of that love?

Scripture to Illustrate:

The light came into the world, but men loved darkness rather than light because their deeds were wicked. ... But he who acts in truth comes into the light" (Jn 3:19, 21).

Decoding the truth

'Jesus Decoded' site launched to counter claims in 'Da Vinci Code'

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — A new Web site sponsored by the U.S. bishops' Catholic Communication Campaign has been established to provide accurate information about the life of Jesus, the origins of Christianity and Catholic teaching to counter claims made in the best-selling novel "The Da Vinci Code" by Dan Brown.

The site, www.jesusdecoded.com, was launched March 9. A film version of the book is slated for nationwide release May 19.

The site contains information that refutes claims made in the book about the nature of Jesus; his relationship with Mary Magdalene; the first four ecumenical councils of the early church and how they shaped today's teaching about Jesus; contemporaneous accounts of Jesus' life that were not selected for the New Testament; the role of women in the church throughout history; and the "Last Supper" paintings by Leonardo da Vinci and other artists of his era.

Also found on the site is a column by John Thavis, Rome Bureau chief for Catholic News Service, on the level of Vatican reaction to the book and forthcoming movie.

There is also an essay from the U.S. bishops' Office for Film & Broadcasting on the marketing hype behind the movie; and a commentary, "What's Wrong With 'The Da Vinci Code'?", written by Father John Wauck, a U.S. priest of Opus Dei, the personal prelature which figures prominently in the novel.

The site also has production information on the CCC's "Jesus Decoded" TV special, including information on air dates and times in cities around the United States. The program, shot on location in Israel, Turkey and Italy, includes interviews with international scholars versed in art, history and Scripture who "help separate Catholic truth from popular fiction."

It has been offered to NBC affiliates, but each affiliate's management makes the decision whether to air it.

"Many of my students and myself included enjoy a good, fast-paced novel, and enjoyed 'The Da Vinci Code' on that level, as a tall tale of adventure," said Alan Schreck, chairman of the theology department at the Franciscan University of Steubenville in Ohio, who contributed an essay to the Web site on early church ecumenical councils.

"There's a level where this book is appealing to people," Schreck told CNS. "That is what makes it dangerous to someone, if they believe it's a historical representation or an accurate theological presentation."

Rather than cover up the truth about Jesus, as the novel suggests, the early church councils tried to uncover the truth, according to Schreck.

In those councils, the participants "asked critical questions and had entertained different views of who Jesus was, his mission, and in this process saw the need to clarify the truth about Jesus that sprung from the most authentic and reliable sources about him," Schreck said.

"And there were many sources about him that were being promulgated," he said.

Southern sounds in school

David Holt (right), a four-time Grammy Award winner, historian and storyteller; and Josh Goforth (center), a native of Asheville and fellow traditional and acoustical musician, are pictured outside Our Lady of Grace School in Greensboro Feb. 27 with school librarian Doris Melson.

Melson arranged the visit of Holt and Goforth, who delighted the students and guests with traditional American storytelling and folklore interwoven with their musical performance. Holt, who played a number of homemade acoustical instruments, reflected on Southern culture and ways of the craftsmen and musicians of the Southern mountains.

"The day was a very special one, as it brought schoolchildren, their families, Our Lady of Grace parishioners and fellow librarians from across the country together for an inspirational and uplifting performance," said Melson.

A worthwhile 'Vendetta'

"V for Vendetta" is a provocative futuristic thriller based in London about a masked antihero (Hugo Weaving) who enlists the aid of a young office worker (Natalie Portman) to undermine a totalitarian government.

That government is headed by an Orwellian dictator (John Hurt) and his cowering advisers (Stephen Rea, Rupert Graves, Tim Pigott-Smith).

Director James McTeigue, working from a Wachowski Brothers adaptation of Alan Moore (uncredited by choice) and illustrator David Lloyd's graphic novel, has crafted a reasonably intelligent political allegory, with emphasis on character development, ideas and even a bit of romance, rather than simple mindless violence.

The performances are first rate, and the film's theme of the individual's responsibility in standing up to tyranny — while questioning the moral limits of opposition — is worthy, and stops short of imparting a universal anti-authoritarian message.

Some discreetly handled violence with bloodshed, a hanging, scattered profanity, rough and crude language and expressions, minor lesbian-themed flashback and implied gay male character, corrupt Anglican clergyman, attempted rape, sexual innuendo, drug use.

The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is L — limited adult audience, films whose problematic content many adults would find troubling.

The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted. Under 17 requires accompanying parent or adult guardian.

Eucharistic Conference coming to Asheville

At the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville, Bishop Peter J. Jugis will celebrate Mass, followed by a eucharistic procession through the streets to the Asheville Civic Center.

Inside the Civic Center, the conference will feature a holy hour and speaker presentations.

The event is open to all Catholics. Many who attended the diocese's first Eucharistic Congress in Charlotte last year described the eucharistic procession, holy hour and speakers as sources of spiritual strength and revival.

"We know that making a trip to Charlotte poses a problem for many people in the western part of the diocese," said Father Roger Arnsperger, pastor of St. Barnabas Church in Arden and Eucharistic Conference organizer.

"We want everyone to have the experience of attending a Catholic family gathering centered on the holy Eucharist, and so the decision was made to hold this event in Asheville," he said. "Of course, we also encourage everyone to make the effort to participate in the upcoming diocesan Eucharistic Congress in Charlotte."

Details of the event, including speakers, are still being formulated. Information about the event and procession route can be found on the section of the diocesan Web site dedicated to the diocesan Eucharistic Congress.

David Hains is director of communications for the Diocese of Charlotte.

WANT MORE INFO?

The Asheville Eucharistic Conference will take place Saturday, June 24, beginning with 9 a.m. Mass at the Basilica of St. Lawrence, followed by a eucharistic procession to the Asheville Civic Center. The conference will include a holy hour and speakers, and is expected to end at approximately 1 p.m.

More details will be available at www.goeucharist.com.

Pope discusses women's role in church decision-making, other topics

Rome, Pope Benedict spent two hours listening to their concerns and responding to the questions posed by 15 of them.

Father Marco Valentini asked the pope why the church does not recognize that women's experience, wisdom and points of view would complement those of the men in decision-making positions.

Pope Benedict said, "Everyone certainly has had this experience" that Father Valentini described of being assisted by women in growing in the faith.

"The church owes a great debt of thanks to women," the pope said.

Women not only have exercised a charismatic function in the church, being prompted by the Holy Spirit to found religious orders, expand charitable projects and develop new forms of piety, he said; they have had "a real and profound participation in the governance of the church."

"How could one imagine the governance of the church without this contribution, which sometimes has been quite visible, like when St. Hildegard criticized the bishops or when St. Brigid and St. Catherine of Siena admonished and obtained the return of the popes to Rome" from Avignon, France, the pope said.

The contribution of women, he said, "always has been a determining factor without which the church could not live."

Pope Benedict said priestly ministry is reserved to men, but "it is right to ask" if it would not be possible "to offer more space, more positions of responsibility to women."

Dealing with several subjects, the pope emphasized the importance of individuals recognizing they have been created by God, entering into a relationship with God and sharing that relationship with others.

He quoted the Old Testament reading used March 2 at Mass: "I have set before you life and death, the blessing and the curse. Choose life."

The decline of Christianity in the West, he said, too often is presented falsely as a choice for life.

"It has been said — I'm thinking of Nietzsche, but also many others — that Christianity is a choice against life. With the cross, with all the commandments, with every 'no' it tells us, it closes the door to life," he said.

But true Christian faith teaches people that the abundance of life comes not from hoarding it, but from giving it, he said.

"Human life is a relationship ... with the Creator, otherwise all relationships are fragile," he said. "A world emptied of God, a world that has forgotten God, loses life and falls into a culture of death."

Pope Benedict said too many people in the West are afraid to have children because they think a child will diminish their lives.

The pope said he personally wanted to thank Catholic mothers "because they have given life, because they want to help this life grow" and because they introduce their children to "friendship with Jesus."

The pope said a "great solitude" is the basic problem faced by young people.

"Everyone lives in his own world. They are islands of thought and feelings; they never come together," he said.

Without a strong family life and strong faith, the pope said, people forget that they are all children of God and that they are called to live a life in community.

Pope Benedict said too many people give value only to what is new and modern and forget what endures and what unites all people: having been created by God, loved by God and saved by his Son.

Whether dealing with the problems of youth and family life or looking at the church, its liturgy and its relationship to the world, he said, people must remember that "in a moment of renewal and change, the element of the permanent becomes more important."

The church does not ignore or condemn all that is new, the pope said, but it knows it has a treasure of faith, piety and liturgy that has helped people for centuries and can still help them.

Turning to the liturgy, the pope said he was "a bit upset" when the Second Vatican Council changed the liturgical readings for Lent, adopting the reading he had just cited about choosing life or death.

"Today I see that these readings are very beautiful and express the program of Lent: to choose life, that is to renew one's baptismal 'yes,' which is to choose life," he said.

"We must accept the new, but also love continuity and see the council from the viewpoint of continuity," he said.

Make the Beatitudes your Lenten program

God offers many great suggestions for Lent

It's Lent again.

Every year we try to think of some new penance that will help us sing "Alleluia" at Easter and really mean it. Why not let Jesus set the agenda?

He tells us straight out in Matthew's Gospel how we can be happy. Why not follow his instructions in the Beatitudes?

So here is the plan for a blessed Lent:

— Happy are the poor in spirit, theirs is the kingdom of heaven.

Go on a shopping fast. Don't spend money except for absolute necessities.

I've decided the only things I will buy during Lent are necessities I can get at my local supermarket and gas station. (My supermarket also has a pharmacy and dry cleaner.)

Most people spend too much money on stuff they don't need. This is a good way to become detached from things and truly "poor in spirit."

— Happy are they who mourn.

Go to the funerals at your parish church. Attend wakes of parishioners, even if you don't know them. Pray for the dead.

Better yet, volunteer to help with funerals. It is a great sign of what we mean by the "communion of saints," a great way to show sympathy and solidarity.

Maybe someday when you are mourning a stranger will come to support you. As the Lord says, "They shall be comforted."

— Happy are the meek.

Lose arguments on purpose this Lent. Don't defend yourself to family or friends when they disagree with you. Just say, "You may be right." That will stop 'em cold.

The odd thing is, they will start agreeing with you and concede, "You have a point, too." Then the Lord's prediction will come true, you will inherit the earth.

Losing is how you really win.

— Happy are those who hunger and thirst for justice.

Go to a demonstration for a good cause. Support immigration rights or pro-life issues. Write a letter to your state assemblyman on an issue affecting the poor. Speak out at a community meeting on a local issue like low-cost housing or needs of the mentally ill.

Jesus says it will be very satisfying.

— Happy are the merciful.

Forgive a debt. The bigger, the better. This is especially true for family members' debts.

Parish Diary

FATHER
PETER J. DALY
CNS COLUMNIST

If somebody owes you money you can afford to live without, forgive the loan. If somebody needs a car and you can afford to give your old one, give it.

They won't forget your generosity. Someday they may show you some mercy, as Jesus says.

— Happy are the clean of heart.

Get rid of the things that pollute your life. If you have cable channels or magazines that bring temptations into your house, get rid of them. If you find yourself tempted by the Internet, get a filter.

All we really need to see in the end is what the clean of heart will see: God.

— Happy are the peacemakers.

End an old argument. Settle a quarrel. If you can't do it, what makes you think the Palestinians and Israelis should be able to do it? Call a truce to a longstanding feud in your family.

Break the ice by saying, "I'm sorry if I ever caused you pain." Then you will be one of God's own children.

— Happy are those who are persecuted and insulted because of me.

When somebody criticizes your religious devotion or faith, let it go. Don't fight, but don't disappear. Let your life be the witness. Your reward will be great in heaven.

That is a program for Lent. Thanks to the Lord for the suggestions.

'The Mystery of Christ and his Church'

Pope says personal faith is essential, but so is church community

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — While personal faith in Jesus is essential in a Christian's life, Jesus also came to gather his disciples into a new people of God, the community of the church, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"A slogan in vogue a few years ago, 'Jesus, yes; the church, no,' is completely irreconcilable with the intention of Christ," the pope said March 15 at his weekly general audience.

The audience, held in St. Peter's Square under bright, sunny skies, marked the beginning of a series of audience talks Pope Benedict planned on "The Mystery of Christ and his Church."

"In the catechesis that begins today, I want to demonstrate how the light of Christ's face is reflected in the face of the church, despite the limits and shadows of our fragile and sinful humanity," the pope said.

Pope Benedict criticized the "individualistic interpretation" of Christ's ministry espoused by "liberal theologians" such as the late German theologian Adolf von Harnack.

The idea of von Harnack and others that Jesus' mission is addressed only to individuals, he said, "is a typically modern" interpretation of relationships and does not fit in with the biblical description of God establishing a covenant with an entire people and sending Jesus to establish a new covenant and save all humanity.

Setting aside his prepared text, the

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

pope said, "this individualistic Jesus is a Jesus of fantasy. We cannot have Jesus without the reality (of the church) he created and through which he communicates himself."

Even if Jesus' preaching "always was an appeal to personal conversion, he constantly aimed at the formation of the people of God which he came to gather, unify and save," the pope said.

Jesus founded the church by calling the Twelve Apostles, sharing his life and ministry with them and entrusting the continuing guidance of the new community to them, he said.

"Having entrusted to them at the Last Supper before his Passion the task of celebrating his memorial, Jesus demonstrated that he wanted to transfer to the entire community — in the person of its leaders — the mandate of being the sign and instrument in history of the gathering he began," the pope said.

"The Twelve Apostles are the most evident sign of the will of Christ regarding the existence and mission of his church, the guarantee that between Christ and his church there is no contradiction," he said.

Again speaking without notes, the pope said Jesus and the church "are inseparable despite the sins of the people who make up the church."

"Christ is present today among his people, especially through those who are the successors of the apostles," he said. "And his continuing presence in the community is a motive for our joy."

Letter to the Editor

Guest column a timely reminder

I commend Kevin Roeten for his guest column, "The miracle beyond reality" (Feb. 17).

It was very timely, because we are not reminded enough of, and we tend to forget, the substantial real presence of Jesus in the holy Eucharist.

"This is my body. This is my blood." Surely it is! Amen.

'Faith alone' is not enough

Jesus said faith and action necessary for salvation

Protestant theologian Karl Barth advised his followers not to be discouraged if they are having trouble believing all the claims of Christianity:

"Those who have to contend with unbelief should be advised that they ought not take their own unbelief too seriously. Only faith is to be taken seriously, and if they have faith as tiny as a grain of mustard seed, that suffices for the devil to have lost his game."

I've always been uncomfortable with his oversimplification. Jesus did refer to faith and the mustard seed, but he said a great deal more.

Jesus never said that faith alone saves. What he did say was that faith and action are necessary for salvation: "Believe in me," and "keep my commandments" (Jn 14:12,15).

I love our separated brethren. Many have great love for the Lord, but those who think that the Gospel only calls them to accept Jesus and then rest on their laurels have put themselves at some considerable risk.

Some compound their error by saying that Catholics believe they are saved by their works. The church has never believed or taught that.

In fact, the church condemned Pelagius, an English monk of the fifth century, for teaching what we name Pelagianism. It is the belief that we save ourselves by our good deeds. The church flatly rejected this erroneous theory.

Then exactly what did Jesus teach on this topic?

Jesus proclaimed this message: "Repent and be baptized for the forgiveness sins ..., and love one another." In Chapter 25:40 of St. Matthew's Gospel, he spells it out: "What you do for the least of my brethren you do for me."

He goes on to explain how our judgment will take place: "When the Son of Man comes ... he will place the sheep on his right and the goats on his left. Then the King will say to those on his right, 'Come blessed of my Father, take your heritage prepared for you ..., for when I was hungry you gave me to eat, and when I was thirsty you gave me to drink' (Mt 25:33, 34).

We will be judged by our deeds as well as our faith. Jesus never said, "Faith alone saves."

Rather, he insisted that we are to believe in him and take care of our neighbor: "I tell you solemnly, insofar as you neglected to do this to one of the least of these, you neglected to do it to me. And they will go away to eternal punishment, and the virtuous to eternal life" (Mt 25:46).

The Catholic Church urges the people of God to live a life according to the teachings of Jesus, and this means a life of faith and charitable action.

St. Paul spoke against the necessity of circumcising non-Jewish converts. In his letter to the Romans (3:28), he said that "a man is justified by faith and not by doing something the law tells him to do."

However, Paul never meant to cancel the Gospel teaching of Jesus, who called us perform good deeds with humility:

"Be careful not to parade your good deeds before men to attract their notice. ...When you give alms, do not have it trumpeted before you" (Mt 6:1, 2).

Blessing of throats by lay ministers rites designate how to perform blessing

Q. On the feast of St. Blase, it is customary to have our throats blessed. We were surprised to see [lay] ministers giving the St. Blase blessing. Have they been mandated by the bishop to perform this blessing? (New York)

A. According to the approved blessing of throats on the feast of St. Blase, "the blessing of throats may be given by a priest, deacon or lay minister who follows the rites and prayers designated for a lay minister."

During Mass, the blessing follows the reading of the Gospel, homily and the General Intercessions. Outside of Mass, within a prayer service, the blessing is made at an appropriate time.

In either case, with crossed candles touched to the throat of each person, the priest, deacon or lay minister says, "Through the intercession of St. Blase, bishop and martyr, may God deliver you from every disease of the throat and from every other illness: In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit."

Priests and deacons make the sign of the cross over the person as the invocation is recited. Lay ministers say the same words, touching the throat of each person, but do not make the sign of the cross over the person receiving the blessing.

Thus, what you experienced is entirely proper in the church's regulations for the blessing of throats.

A further regulation provides that if the blessing cannot appropriately be given individually, the priest, or whoever is leading the celebration, extends hands over the people and says the prayer of blessing for everyone at the same time.

These rubrics are found in the Book of Blessings for the United States, confirmed by the Vatican in 1989.

A free brochure on ecumenism, including questions on intercommunion and other ways of sharing worship, is available by sending a stamped, self-addressed envelope to Father John Dietzen, Box 5515, Peoria, IL 61612.

Questions may be sent to Father Dietzen at the same address, or e-mail: jjdietzen@aol.com.

Just when you thought discrimination was gone

'Others' are friends we haven't made yet

I talked recently with two high school students attending a workshop on discrimination.

Before the workshop they were convinced that no discrimination existed at their school. Nobody uttered racial epithets. The school was diverse, and students of all races played on sports teams together.

They thought tolerance was a given until they looked a little closer.

What about the learning-disabled boy in class, the one everybody called a "retard"? What about the time someone said that a friend had to be good at math "because she was Asian"?

What about the names certain classmates used to describe gay and lesbian students? What about condescending attitudes some had toward certain other groups?

For teens, discrimination isn't always as clear-cut as some might imagine. While race can be a factor in some schools, it isn't always about black and white, it's about "us and them."

On the TV show "Lost," the main characters were terrorized for a long time by "the Others," people they hadn't met. What made "the Others" frightening was what the castaways didn't know about their appearance, their culture or their motives.

Who are "the Others" for people today? There are as many answers to this question as there are people in the world.

Employers in the United States are bound by law not to discriminate in the hiring process against people based on their marital status, race, color, sexual orientation, religion, ancestry, age, disability, religion or creed.

In a perfect world, this attitude would be epitomized on a personal level all the time. But people are only human; we all fight with preconceived notions about our "others" on a daily basis.

It may range from thinking that girls just can't play basketball as well as guys to voicing many of the negative characterizations of African Americans that still haunt our culture today.

Most recently, this issue was crystallized by the furor in the Muslim world over satirical cartoons of the prophet Muhammad. It is tempting for many, seeing Arab protesters torching Western emblems, to draw the quick conclusion that the Islamic world is violent, that the Islamic world is "the other," that they're "not like us."

Do those conclusions really take into consideration the political realities of the countries where the rioting happened or try to understand why, for many Muslims, demeaning Muhammad means demeaning all of Islam? Do these conclusions look beyond the surface? Not really.

Coming of Age

KAREN DIETLEIN OSBORNE
CNS COLUMNIST

It does an injustice to both sides when we snap to a quick conclusion about "the others" and don't reach out to discover the real people behind the stereotypes.

In a culture where it was common to adopt discriminatory attitudes towards lepers, tax collectors, and prostitutes, Jesus made an effort to get to know "the other." He invited them over for dinner, treated them like people and, as a result, made new friends of former strangers.

More connects us to "the others" than divides us from them: life, love, friendship, faith and family.

Ending discrimination in the world is a tall order. It is still pretty obvious that we have a long way to go. Perhaps breaking down discriminatory attitudes at home and at school is a place to start.

That's the plan of the two students I talked to, at least. They were going to get to know more about their "others," whether they were Goth girls, the loud lacrosse team, the cheerleaders or anyone else they stereotyped.

I think they're on to something.

St. Therese Church serves thousands of Catholics in south Iredell County

MOORESVILLE — The Catholic community in Mooresville was born Jan. 6, 1946 as the St. Gerard Mission of St. Joseph Church in Kannapolis. Redemptorist priests celebrated the liturgy for about a dozen people in the Van Hoy family home.

At the time, the Catholic population of western North Carolina was about 6,000. For a few months, Masses were celebrated in an upper room of the local Veterans of Foreign Wars Hall in Mooresville.

The church family adopted the name St. Therese, in honor of the late-1800s French Carmelite nun from Lisieux.

With help from the Catholic Extension Society, a pre-World War II chapel was purchased from Camp Lejeune in Jacksonville and was relocated, piece by piece, to Mooresville. The town then had its first Catholic church.

Redemptorist priests continued to serve Mooresville Catholics until August 1954, when diocesan priests assumed pastoral care of the Catholic community. St. Therese Church was granted parish status in 1956.

In 1970, Consolata Society Father John Radaelli served as pastor for several months. Later that year, Jesuit priests began their pastorate at St. Therese Church, a presence that continues to this day.

By 1981, about 100 families were worshipping at St. Therese Church each weekend. At this time, the parish took over the responsibility for Catholic campus ministry at Davidson College from St. James Church in Concord.

In 1983, the parish purchased 25 acres of land, with plans to build a new church and parish center. Ground was broken at the new site July 20, 1986.

Having sold the original church building, the parish accepted Central United Methodist Church's invitation to share their facilities from October 1987 until moving into the new facility in January 1988.

Then-Bishop John F. Donoghue celebrated the dedication Mass in January 1988. Membership had continued to climb, and the parish consisted of 310 families.

By late 1992, the Catholic population of the Diocese of Charlotte had reached more than 75,000 people. St. Therese Church had 735 families and was the fastest growing parish in the diocese. In June 1997, St. Mark Church in Huntersville was formed by redrawing the parish boundaries for St. Therese Church.

By March 1998, the parish population had returned to the same level it had been before the 1997 split.

By spring 1999, nearly 1,100 families called St. Therese Church their spiritual home, and overcrowded facilities were insufficient to meet the parish's needs. A capital campaign was begun to construct a parish life center to house the education and music ministries, and a social hall to accommodate parish-wide events, sports and holiday Masses.

Number of Households: 1,900

Jesuit Father Vincent Curtin

On Sept. 14, 2002, the Lewis Mack Parish Life Center, named for one of the church's founding members, was dedicated and it was none too soon — more than 1,500 families, including almost 1,000 children in faith formation, made up the parish.

The parish center has brought new life to the parish and allowed the expansion of ministries in both the parish and the community.

More than 1,900 parish families now make up St. Therese Church, participating in more than 100 active ministries in the parish and the community.

RESPECTING LIFE

Catholics bring legislatures messages on life-and-death issues

BY NANCY FRAZIER

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — In Washington, issues such as parental notification before an abortion, fetal pain and assisted suicide remained on the back burner in Congress and court observers wondered when a judicial challenge to Roe v. Wade might reach the Supreme Court.

But around the country, state legislators were stepping up in defense of life.

Although not every effort was successful, legislators in nearly every state were working to limit abortions, prohibit assisted suicide, improve health care access, eliminate the death penalty, achieve just immigration reform and enact a living wage for workers.

And in many places, Catholics were taking their messages directly to legislators.

EVERYDAY EXPLORER CHALLENGE

Caitlin Zera, an eighth-grader at St. Francis of Assisi School in Oakville, Mo., poses with a map in early February detailing the Galapagos Islands, the destination of an upcoming trip she earned in the Everyday Explorer Challenge, sponsored in part by National Geographic Kids magazine. Caitlin won with an essay about her local exploration of the Soulard Farmers Market, a historic market in the Soulard neighborhood of South St. Louis.

Catholic school student's essay earns a Galapagos adventure

ST. LOUIS (CNS) — Caitlin Zera's parents have always liked to take their children on Saturday adventures to explore areas near their home. That spirit of adventure has been passed on to Caitlin and helped her earn a trip to the Galapagos Islands.

Caitlin, an eighth-grader at St. Francis of Assisi School in Oakville, Mo., is one of 15 students nationwide to win the Everyday Explorer Challenge, a contest sponsored by National Geographic Kids magazine, the National Geographic Channel and the makers of Purell Instant Hand Sanitizer. The contest was aimed at encouraging a love of exploring in young people. Entries required essays and photos of local places participants like to explore.

Caitlin said she read about the contest in National Geographic Kids magazine and thought it would be fun to enter. She chose a location she and her family visit frequently — Soulard Farmers Market.

Caitlin noted that her parents have taken her to "really cool places" and added that she likes to "explore all different kinds of things, not just places, but the things you find there, the people, the culture, the foods."

Regarding her upcoming trip, Caitlin said, "Every aspect of the trip is so exciting. To be able to see things that I can't see anywhere else in the world, things I probably won't see again — it is just exciting," she said.

Caitlin's family is equally excited and proud about her trip to the remote island chain 600 miles off the coast of Ecuador. "It's pretty amazing. We are still in shock," said Susan Zera, who will accompany her daughter.

Caitlin and her sister Lauren, a fifth-grader, were among 81 students to come from St. Matthias to St. Francis, which now has an enrollment of 442 kindergartners through eighth-graders. The Zeras are members of St. Matthias Parish in Lemay.

"I really like it at St. Francis," Caitlin said. "It was a bit of an adjustment. We had 13 kids in our class and 12 came over. Now we have 52 kids in our grade with two classes. I like it."

She said she likes geography and enjoys reading, writing, painting, playing basketball and volleyball.

When asked what advice she had for other young people, Caitlin's response was: "Get out there and try new things. Don't be afraid of other cultures and people. Get to know them. A lot of people are really cool and nice. You can learn so much from them."

Pro-life official urges Congress to suspend FDA approval of RU-486

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A spokeswoman for the U.S. bishops' pro-life secretariat, responding to a report that two more women have died after taking RU-486, called on Congress to pass legislation that aims to suspend the Food and Drug Administration's approval of the drug used for chemical abortions.

"We are deeply saddened by yet another advisory from the Food and Drug Administration that two more women have died from RU-486 abortions," said Deirdre A. McQuade, director of planning and information for the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities.

However, in its March 17 public health advisory, the FDA said it was not yet "able to confirm the causes of death" of the two women in the United States but was "investigating all circumstances associated with these cases."

The agency said it had received "verbal notification" of the deaths by the manufacturer of RU-486, Danco Laboratories. McQuade said 10 women have died after using the regimen.

"We again call on Congress to pass the RU-486 Suspension and Review Act," McQuade said.

The measure calls for temporary suspension of the FDA's approval of RU-486 so the U.S. comptroller general can review the agency's adherence to statutory mandates in its process for approving the drug.

RU-486 induces an abortion in the first seven weeks of pregnancy when used in conjunction with another drug, prostaglandin.

RU-486 prevents the fertilized egg from clinging to the uterine wall, and the prostaglandin is used 48 hours later to set off contractions that expel the embryo.

McQuade said the New England Journal of Medicine reported in December 2005 that "RU-486 abortions are 10 times more likely to kill a woman, from infection alone, than are surgical abortions in early pregnancy."

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope urges religious leaders to reconcile conflicts with dialogue

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI called on Jews, Christians and Muslims to work together to promote peace and justice in the world, and he urged religious leaders to lead the way by reconciling conflicts and divisions through dialogue and active solidarity.

In a March 16 speech to members of the American Jewish Committee, the pope underlined the "rich common patrimony" that "distinguishes our relationship as unique among the religions of the world," he said.

Christianity acknowledges God's relationship with Israel as the beginning of salvation history, and the pope reminded his audience that the Catholic Church "can never forget that chosen people with whom God entered into a holy covenant."

But Judaism and Christianity also share a unique trait with Islam in that they all believe in one God as creator of heaven and earth, he said.

"All three monotheistic religions are called to cooperate with one another for the common good of humanity, serving the cause of justice and peace in the world," said the pope.

He emphasized the importance of religious leaders spearheading such efforts since they "have a responsibility to work for reconciliation through genuine dialogue and acts of human solidarity."

The pope said such cooperation is urgent today because greater attention needs to be given to "teaching respect for God, for religions and their symbols, and for holy sites and places of worship."

He encouraged the visiting committee delegation to continue "to build bridges of understanding across all barriers."

The committee's international director of interreligious affairs, Rabbi David Rosen, said he agreed with the pope's assessment of "the need to reach out to Islam."

Truth about human dignity will prevail, pope tells Vatican diplomats

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Despite public debates or the rule of dictators, the truth about human dignity, including the sacredness of human life and the importance of the traditional family, eventually will be victorious, Pope Benedict XVI said.

In a March 18 meeting with Vatican diplomats accredited to the United Nations and other international governmental organizations, the pope said Christians must not "marvel and, even less, be discouraged in the face of difficulties and misunderstandings" because God is on the side of truth.

The growing participation of Vatican diplomats in international organizations and meetings is a consequence of the church's conviction that human dignity must be protected in every sphere, he said.

By upholding the dignity of the human created in God's image, the church works to foster the common good, authentic freedom, justice and peace, he said.

"Relations between states and within states are just to the degree that they respect the truth," the pope said. When the truth is desecrated, "peace is threatened and rights are compromised and, with logical consequences, injustices are unleashed."

Pope Benedict said injustices based on violations of the truth about people "are borders that divide countries in a much deeper way than do those drawn on a map."

Among the injustices he listed, the pope cited those based on "disinterest or disorder," including those that "damage the structure of that original cell of society which is the family."

Another, he said, is "domination or arrogance that can arrive at the arbitrary, silencing those who have no voice or do not have the strength to make themselves heard, as occurs in the case of the injustice which, today, is perhaps the most serious, that of suppressing unborn human life."

Pope Benedict told the diplomats that "the church intends to continue raising its voice in defense of man, even when the policy of states or the majority of the public moves in the opposite direction."

"The truth, in fact, finds its strength in itself and not in the size of consensus it receives," he said.

Host Homes honors supporters

WINSTON-SALEM — A special reception for donors to and supporters of Host Homes was celebrated in Winston-Salem March 16.

Host Homes, a program of Catholic Social Services Piedmont Triad Regional Office in Winston-Salem, provides services to restore and maintain healthy family relationships and to promote the well-being and safety of children and youths.

Through a special appeal, Host Homes raised $17,000 that will help provide ongoing services, such as counseling, temporary shelter and foster care.

Host Homes also runs the Safe Place project, where youths can seek help at 232 participating local businesses, to which Host Homes responds immediately.

A 24-hour crisis hotline also gives youths and their families easy access to Host Homes help. Counselors provide parent education and anger management classes, as well as workshops and presentations to community groups.

Grant helps center educate Hispanic children

HIGH POINT — The Hispanic Center in High Point now will be able to help prepare more Hispanic children for school with a recent grant.

The $17,500 grant from the Mebane Charitable Foundation of Mocksville was awarded for the center's De Paul Academy Preschool Project, "Helping Hands for Hopeful Kids."

The grant enables the center to provide reduced fees on a sliding scale for the project services for low-income families.

The Hispanic Center, located at Christ the King Church, was founded in 1999 to serve area Hispanics through various programs and services. It is managed by the Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul.

The De Paul Academy offers bilingual preschool and afterschool programs for Hispanic and other minority children.

Currently, about 70 children are enrolled in the preschool program and 25 in the afterschool program. Almost all of them are from low-income families, said Father Philip Kollithanath, pastor of Christ the King Church.

Without affordable programs such as these, many Hispanic children must stay at home and are not prepared for school, said Father Kollithanath.

The De Paul Academy also teaches parents how to help their children in school.

Catechists study prayer, meditation at retreat

the annual retreat for catechists in the Asheville and Smoky Mountain vicariates.

Augustinian Father Robert Dueweke, who works with the Hispanic ministry in the Smoky Mountain Vicariate, spoke first on "Prayer: Understanding Christian Spirituality and Sacred Texts." He earned his doctorate in spirituality and theology at St. Paul University in Ottawa, Canada.

He pointed out that, "When we try to do everything, we get burned out. It's not we as ministers who transform people but the (Holy) Spirit who transforms. It's up to us to create the environment for that to happen. It's not our church, it's God's church."

"The purpose of a parish," he added, "is to create an environment where people have an encounter with, an experience of, Christ. Where is Christ in your life? How does Christ touch you?"

Church, he said, is everyone working together.

"Vatican II emphasized the people of God — the faithful, rather than laity and clergy (as separate groups) — people of faith on a journey to God," he said. "Vatican II helped us refocus on discipleship. There's a difference between thinking about Jesus and following Jesus. Spirituality is the notion of discipleship."

Living examples

Each catechist received Pope John Paul II's apostolic exhortation, "The Church in America — On the Encounter with the Living Jesus Christ: The Way to Conversion, Communion, and Solidarity in America."

Father Dueweke cited paragraph 44, which describes "the church as the people of God."

It adds: "Pastors should have a profound respect for the witness and evangelizing work of lay people who, incorporated into the people of God through a spirituality of communion, lead their brothers and sisters to encounter the living Jesus Christ."

"The renewal of the church in America will not be possible without the active presence of the laity. Therefore, they are largely responsible for the future of the church."

Catechists, Father Dueweke said, must teach not just doctrine, but out of their own experience of Christ.

He asked about the practices that help one encounter Christ: "Do I read the Scriptures? Pray the rosary? Go to Mass? As a disciple, what are the habits you have that feed the life of the Spirit?"

He suggested that lectio divina — dialoging with sacred texts — is one way to find calm in the midst of chaos and to encounter Christ. This ancient prayer method involves "lectio," reading from a text; "meditatio," meditating on a word or phrase from the text; and "oratio," prayer, a direct, short dialogue with God.

Lectio, he said, could be Scriptures or other sacred texts, or it could be an experience or an event.

Rediscovering silence

In his second presentation, "Prayer of the Heart: Silence and Contemplation," Father Dueweke described contemplative prayer (or meditation) as another way to find Christ and calm.

Contemplative prayer, going back to the early Christian mystics, the "desert fathers and mothers," is different from the "meditatio" of lectio divina.

Father Dueweke suggested that, "part of our mission as catechists is to create spaces of silence, to help people rediscover silence."

"We tend to project on our exterior lives what goes on in our interior lives," he said. "We often can't control what goes on outside, but we can go into our center."

"The meditation is done in Christ, that's what makes it Christian," Father Dueweke said. "Instead of talking about Christ, it's being with Christ. We don't have to justify our being. It's important to be instead of to do."

Maxine Pendleton, youth minister at St. Andrew the Apostle Church in Mars Hill, has seen contemplation's positive results in the 13- to 18-year-olds she teaches.

At the end of each class, they light candles and spend 15 minutes in silence.

"The kids are so in touch with who they are spiritually," Pendleton said. "I've seen such growth in their faith; it's carried them through some rough times."

Calming effects

Those in the Catechist Oasis got a taste of contemplation by viewing a video, "Coming Home," then meditating for five minutes. Following traditional meditation practice, they sat still, closed their eyes and silently began repeating a word they had chosen.

Father Dueweke recommended "Maranatha," the Aramaic word in Jesus' language for "Come, Lord."

The idea was to begin by repeating the word but then to not think of anything. When thoughts come, repeat the chosen word so that the distracting thoughts go away.

Father Dueweke recommended beginning with five minutes of contemplation twice a day, working up to 30 minutes twice daily.

At the end of the five minutes, Father Dueweke led everyone in the "Lord's Prayer."

The interior calmness that meditation fosters manifests itself in calmness in everyday life and in compassion for others.

Many were surprised that five minutes could pass so quickly.

"The time went fast for me," said Ann Stowe, pastoral assistant at Sacred Heart Church in Burnsville and involved in faith formation at St. Andrew the Apostle Church. "And when we said, 'Our Father' ... it was so powerful."

After the meditation period, those feet drawings with the causes of chaos written on them were placed in a circle on the floor. Each person lit a candle from a larger candle, placed it on a feet picture and prayed briefly for the person represented there.

Assembly of greatness

Bishop McGuinness students win at Model U.N.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Model United Nations team from Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville was recently designated "best high school" in the Model U.N. competition.

High school teams from across the United States, each portraying various U.N. countries, participated in the competition held in Washington, D.C. Feb. 9-12.

Simulating a United Nations assembly, students researched positions of the country they represented and worked with other "countries" to pass resolutions on the issues presented.

The team from Bishop McGuinness, under the leadership of faculty advisor David Seidel, won the national competition for the second year in a row.

"The Bishop McGuinness Model U.N. team is made of the most motivated group of high school students one could imagine," said Seidel. "Their competitive success is matched only by their personal dedication and willingness to sacrifice in order to achieve."

First place, "Best Delegation" awards went to students P.J. Dascoli, P.J. Stanford, Noah Carmichael, Casey Moore, Evin Torney, Tyler Frankenberg, Sam Wharton, Neil Goodman and Josh Chen.

Second place, "Outstanding Delegation" awards went to Jordan Cain, Thomas Parcell, Patrick Schweighart, Ify Watson, Tony Barker, Brendan Cain, Robert Whelan, Chris Coggin, John Valitutto, Michael Scott, Mike O'Shea and Jenny Pentz.

Speaking Citations went to Brian Rice, Justin Balser, Terri Walsh and Breanne Long.

Other Model U.N. team members from Bishop McGuinness were Helen McNamara, Matthew O'Neill, Tommy Saintsing, Holly Navarro, Will Scott, Joanna Braeckel, Kelsey Calaghan, Joch Manguno, Matt Sutter, Melissa Plunkett, Michael Taylor and Brenden Regan.

Catholic school students receive awards at competition

KERNERSVILLE — More than 200 middle school students from five Catholic schools recently participated in a Model United Nations competition.

For the second time, the program was held, at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville Jan. 27.

Bishop McGuinness' International Relations Association sponsors the annual middle school Model U.N. This year, 218 students participated from St. Pius X and Our Lady of Grace schools in Greensboro, Immaculate Heart of Mary School in High Point, Our Lady of Mercy School in Winston-Salem and Blessed Sacrament Academy in Charlotte.

Student teams chose a U.N. member country and participated in two sessions, one that discussed the political situation in Haiti and one that discussed problems in the Sudan. At the end of the daylong event, judges rewarded students from each group for their efforts.

Bishop McGuinness shines at Model Congress

KERNERSVILLE — Students from Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville turned in a stellar performance at the 21st annual Harvard Model Congress March 17.

The students were recognized with 13 individual awards of excellence, more than were received by any of the other 80 high schools participating in the event at Harvard University in Cambridge, Mass.

Harvard Model Congress is a government role play facilitated by Harvard students that simulates all three branches of the U.S. government. While the conference's focus is educational, recognition awards denote outstanding preparation and performance.

Award winners from Bishop McGuinness included Dominic Dascoli, Neil Goodman, Matt Maloney, John Valitutto, Melea Foley, Chris Coggin, Mike O'Shea, Preston Stanford, Brendan Regan, Robert Whelan, Samantha Cibelli, Laura Beth Enos and Sam Wharton.

Bishop McGuinness has been participating in the model congress for over 20 years, and has emerged as one of the strongest schools in the last five years.

Catholics bring messages on life-and-death issues to legislatures

"We put them in office and we need to hold them accountable," Candy Hill, senior vice president for social policy at Catholic Charities USA, said of legislators in a March 8 talk to students and adults gathered in Nashville, Tenn., for Catholic Day on the Hill.

"One of the most important things we can do as citizens is to be here and learn to understand the issues," Father Ragan Schriver, director of Catholic Charities of East Tennessee, told 250 middle and high school students at the Capitol.

"It's a great day to recognize what our faith tells us as Catholic Christians to advocate for," he said.

Like other Catholic Day on the Hill participants, Bishops David R. Choby of Nashville, Joseph E. Kurtz of Knoxville and J. Terry Steib of Memphis met with state legislators in their offices throughout the day to discuss immigration, abortion, health care and other issues.

The bishops also met privately with Gov. Phil Bredesen.

Catholics in Florida planned similar meetings with legislators during Catholic Days at the Capitol in Tallahassee March 21-22.

Among the topics cited as priorities by the Florida Catholic Conference during the March 7-May 5 legislative session were parental notification, the death penalty, farmworker safety, affordable housing, a sales tax exemption for textbooks and adoptions by homosexuals, currently banned in the state.

Issues in Illinois

In Illinois, parents and supporters of Catholic, Lutheran, Jewish and other nonpublic schools came together for a February rally in support of legislation expanding scholarship opportunities and after-school educational programs to low-income children attending public, private or religious schools.

Another issue drawing Catholic attention in the Illinois General Assembly was the "morning-after pill" — in particular, whether pharmacists who object to it can be forced to dispense the drug.

A bill under consideration would require pharmacists to dispense the morning-after pill without a prescription, while other proposals would include pharmacists under the state's Health Care Rights of Conscience Act, which Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich says applies only to doctors.

Blagojevich has pledged to veto any legislation that weakens the state regulation requiring pharmacists to dispense emergency contraception.

"Let me make something else very clear — if any of those bills reach my desk, they are dead on arrival," the governor said.

Physician-assisted suicide

At the other end of the life spectrum, legislators in California were preparing to debate whether that state should become the second to allow physician-assisted suicide, currently legal only in Oregon.

The debate was expected to heat up in mid-April, when Democratic Assembly members Patty Berg and Lloyd Levine scheduled a hearing in the Senate Judiciary Committee on Assembly Bill 651, a measure that would allow doctors to prescribe lethal medication to patients who have been declared mentally competent and terminally ill by two physicians.

Berg and Levine tried unsuccessfully last year to pass another assisted suicide measure, but abandoned the effort because of lack of support.

A recent survey showed 49 percent of Latinos in the state strongly disapprove of physician-assisted suicide, 15 percent disapprove, 17 percent somewhat approve and 12 percent strongly approve. The margin of error was plus or minus 5.4 percentage points.

The results "speak volumes about how the Latino community opposes doctor-assisted suicide," said Angel Luevano, state director of League of United Latin American Citizens.

"Latinos know that this is morally wrong. We don't see this as a partisan issue, but one that concerns civil and human rights," said Luevano.

Abandoning abortions

Another hot topic in state legislatures this spring was Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court decision that lifted most state restrictions on abortion.

In March, South Dakota became the first state since Roe took effect to ban nearly all abortions, except those to save the life of the mother.

A similar bill is headed for conference committee in Mississippi, after the state Senate March 15 declined to concur with House-passed amendments adding exceptions for rape, incest and "the presence of a life-threatening condition in the mother that would be worsened by continuing the pregnancy."

Contributing to this story was Theresa Laurence in Nashville, Ann Piasecki in Joliet, Ill., and Julie Sly in Sacramento, Calif.

SOME OTHER ISSUES BEFORE STATE LEGISLATURES THIS SPRING

— Unborn victims of violence: The South Carolina Senate and a Georgia state Senate committee have passed legislation making it a crime to kill or injure an unborn child during an attack on a pregnant woman.

— Parental consent/notification: Bills passed by the House in Arizona and Oklahoma would require parental consent before an abortion is performed on a minor.

— Abortion regulations: Legislation in the Kansas House that would have increased safety requirements at abortion clinics was amended to include all medical clinics that perform surgery, changing its intent and making passage less likely, according to supporters.

— Informed consent: Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue was expected to sign the Women's Right to Know Act, which also strengthens the state's parental notification requirements, in early April.

A measure mandating informed consent before an abortion also was headed for passage in Kentucky.

— Government funding of abortions: The Arizona Senate approved a bill to prohibit use of taxpayer funds for abortions in state, local and county government insurance plans.

— "Wrongful birth": The Ohio Senate passed a measure banning lawsuits based on wrongful birth or wrongful life arguments.

The legislation would protect doctors from claims that women were insufficiently informed about the possibility of disabilities in their children and therefore decided not to abort those children.

— Death penalty: A coalition that includes Catholics has called on the Tennessee Legislature to put a moratorium on executions and order a comprehensive study of the state's system for capital punishment.

Irish saint not really so Irish

St. Patrick converts Ireland to Christianity

St. Patrick, Ireland's favorite saint, wasn't actually Irish. Nor did he drive the snakes out of Ireland — because Ireland is lucky enough to not have any native snakes.

Instead, St. Patrick was born around 385 A.D. in Britain as the pampered, far-from-faith-filled son of a Roman nobleman. Patrick's real name is believed to have been Maewyn Succat, and his baptismal name was Patricius.

In his teens, his plush lifestyle ended when his village was attacked and slave traders kidnapped him and sold him into slavery to an Irish chieftain. Serving as a shepherd on a lonesome hillside, the distraught youth gradually turned to prayer, after six years made a daring escape to Gaul (now France), and eventually returned home.

But memories of the Irish haunted him and Patrick felt God wanted him to preach the Gospel in pagan Ireland. Ordained to the priesthood, he sailed back to Ireland in 432 A.D. and in essence converted the entire populace. That this was accomplished without resorting to violence is a historical rarity.

Patrick's success at winning converts upset the Celtic Druids. They arrested Patrick several times, but each time he escaped.

Patrick traveled throughout Ireland establishing monasteries, which were instrumental in preserving Western civilization's literary traditions through the Dark Ages. He also set up schools and churches, which would help him in his conversion of the Irish country to Christianity.

It is believed that Patrick raised people from the dead, though this cannot be substantiated. He is also said to have given a sermon from the hilltop that drove all the snakes from Ireland. Because no snakes were ever native to Ireland, many scholars believe this is a metaphor for the conversion of the pagans to Christianity.

Patrick's mission in Ireland lasted for 30 years. After that time, Patrick retired to County Down. He died on March 17, 461 A.D. The day has been commemorated as St. Patrick's Day ever since.

Though originally a Catholic holy day, St. Patrick's Day has evolved into a secular holiday, often celebrated with parades and festivals.

Mercy Sister Patricia Durbin, director of the diocesan Media Resources Office, contributed to this story.

The St. Patrick's Day parade — an American institution

The first St. Patrick's Day parade took place not in Ireland, but in the United States. Irish soldiers serving in the English military marched through New York City on March 17, 1762. Along with their music, the parade helped the soldiers to reconnect with their Irish roots, as well as fellow Irishmen serving in the English army.

Today, St. Patrick's Day is celebrated by people of all backgrounds in the United States, Canada and Australia. Although North America is home to the largest productions, St. Patrick's Day has been celebrated in other locations far from Ireland, including Japan, Singapore and Russia.

Legend of the shamrock

The shamrock, a three-leafed clover, is the national emblem of Ireland. It is widely believed that St. Patrick used the shamrock to illustrate the doctrine of the Trinity, but the idea cannot be proven.

The shamrock, which is also called the "seamroy" by the Celts, was a sacred plant in ancient Ireland because it symbolized the rebirth of spring. By the 17th century, the shamrock had become a symbol of emerging Irish nationalism.

As the English began to seize Irish land and make laws against the use of the Irish language and the practice of Catholicism, many Irish began wearing the shamrock as a symbol of their pride in their heritage and displeasure with English rule.

Carrying on the spirit of Ireland's patron saint

CHARLOTTE — Diocese of Charlotte schools, churches and other local Catholic organizations were among the 86 groups that marched in the 10th annual St. Patrick's Day Parade in uptown Charlotte March 18.

This year's morning parade, the largest ever, that ran along Tryon Street and was viewed by an estimated 40,000 people. It was followed by a free community festival that included Irish music, Irish and Celtic dancers and bagpipers.

A FRUITFUL ENDEAVOR

Local priest compiles Mass reflections into book

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

LINCOLNTON — Father Matthew Buettner did not set out to write a book.

"The book has a rather strange but providential origin ... it's what gives me evidence and the assurance that it is God's work," said Father Buettner, parochial vicar of St. Dorothy Church in Lincoln.

"Understanding the Mystery of the Mass: Si Scires Donum Dei" is the collection of Father Buettner's popular series of columns of the same name, which appeared in The Catholic News & Herald during the Year of the Eucharist in 2005.

Each column addresses an aspect of the Mass, from preparation to concluding rites. The purpose, as well as that of the collected works in the book, is to "assist the Catholic faithful to better understand the mystery of the Mass so we can better assist at holy Mass and participate more fully," said Father Buettner.

Also, he said, "it serves to introduce non-Catholics to the tremendous gift that we have been given in the holy Mass."

The 90-page book may prove to be a great source for RCIA, adult education and confirmation classes, he said, as well as for those whose Catholic education could use refreshing.

The concept for "Understanding the Mystery of the Mass" began a few months after Father Buettner's ordination in June 2003.

"I heard of a bishop in California who was so scandalized by the lack of catechesis and knowledge of the Catholic faith among the faithful that he asked his priests to teach for five minutes after holy Communion at every Sunday Mass in the diocese," said Father Buettner.

"I was inspired by this idea to present a similar idea to my pastor in my first parish assignment," he said.

Msgr. Richard Bellow, then-pastor of St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte, liked the idea, but believed it impractical for a large suburban parish with seven Sunday Masses. So Father Buettner was asked to teach a class on the Mass instead.

"The turnout was overwhelming. People were definitely interested in understanding the Mass better," he said.

During his second parish assignment at St. Dorothy Church, after the late Pope John Paul II proclaimed the Year of the Eucharist, Father Buettner began giving five-minute talks following Communion at the two Sunday Masses.

"There was a good response from my parishioners," he said.

As part of the Year of the Eucharist, the Diocese of Charlotte began planning its first Eucharistic Congress for September 2005. Father Buettner was asked to serve on the steering committee.

"The committee decided, as one aspect of the Year of the Eucharist and as preparation for the congress, to employ a catechetical instrument throughout the diocese," said Father Buettner, "namely, to teach on a regular basis on the Eucharist through the diocesan newspaper."

Once again, Father Buettner said, response to the weekly teachings was overwhelming.

"People began to write and call, searching for back issues that they had missed. The next step was to make the reflections available on the diocesan Web site, which drew more attention," he said.

As Father Buettner's series approached the end, he received requests for compiling them into a single resource.

"So, in response to the numerous requests, I revisited the text, made revisions where necessary, added more than 100 footnotes and completed it with a bibliography and appendices," he said.

The book was given a "nihil obstat" (Latin for "nothing stands in the way," a judgment by an official church representative that a book contains no errors of faith or moral teaching) from Dominican Father Giles Dimock, a former professor of liturgy at the Angelicum, one of Rome's pontifical universities, and Father Buettner's liturgy professor at the Dominican House of Studies in Washington, D.C.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis, who gave the book an "imprimatur" (an ecclesiastical permission to publish, certifying the work is in conformity with Catholic understanding of Scripture), "was a great supporter throughout the project," said Father Buettner.

Dr. Alice von Hildebrand, noted author and philosopher, wrote the forward to the book, which is already receiving high praise from readers.

Father Buettner felt the completion of the book was timely, considering the diocese is planning its second Eucharistic Congress in Charlotte Oct. 6-7.

"As a tangible development of the first Eucharistic Congress, it flows fortuitously into our second Eucharistic Congress, themed 'The Love of Christ Impels Us,' referring to the apostolic works and fruitful endeavors that come from devotion to the holy Eucharist," he said.

Father Buettner said he is humbled and grateful to God for the experience of writing the book.

"I am still amazed that I was able to be involved in this work," he said. "It represents an exercise in trust in God's providence, humility and fidelity to his will."

Serving God can be difficult, but rewarding

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The words of Jesus in this weekend's Gospel echo in my mind with the voice of my Haitian pastor friend, Father Hermann.

The scriptural words are, "It is for this purpose that I have come to this hour." Jesus was explaining why he was going forward with the task at hand in Jerusalem despite a heavy sense of foreboding.

He would be arrested, convicted, scourged and crucified, but he knew it was for the glorification of God and for the sake of God's people whom he loved.

Father Hermann lives and serves several thousand people in Haiti's central plateau. Most of them are very poor, working hard in a struggling agricultural economy.

One time, when conditions there were particularly volatile, I was having lunch with the 48-year-old priest and some friends. He told us about a recent incident when his life had been threatened: A gang of men had stopped his car, forced him out and held a gun to his head.

Bystanding parishioners successfully begged for his release.

He was slightly shaken but continued his ministry unabated. I knew how his days were spent — mornings walking through town to visit people, afternoons sitting on a bench outside the rectory (in the center of the town) conversing with a steady stream of individuals seeking his help.

Some days he walked or rode a horse to a remote mountain village to provide the same pastoral care.

Considering the dangerous situation at the time, I wondered aloud whether maybe he should curtail his activities for awhile.

"Ampil travay isit" ("There's much work here"), he said.

"But aren't you afraid?" I asked.

"No," he said simply.

I couldn't believe it. "You're not afraid?" I pressed.

He turned in his chair to face me and spoke my name in his preaching voice for emphasis.

"Jean," he said, his piercing, gentle eyes expressing his desire that I understand something deeply important to him, "it is for this reason that Jesus came."

Unspoken was the same preface Jesus had offered: "I am troubled now. Yet what should I say? 'Father, save me from this hour?'"

Father Hermann smiled his assurance that the one who had gone before him also had taken away his fear.

Questions:

In your own situation, what risks are you called to take for the sake of others and the glory of God? What are fears you must overcome?

This rosary, made from fishing weights, was designed by Father Edward Burns, director of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Vocations and Priestly Formation, as part of the "Fishers of Men" vocations project. The program is based on having dioceses and religious orders convene priests to discuss their vocations and then encourage other men to consider following them.

New vocations film encourages priests to be 'Fishers of Men'

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — With the mid-March premiere of "Fishers of Men," an 18-minute film on DVD that shows many facets of a priest's daily life, "all the elements are in place" for dioceses to join in a new vocations fulfillment and recruitment project sponsored by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, according to the head of the USCCB Secretariat for Vocations and Priestly Formation.

Father Edward J. Burns, executive director of the secretariat, said the Priestly Life and Vocation Summit: Fishers of Men project is intended to renew priests' sense of fulfillment in their vocation and to encourage them to draw on that satisfaction to invite other men to pursue the priesthood.

The project was developed by the USCCB Committee on Vocations.

"Through workshops for priests, the goal of this project is to renew and regenerate the priesthood in the United States," Father Burns said.

"It is intended to help priests articulate the joy in their vocation that the overwhelming majority of priests feel and to give them confidence that if they extend the invitation to consider the priesthood, they will find that Catholic men today, especially young men, are open to the challenge," he added.

Produced by Grassroots Films of Brooklyn, N.Y., "Fishers of Men" features testimony by several priests on the importance they place on their own vocation and a dramatic re-enactment portraying how a priest can inspire a vocation through his service to someone in need of priestly ministry.

Msgr. David J. Malloy, USCCB general secretary, described the film as "extremely moving" and added, "It reminds us why we became priests. I would love for my nephews to see it."

The film also is intended to be used by priests in discussions with men considering the priesthood.

In an address to the full body of bishops last November, Bishop William S. Skylstad of Spokane, Wash., USCCB president, said "the challenge of fewer priests is a reminder of how important it is to encourage vocations."

"Who can more surely invite another man to be a priest than a man who is a priest?" he asked. "And what priest is a more attractive inviter than a man who appreciates his own gift of priesthood?"

Company develops rose in honor of late pope

Representatives of Jackson & Perkins worked with Vatican officials over a period of several months to designate the rose.

In addition, the company will put 10 percent of sales at the disposal of the Vatican; church officials have designated the poor people in sub-Saharan Africa as the recipients.

The Vatican chose the pure white rose, which its creators are calling "luminous." The color is reminiscent of the late pope's white garb, and the description brings to mind the five luminous mysteries the pontiff added to the rosary in 2002.

"Pope John Paul, a man of peace and compassion, was one of the most revered leaders of our time," said Bill Williams, president of Jackson & Perkins, a nationally recognized gardening and outdoor decorating company.

Ten of the rose bushes have already been planted in the Vatican gardens overlooking St. Peter's Basilica.

"It's going to be popular with customers and perpetuate the good works and the sense of noble Christianity that we found in the heart of our late Holy Father," said Bill Ihle, the company's senior vice president of corporate relations and a member of Shepherd of the Valley Church in Central Point.

He helped develop the idea of honoring the pope.

Jackson & Perkins, a subsidiary of catalog giant Harry & David, has honored other prominent figures. Roses have been named for Princess Diana, President Ronald Reagan and first lady Nancy Reagan, Our Lady of Guadalupe, Habitat for Humanity, the Rev. Billy Graham and President John F. Kennedy.

In all cases, proceeds went to causes associated with the figure. What Ihle called "cause roses" are one way he gets to live out his faith, he said.

Proceeds from the Our Lady of Guadalupe Rose, for example, fund college scholarships for low-income Latinos. The 1997 Princess Diana Rose raised $750,000 to eradicate land mines and make prostheses for people injured by mines.

In 2004 Ihle went to Italy with his pastor, Augustinian Father Jim Clifford, and Portland Archbishop John G. Vlazny. The men planted an Our Lady of Guadalupe Rose in the pope's personal garden at Castel Gandolfo.

The pope, too ill to attend the ceremony, sent good wishes via U.S. Cardinal Edmund C. Szoka, currently president of the commission that governs Vatican City State.

The cardinal suggested a rose honoring the Vatican. But Ihle made the point that roses named after people have "much more emotional appeal."

Archbishop Vlazny and Father Clifford suggested Pope John Paul II.

This hybrid tea rose has been unveiled in honor of the late Pope John Paul II, who died a year ago April 2. The Vatican chose the pure white rose, which creators are calling "luminous."

After the pope died, Ihle met twice with Cardinal Szoka. Given choices between pure white, off-white and coral, the cardinal immediately liked the first one.

"This is a remembrance that people will be able to have for years and years to come of a man who moved them, moved their faith and moved the world to a better place," said Ihle.

Mind your posture and God's big feet

Trust in God leads to good things, even dancing

"Ouch!" I exclaimed.

"Oops, sorry," said God.

"Don't you apologize, Lord; it's Kevin's fault," grumbled Antonio, giving me his fourth dirty look of the day. "Quit dragging your feet, Kevin, and let's try it again from the top!"

And so God and I tried it again — ballroom dancing. Antonio, our instructor, started the music and God and I, arm in arm, started the steps. "One, two, three," I counted, trying to mind my foot placement.

"Up straight!" scolded Antonio, smacking me in the back. "Relax! This is supposed to be fun!"

Fun? It was excruciating, especially when God stepped on my toes again. And as you can imagine, God's got a pretty big foot.

"My bad," he offered.

Antonio cut the music and gave me another dirty look. "No, Lord, you're doing fine. It was Kevin again! Can you not hear the music?"

"Sure, but it's not that ..." I said. "I'm just not used to wearing shoes with heels."

"Bah!" he said, placing his hands on his hips. "You're just too tense. You need to loosen up, let go. Give yourself to the task at hand."

That was easier said than done. But it made me think back to how this all started ...

I was talking to God one day at the diocesan Pastoral Center, and he asked me if there was anything I wanted. Knowing God has a wicked sense of humor, I jokingly told him I wanted to learn to ballroom dance.

"Really?" he asked. "Well, gosh — me, too. What a great idea!"

I couldn't tell if he was serious, or if he was just saying that because he wanted to be involved in my life — that was God; always there, whether you wanted him to be or not.

Next thing I know, we're in Antonio's studio, trying on ballroom dancing shoes and stretching our legs. Since it was all my idea, I suggested I lead when we danced.

It was a bad idea.

"I'm not sure I'm cut out for this," I said. "It's too hard. I just can't do it."

Antonio was disappointed, muttering under his breath. God just stared silently at his big, shiny shoes. "Would you like me to lead, Kevin?" he asked.

Murray's Musings

KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

I didn't respond right away. Surely letting God lead would make sense, but the thought of letting go, of giving him control, was a bit frightening. I like being in control of my life, or at least thinking that I am.

But that's not really the case, is it?

"Okay," I conceded. "God, I'm in your hands."

God returned a warm smile.

"OK, let's do it right this time!" snapped Antonio, clapping his hands and starting the music. And off we went.

God led me around the floor, patient and mindful as I stumbled along, concentrating on my feet, my posture, the rhythm of the music. But then, when I looked up into God's eyes, saw his reassuring smile, it all made sense. And I let myself go.

God whisked me around the room, but I had no trouble keeping up with the pace he set — whether we were waltzing or doing the mambo, the foxtrot, the cha-cha-cha; whether we were spinning or dipping — God never gave me more than I could handle.

And I was surprised how great a dancer I could be, there in God's arms, secure in his gentle embrace.

Eventually the music ended, and Antonio applauded with tears in his eyes. "I knew you could do it, Kevin," he said.

"So did I," whispered God.

I hugged him. "Thank you, God. This was a great idea."

As we slipped off our dancing shoes, God asked me, "So, what would you like to conquer next?"

I thought about it a moment. "Why don't you decide what's next, God? You haven't led me astray so far."

He grinned. "I've always wanted to try bungee jumping."

I started to protest, but then gave in — I knew I had nothing to fear.

And it's amazing what we can accomplish and where we can go, if only we're brave enough to let God lead.

Da Vinci decoded

Truth won't lie in film, but in church teaching

Like a runaway freight train, the movie version of the mega best-seller, "The Da Vinci Code," is barreling toward us. Unless, as an answer to a prayer, the movie is an unwatchable dud, we need to get ready for its May release.

By now the allegations of the book are well-known. Sales of 40 million copies will do that. The author, Dan Brown, sets up an international murder mystery and claims, along the way, that Jesus wasn't divine, he married Mary Magdalene and their offspring are roaming around Europe hoping to release this strange news to billions of Christians. What a tale!

If you've read the book, you are probably well aware of the controversy over its questioning of the divinity of Jesus, as well as the historical accuracy of Brown's depiction of Jesus, the Catholic Church and Leonardo Da Vinci's works of art.

Brown has a convincing and captivating writing style that makes what he writes believable. For many people the book represents truth. The movie will likely have a bigger audience. The book makes claims about the Catholic Church and the Catholic faith that people will question.

Fortunately, you can easily learn the truth and find answers to questions. The Catholic Communication Campaign and the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops have created a Web site, www.jesusdecoded.com, which will provide factual answers to some of the questions raised by the film.

The bishops' conference is sponsoring the Web site for two good reasons. First is the acknowledgement that the movie is going to create a great deal of interest in our faith. Their hope is that people who come out of the movie with questions about their faith or the Catholic Church can find factual answers at www.jesusdecoded.com.

It would be tempting for the site to attack the poor scholarship Brown demonstrated in his book, but instead the Web site gives serious answers to important questions. For example, the centerpiece of the book, and presumably the movie, is that the Catholic Church has somehow brutally suppressed the role of Mary Magdalene.

Catholics & the Media

DAVID HAINS
GUEST COLUMNIST

But if the Catholic Church really wanted to suppress Mary Magdalene's role, wouldn't it have deleted the sentences in three of the four Gospels where she is the first person to hear, "He is risen," the most important words in history? In the other Gospel (John 20:10), Mary Magdalene is the first person the resurrected Jesus speaks to.

The second reason for the existence of the Web site is the pastoral role that the Catholic Church plays. If you step back from the controversy of the book and film, you realize that it probably won't really have much impact on a worldwide church of more than 1 billion souls. But from a pastoral point of view, it is unacceptable for even one person to develop a distorted view of Jesus Christ or his church based on a movie. That individual, like a lost sheep, is as important as the whole world.

The bishops' conference is also producing a one-hour television documentary, "Jesus Decoded." It will be available to NBC affiliates for airing during the last weeks of May, just as the movie is released. There are two NBC affiliates in the diocese — WCNC in Charlotte and WXII in Winston-Salem. WYFF in Greenville, South Carolina broadcasts into the Asheville area. The Web site says the stations have not indicated yet if they plan to run the program.

The trailer for the movie "The Da Vinci Code" has the audacity to end with the words, "Seek the truth." That is always a good idea, but don't expect to find it in a movie theatre. For real answers, check out www.jesusdecoded.com.

David Hains is director of communication for the diocese. Contact him at dwhains@charlottediocese.org.

One step forward, two steps back

Wanting too much can lead to unhappiness

Have you noticed how many times we take one step forward, only to then take two steps backward? It makes one wonder about the real meaning of progress in this life.

We have computers that cut our work in half, and yet I know many people who have been hospitalized with neck, back, eye and hand problems because of them.

Recently I purchased a Prius hybrid car that consumes less gas and emits fewer fumes. When a friend heard this, he berated me, saying its batteries are highly toxic and difficult to dispose of when they go dead.

In conversation with a physical therapist, I learned that the percentage of children with diabetes is growing. When I asked why this is so, she replied: "There are many reasons, some of them congenital, but one cause is the corn syrup in many of our foods. This has a tendency to break down the pancreas and cause diabetes."

We have come a long way in enriching our foods and making them more flavorful, but when we compare a home-grown tomato to a hothouse tomato, we quickly realize we haven't made as much progress as we thought. Many of our foods have lost their natural flavors.

Recently, I read that NBC will offer a service in which breaking news will be flashed to people with video cell phones (for an additional fee, of course). We have come a long way from the days of Dick Tracy in the comics. He had a video wristwatch, and we fantasized about owning one.

But is this real progress?

The word "calm" in Greek means to come out of the torrid heat into a sheltered place. With minute-to-minute news coverage at our fingertips, isn't it a little like staying out in the hot sun too long and making our heads spin?

In the Book of Ecclesiastes we read: "For when I considered all the things that I had done and the energy I had expended in doing them, it was clear that the whole of it was futility and a grasping at the wind, and none of it was profitable under the sun."

If the author of the Book of Ecclesiastes were here today, he would tell us that all life is vanity. We talk a good game about progress, but in reality it's not true.

We live in the most advanced civilization in history. It is also a civilization that has devised ways to annihilate itself.

The author of Ecclesiastes would remind us that nothing in this life is perfect. We must accept and live with our imperfections.

But most of all, we must not allow momentary happiness to be overrun by a restless dissatisfaction that forever strains after what it cannot have.

"Cherish the happiness of the moment, especially if you are young," he would say, "and most important of all, see that it can always be improved; put your hearts into making this happen."

Pope says main task of evangelizers is to lead people to Jesus

The Pope Speaks

POPE

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The basic mission of Jesus' Twelve Apostles and of those who evangelize today is not to spread an idea, but to lead people to Jesus and gather them into a single family, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Addressing some 35,000 people in St. Peter's Square March 22 for his weekly general audience, the pope gave the second in a series of talks about the apostles and the church.

In each of the four Gospels, he said, Jesus' call of the Twelve Apostles is the first step of his public ministry following his baptism in the Jordan River.

Pope Benedict said that, especially in the Gospel of Luke, "the call to follow him comes after they have listened to Jesus' first preaching and experienced the first marvelous signs he performed," especially the episode in which they catch a huge net full of fish after having little success.

In the Gospel of John, Jesus asks his future disciples, "What are you looking for?" and they ask him, "Where do you live?"

"Jesus' response is an invitation, 'Come and see,' 'Come in order to see.' The adventure of the apostles begins as an encounter between individuals who open themselves to one another. The disciples begin to have direct knowledge of the Master," the pope said.

"In fact, they are not called to announce an idea, but to give witness to a person," he said. "Before being sent to evangelize, they must stay with Jesus, establishing a personal relationship with him."

The Twelve, the pope said, were Jewish men expecting the Messiah and the coming kingdom of God. They were called first to proclaim the message among their fellow Jews, "in the light of God's special relationship with Israel, the covenant community," the pope said.

Jesus was sent to gather Israel together again, the pope said. "Through this gathering, the kingdom of God would be announced to all peoples."

Once Jesus died and rose again, it became clear that the apostles' mission was to go to all nations, making them disciples of Jesus, Pope Benedict said.

Setting aside his prepared text, the pope said, "This mission continues. The mandate of the Lord always is to gather all people in the unity of his love and his faith."

"This is our hope and our mandate: to contribute to this universality, this true unity with the richness of (different) cultures in communion with Our Lord Jesus Christ," he said.

Confusion at the tower of Babel

Diversity of humans part of God's divine

Q. I always pray for divine help to make us be of one faith, one Lord, living together in love as brothers and sisters of Christ. This makes me wonder why, in the book of Genesis, in the story of the tower of Babel, the Lord says, "Let us go down and confuse their language so they will not understand each other" and be scattered over the world.

This only causes people to be of different nationalities and customs, and leads to animosity toward one another. Can you explain why God would do this? (New York)

A. Obviously, God did not desire animosity between peoples, but according to the story as we hear it in Genesis there was a reason the Lord wanted the people spread out.

At creation, God told the first humans to multiply and fill the earth. As Jesuit Father Richard Clifford points out in the New Jerome Biblical Commentary, until Chapter 9 of Genesis, the emphasis was on multiplying; then attention was given to "filling the earth."

To make this happen, we read that God assigned to each branch of the people a particular area of land and told them to take possession of their inheritance. (See, for example, Deuteronomy 32:8-9.)

The people refused to go, however. They were comfortable where they were, and rather than possess their lands they chose to band together, build a huge city and top it off with a tower that would reach to the sky.

As the story goes, their defiance of God, their proud intention to "make a name for ourselves" rather than scatter over the earth (Gn 11:4), brought God's punishment by fulfilling his creative intent in another way: making it impossible for them even to communicate with each other.

Of the many ziggurats (sacred temple towers made of bricks) in Mesopotamia, the one in Babylon, not far from present-day Baghdad, was especially renowned at the time. Part of the great temple of the god Marduk, it had several terraces and reached nearly 70 feet high. Perhaps it was the model for the tower proposed in Genesis.

The Babylonians claimed that the name of their city meant the "gate of God," which may be where the biblical people got the idea of a tower that would reach to the heavens.

The Hebrew name for Babylon, however, was Babel, also literally the gate of God, but which they also explained as coming from the Hebrew word to confuse, to mix. Thus their tower became a place of confusion.

Another and different level of the tower story in Genesis, however, is that it could explain the wide variety of languages on the earth. The belief that there was once a common language for all early human beings was widespread in the ancient world. And they were always anxious to know the origins — of people, places, customs and speech.

Genesis 11 served not only as their explanation of these diversities. It also was another of the lessons that abound in Genesis that the God of the Hebrews is beyond all gods, supreme on the earth and supreme among nations, and that disobedience to him, violence against his created harmony, always results in disaster and destruction.

A PENNY FOR YOUR PRAYERS

Louisiana woman's penny project sends prayers, support to U.S. troops

BY JANET MARCEL
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

THIBODAUX, La. — The words "In God We Trust" on the U.S. penny were the inspiration for Thibodaux resident Sally Sobert's Power of Prayer Penny Project, which she began shortly after U.S. military forces invaded Iraq in 2003.

"When President (George W.) Bush first started to talk about a war with Iraq, there were a lot of people who were against sending our troops over there. I wanted to find a way to show our soldiers that we cared about them, that we were praying for them and that no matter whether we believed in the war or not, we supported them," Sobert said.

She said she had witnessed the power a prayer coin had on a friend of hers who received it while she was recovering from an injury, and the memory of it stayed with her.

"Whenever my friend rubbed the coin, it brought her comfort," she told the Bayou Catholic, newspaper of the Diocese of Houma-Thibodaux.

Sobert's prayer pennies for the military are spray-painted red or blue, then affixed to a card that reads: "God has so blessed America. You are one of his many blessings. Thank you. Thanks be to God for you. Keep this penny as a reminder that our prayers are with you. Thank you for serving our country and for protecting the world. God bless you and keep you."

The project has two goals. The first is to let those serving the country know that people's prayers and support are with them by giving them the military penny card. The second goal is asking people to pray for the troops by distributing penny cards that contain the prayer for peace.

To date, according to Sobert, more than 50,000 of the military penny cards have been distributed to troops in the U.S. and Iraq.

The project has been an ecumenical effort, with people from different religious denominations helping with everything from donating pennies to spray-painting them and affixing them to the cards.

Sobert needs thousands of pennies, but she said she has had no problems getting them.

"As word of the project got out, I literally had people coming up to me and giving me pennies," she said.

Some local organizations have also collected pennies for the cause, including St. Joseph Co-Cathedral in Thibodaux and the Bayou Community Band, which collected pennies at its concerts.

When 4,400 members of the National Guard from the area were deployed to Iraq, Brig. Gen. Hunt Downer of Houma requested military penny cards for each of them. He presented the cards to the soldiers while they were stationed at Fort Hood, Texas, to let them know that the people of south

Sally Sobert designed the penny cards as a way to show support to those serving their country both at home and abroad. To date, more than 50,000 penny cards have been distributed to military personnel in the U.S. and Iraq.

Louisiana would be praying for them.

Word of the project has spread throughout Louisiana and beyond. Currently Sobert is working with a group called Operation Lifeline from New Castle, Pa., which sends goody boxes to military personnel in Iraq.

Sobert has received postcards and letters from people all across the country that have learned of the project. Some want to request information about the project and others just want to thank her.

Last Dec. 18, Capt. Bill Roberts, a

20-year Army veteran stationed in Baghdad, Iraq, called Sobert and told her he had had one of her military penny cards for 10 months. He said he "feels the prayers."

The Diocese of Houma-Thibodaux's chapter of the Marian Servants of the Word has adopted the project as a ministry. Members sometimes work together in assembly-line fashion placing glue dots on the pennies, affixing them to the military and prayer cards and preparing them for delivery or shipment.

CHARLOTTE — As the fate of millions of illegal immigrants is considered in the Senate, thousands of people have taken to the streets in cities across the country, including here in the Diocese of Charlotte.

The eight-block march from Holy Cross Church in Kernersville to the town's Municipal Building drew an estimated 1,000 people March 25. A rally at Marshall Park in Charlotte drew an estimated 6,000 people March 25.

Although Bishop Peter J. Jugis was unable to attend the Charlotte rally, his letter to Vatican officials relatively quiet about 'The Da Vinci Code'

VATICAN CITY — Is "The Da Vinci Code" on the Vatican's radar?

You wouldn't know it by public pronouncements.

Vatican officials have said little or nothing about the book, which has sold more than 40 million copies worldwide, or the upcoming movie, expected to open the Cannes Film Festival in May.

The dominant school of thought at the Vatican is that it is always best to ignore a book or film that presents the church unfairly.

"You're only feeding the publicity," said one Vatican official. "I don't think the Vatican will say much about this movie when it comes out — if anything."

But not everyone feels that way, and there are signs that the Code phenomenon may be reaching the critical mass

Opus Dei called 'complete opposite' of 'The Da Vinci Code' portrayal

WASHINGTON — The impression of Opus Dei conveyed in Dan Brown's novel, "The Da Vinci Code," is "the complete opposite of what Opus Dei is about," said Brian Finnerty, U.S. spokesman for the international Catholic organization.

The book portrays Opus Dei as a secretive cult within the church plotting to take over the church and willing to kill those who stand in its way.

One of the main characters in the book is a murderous albino Opus Dei monk named Silas.

In fact Opus Dei, headed by a bishop, is a personal prelature — part of the hierarchical structure of the church — and it has no monks.

With the vast public attention given to the book over the past three years, and now with the movie coming out in May, Opus Dei is using the Kansas City Royals baseball player Mike Sweeney poses before a March 9 spring training game. The five-time All-Star first baseman gives a lot of praise to God and uses him as a beacon to guide his life. Sweeney plans to join players around the league in November on a pilgrimage to meet Pope Benedict XVI in an effort to bring Catholic values into Major League Baseball.

Catholic baseball player thanks God for many blessings

SURPRISE, Ariz. (CNS) — It was a cool and crisp morning at spring training camp for the Kansas City Royals baseball team in Surprise.

Wearing a bright blue jersey with the number 29 stitched on the back, first baseman Mike Sweeney worked on his bunting skills.

The five-time All-Star said he was excited to be back at camp and had a lot to be thankful for this spring.

"I'm healthy, blessed with a great wife and two beautiful children and at times I ask the Lord, 'Why are things so good?'" said Sweeney.

"I know it's due to his mercy, grace and love for me," he said.

As a Catholic athlete, Sweeney gives a lot of praise to God and uses him as a beacon to guide his life.

During a time when some of baseball's biggest stars have been surrounded by controversy about the use of steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs, Sweeney credits the church in keeping his mind, body, and soul pure.

"Without the gift of the Catholic Church and being able to receive the Eucharist, I would probably be the guy experimenting with steroids, drugs and infidelity," he said.

"I get filled up by my relationship with God," he said.

When they are on the road for weeks at a time, Sweeney and other members of the Royals seek out a local church before their Sunday games. Attending services on a regular basis has really strengthened his love for the Lord, he said.

At times in the past, he said, he "would just go through the motions at Mass," but in the last few years he has developed "a heartfelt love for the Eucharist."

"I truly believe in Christ's presence and feel such an honor to receive it," he said.

For baseball players, the goal of the season is to win the World Series in October. Sweeney believes his team is talented enough to make the Series but he knows that, win or lose, something special awaits him in November.

Players from around the league plan to make a pilgrimage to meet with Pope Benedict XVI in an effort to bring Catholic values into Major League Baseball.

"I spoke with (St. Louis Cardinals pitcher) Jeff Suppan, and he said meeting the pope (last November) was a life-changing experience," Sweeney said.

"Getting on his knee and kissing the pope's ring changed him forever. I want to experience that," he said.

Poll shows many want religious history in public school textbooks

FAIRFIELD, Conn. (CNS) — Religious history and traditions should not be kept out of public school classrooms or textbooks, according to a national poll conducted by the Sacred Heart University Polling Institute.

According to results released March 7, more than 79 percent of respondents said religious traditions should be included in public school textbooks and the same percentage also said it was important to teach religious history in public schools.

But some respondents indicated they were not always happy with the way their religious traditions are portrayed in textbooks.

Thirty-six percent said public school textbooks frequently misrepresent their religious history. Twenty-six percent said misrepresentation does not happen or seldom occurs, and 36 percent were unsure.

Among Catholics, 34 percent believe textbooks misrepresent their religion, while 35 percent of Protestants believe their faith is misrepresented.

More than half of all respondents, 57 percent, suggested publishers allow religious groups to review, but not edit, public school textbooks for accuracy prior to their release. Another 27 percent did not agree and 14 percent were unsure.

Among Catholics and Protestants, support for such textbook reviews was 63 percent and 62 percent, respectively.

"A majority of Americans polled seem to indicate that not only do religious histories matter, but getting them right matters as well," said June-Ann Greeley, assistant professor of religious studies at Sacred Heart University.

The Sacred Heart University institute's poll was completed via 1,000 telephone interviews with residents nationwide Feb. 9-15. The margin of error for the survey was plus or minus 3 percent.

Pope, cardinals discuss several issues, including dialogue with Islam

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI and most of the world's cardinals sat down for closed-door discussions on a number of administrative and pastoral questions, including dialogue with Islam.

The pope presided over the day of reflection and prayer March 23, the day before he inducted 15 new cardinals, who also were invited to the meeting in the Vatican's synod hall.

There was no formal agenda, but the pope and cardinals discussed the condition of retired bishops; the question raised by (Archbishop Marcel) Lefebvre and the liturgical reform desired by the Second Vatican Council; and questions connected with the dialogue between the church and Islam.

Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick of Washington said the discussion on Islam reflected the shared recognition that "somehow we've got to relate to Islam, because it's such a major force in the world."

"I think (the pope) is concerned that fundamentalist Islam is hostile to every other faith. That's a concern of all of us," Cardinal McCarrick said.

He said participants were worried about the fate of Christian minorities in some Muslim countries.

In his own remarks to the assembly, the cardinal said he stressed the need to encourage moderate Islamic leaders to "speak out and proclaim an Islam which is tolerant and able to work with others."

Others said that, while interfaith dialogue was important, perhaps more important right now is practical cooperation with Muslims — as a sign of dialogue in action.

It was the pope's idea to convene the meeting, and Vatican sources said it signaled a strong advisory role for the world's cardinals under the new pontificate.

For new cardinals, a ceremony full of symbols

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The main elements in the ceremonies surrounding the creation of new cardinals are red, hat, church and ring.

When Pope Benedict XVI elevated 15 new members into the College of Cardinals March 24, they already were dressed in their new red cassocks.

As French Cardinal Albert Vanhoye, one of the 15, told Vatican Radio: "Red is the color of love, of fire, and it is also the color of the Passion. It is said that the cardinals must be ready even to shed their blood" for Christ and his church.

One by one, the new cardinals approached Pope Benedict and knelt before him so he could place the four-cornered red hat, called a biretta, on their heads.

Next, each cardinal was given a scroll testifying to his new office and containing the name of his titular church in Rome.

By receiving the "title" to a Rome church, each cardinal formally became part of the clergy of Rome. The status connects the modern tradition of the College of Cardinals electing a new pope to the early church practice by which the bishop of Rome was elected by the clergy of Rome.

Over the coming months, the new cardinals will "take possession" of their titular churches in a brief ceremony, although their official responsibilities to the churches do not go beyond affection and prayerful concern.

Cardinal Sean P. O'Malley of Boston was given the title to Santa Maria della Vittoria, a 17th-century church particularly famous as the home of Gianlorenzo Bernini's statue of "St. Teresa in Ecstasy."

The cardinal's new status and new relationship with the pope were to be sealed with a ring at a March 25 Mass.

The Vatican press office explained the rite is a "sign of dignity, of pastoral concern and of the most solid communion with the see of Peter."

When handing out the rings, Pope Benedict was to say to each cardinal: "Receive the ring from the hand of Peter and know that with the love of the prince of the apostles your love for the church will be reinforced."

Salisbury youth wins prestigious scholarship

SALISBURY — Virginia Ball, a member of the diocesan Youth Advisory Council, recently won North Carolina State University's prestigious Park Scholarship.

Virginia, a parishioner of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury and a senior at North Rowan High School, plans to major in psychology, a field she discovered after taking an advanced-placement psychology course in high school.

The Park Scholarship, established in honor of N.C. State alumnus and media mogul Roy H. Park, is given annually to 35 in-state students and to 15 out-of-state students. For North Carolina residents, the award is worth $59,000.

As reported in the Salisbury Post, Virginia's parents both went to N.C. State; her brother is currently a student and her grandfather was a professor there.

She was one of two North Rowan High School students nominated and was chosen from about 900 other applicants. The field was first narrowed to 200, and, after a round of regional interviews, 100 students headed to N.C. State for final interviews.

While Virginia felt her confidence pushed her ahead of the other finalists, she believes her resume helped, too.

As an active member of the diocesan Youth Advisory Council, Virginia is part of a 20-member group that meets one weekend a month to plan an annual conference for Catholic youth.

At North Rowan High School, she is student body president, a member of the Key Club, Anchor Club, National Honor Society and captain of the Quiz Bowl team.

Middle school students attend Extreme retreat enable participants to enter into the experience of God through new ways, said Peg Ruble, associate director of diocesan youth ministry.

Retreat organizers used workshops, art and scripture to illustrate the Annunciation of Mary and the life of Jesus and to address topics of concern for middle school students.

"I hope they walk away from the retreat with a deeper love and appreciation for Christ, his church and the cult of saints, as well as the beautiful art that has been created in western culture," said Paul Kotlowski, director of diocesan youth ministry.

Ruble said one new experience was praise and worship music, which most of the participants had not been exposed to before.

"The praise and worship music brought things into depth in a new way," said Lemaat Michael, a parishioner of Our Lady of Lourdes Church in Monroe. "It was really a cool way to worship."

Workshops addressed such topics as prayer, Mary and peer pressure.

"The prayer gave me insight to not be shy to ask for what I want when praying and talking to God," said Danielle Hobbs, a parishioner of Our Lady of Lourdes Church.

"One of our most popular workshops was 'What would Jesus do for a Klondike bar?' dealing with moral decision-making," said Ruble.

"The Extreme Faith Retreat was a very touching event that changed the way I think about my religion," said Christine Zabel, a parishioner of Our Lady of Lourdes Church. "I was able to experience Jesus in new ways."

IMMIGRATION REFORM

Thousands gather to voice immigration concerns

those gathered was read in English and Spanish by Franciscan Sister Andrea Inkrott, director of Hispanic ministry for the Diocese of Charlotte.

In the letter, Bishop Jugis said he fully supports the U.S. bishops' campaign for immigration reform.

"All sides of the debate agree that our country's immigration system is in need of reform," said Bishop Jugis in his letter.

"It is my hope and prayer that all involved will work for legislation that will implement an immigration policy that will protect our national security interests, ensure the common good and maintain respect for the law as well as respect the human rights of those who come to our country as refugees from political and economic hardship in their home countries," he said.

Bishop Jugis said it is a Christian mandate given by God to "love, to offer charity to those in need and to protect and nurture human life in all its stages."

"The immigrants of the past and of today bring with them wonderful gifts and talents that they want to share with those around them," said the bishop. "Let us work together to make it possible for all to live with dignity and without fear in this country, which has been built by immigrants for more than 200 years."

At the Kernersville rally, marchers carrying a banner of Our Lady of Guadalupe, the patron saint of the Americas, led the procession to the town hall. They carried signs that read "We do pay taxes" and "We are no longer foreigners."

Judge George Bedsworth of Forsyth District Court spoke about obeying the law and told the immigrants gathered to make every effort to learn English, a remark met with applause.

An estimated 1,000 people march from Holy Cross Church in Kernersville to the city's town hall as part of a pro-immigration rally March 25.

Heather MacKenzie, an immigration lawyer in Winston-Salem, called on Hispanics to organize and lobby Congress.

"We tried to ask the community to call the Congress ... and to let them know that we're concerned about what's going on down there," said Martin Mata, director of Hispanic ministry at Holy Cross Church.

In Washington, the Senate Judiciary Committee seemed to answer many people's prayers, for the time being, anyway.

On March 27, the committee voted 12-6 to send the full Senate a bill that would give the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the country a chance to legalize their status and would provide 1.5 million temporary visas to agricultural workers in a new guest worker program.

Another 400,000 "green cards" or permanent resident visas would be available to people in various industries.

The bill would double the size of the Border Patrol and provide more funds for high-tech equipment to monitor the border.

The Senate began debate on the bill March 28. Floor discussion is expected to take two weeks before the Senate votes.

The final Senate bill will need to be reconciled with legislation passed in the House in December that deals with enforcement-related issues. Even in their approval of enforcement provisions, the Senate committee rejected many elements included in the House bill.

The committee refused to adopt amendments that would make it a crime to be in the United States illegally or to provide assistance to undocumented immigrants. Illegal immigration currently is a violation of civil law. Religious organizations are among the most vocal opponents of those provisions in the House bill.

In Charlotte, Bishop Jugis said prayer and support for immigrants would continue.

"The Catholic Church ... will continue to offer spiritual and material assistance to our brothers and sisters, doing what we can to help them feel at home," he said.

TWO FROM DIOCESE SERVE ON GOVERNOR'S COUNCIL

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

RALEIGH — Eduardo Bernal and Francisco Risso of the Diocese of Charlotte have been named to the Governor's Advisory Council on Hispanic/Latino Affairs.

District Court Judge Wanda Bryant swore them in at the North Carolina Museum of Natural History in Raleigh March 10.

Bernal is the Hispanic ministry coordinator for the diocese's Smoky Mountain Vicariate. Risso directs the Western North Carolina Workers' Center in Morganton.

They join 13 other council members from throughout North Carolina.

Risso fills a council vacancy in the Morganton area and will focus on worker issues. Bernal, the first person appointed the council from far-western North Carolina, will represent the Hispanic community at large.

Martha Oyala-Crowley, council chair, said Bernal was chosen for the council because he's well-known for his work with Hispanic people in the Smoky Mountain region.

Gov. James Hunt created the council in August 1998 at the request of Hispanic leaders. He also created the Office of Hispanic/Latino Affairs, which has a two-person paid staff.

The advisory council's members are unpaid volunteers. Fifteen are ex officio, nonvoting members: secretaries and commissioners of various state agencies such as the departments of Commerce, Revenue and Labor, as well as the attorney general and the governor's legal counsel.

The 15 voting members are all from the Hispanic community. There is no limit to how long a person can serve on the council.

Bernal, a native of El Salvador, has been the Smoky Mountain Vicariate's Hispanic ministry coordinator for four years.

His work includes outreach to the Hispanic community; training people as lectors and extraordinary ministers of holy Communion; organizing small faith communities; and translation.

"I have an insight into people's lives," Bernal said. "I want to learn how government works so I can do things better."

Risso, a parishioner at St. Charles Borromeo Church in Morganton, assists low-wage workers; helps immigrants understand their rights and assists them with work-related problems; and helps them file complaints with government agencies.

"I asked to be on the council," Risso said. "I think it's going to be valuable to work with the people from the government and see what kind of influence we have."

Both Bernal and Risso are concerned about immigration policy.

"Immigration is a consequence of globalization," Bernal said. "Goods move (across) the borders; people should be able to also."

He added that desiring a globalized economy but not wanting people to come to this country is "not real ... out of touch with reality."

"We want North Carolina to be as appreciative as possible of the contributions of the workers who come here," said Risso.

Computer-whiz cardinal answers medical questions as Vatican official

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — A trained theologian and self-taught computer whiz, Mexican Cardinal Javier Lozano Barragan now spends most of his time dealing with very technical medical questions.

The 73-year-old cardinal is president of the Pontifical Council for Health Care Ministry, which encourages the work of hospital chaplains, but goes well beyond strictly pastoral concerns.

"We must provide guidance on the various problems that face the world of health care today, from specific illnesses to technological discoveries, from political decisions to medical practice," Cardinal Lozano said.

Although Pope Benedict XVI has yet to make specific requests of the council, the cardinal said the pope's first encyclical, "Deus Caritas Est" ("God Is Love"), has set the framework for the council's activities.

The cardinal said the pope's encyclical told the church: "Love has something to say to us in our political decisions and our institutional decisions. It is not something ethereal."

Loving life

Cardinal Lozano said the more than 109,000 Catholic hospitals, clinics, rehabilitation centers and other health-related institutions around the world are a sign of the church's love for all people.

Another sign of love, he said, is his office's efforts to train and support Catholic doctors, nurses, pharmacists and researchers in their efforts to cure and care for the sick and to defend human life.

"The greatest challenge facing Catholic health providers today regards the dignity and sacredness of life," he said.

The problem is not just the legalization of abortion and growing acceptance of euthanasia, but efforts to violate the conscience of Catholic medical personnel by forcing them to participate in procedures they consider immoral, he said.

"There are many universities and many countries where you cannot become an obstetrician if you have not assisted at and performed a certain number of abortions," Cardinal Lozano said.

The council supports Catholics in defending their right to conscientious objection, and it lobbies for legislation recognizing that right.

Aiding the sick

Another major problem, he said, is posed by the AIDS pandemic, especially in Africa.

While the cardinal has been drawn into the debate over condoms — he insists that abstinence before marriage and fidelity within marriage are the best ways to prevent the spread of the disease — his focus is on getting people in developing countries access to the same drugs that save people with HIV/AIDS in wealthy countries.

He cajoles big pharmaceutical companies into lowering their prices, and he is not above begging for donations to the Vatican's Good Samaritan Foundation, which pays for antiretroviral treatment for the poorest AIDS patients.

In its two years of existence, the foundation has distributed almost $300,000, with all the money used to buy antiretroviral drugs at a discounted price.

"The nuncio in Ghana told me Mother Teresa's sisters, who have a home for people with AIDS, were bringing him 21 people to bury each month," the cardinal said. "Now it is one a month because they have antiretroviral drugs."

Cardinal Lozano has estimated that Catholic religious orders and institutions are responsible for about 25 percent of all the treatment offered to people living with HIV/AIDS around the world.

Showing the church's action against the pandemic is the only way to fight the widespread prejudice that the church is doing nothing because it is not handing out condoms, he said.

Cardinal Lozano said that during a visit to Lithuania he was interviewed on television and was asked, "Why does the church want to control people's sex lives?"

"I said, 'Look, each person faces two paths. One leads to life and the other to death. I have an obligation to tell you which leads to death and which leads to life, then you have an obligation to choose,'" he said.

The cardinal is a trained theologian and self-taught computer whiz who spends most of his time dealing with very technical medical questions.

Web of work

Cardinal Lozano was bishop of Zacatecas, Mexico, when he was appointed president of the council in 1996.

In the early days, he said, "I brought my own laptop (computer) to work" because the Vatican offices were not computerized.

In the 1980s, he personally put together a Web site for his diocese. His council was one of the first Vatican offices to have a Web site and it still functions independently of the Vatican site.

Although he managed to teach himself how to build a Web site, he said when he arrived in Rome he relied on books, assistants and consultants to educate him about health care issues.

"I had an obligation to study, to learn many things, and this is an obligation that continues," he said. "Otherwise, what good would I be doing? This is not an office concerned with fairy tales, but with real life-and-death issues."

A year after pope's death, people worldwide continue to show devotion

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — From starting prayer groups to cheering at the mention of his name, people around the world continue to show their devotion to Pope John Paul II.

A year after Pope John Paul's death, the Vatican still maintains a separate entrance to the grotto under St. Peter's Basilica where he is buried, and Pope Benedict XVI still cites his writings and example in his public speeches.

While the cause for Pope John Paul's canonization continues with interviews of people in Rome and Poland who were close to him, Pope John Paul prayer groups are springing up around the world.

Msgr. Slawomir Oder, the official promoter of the pope's sainthood cause, said the groups — one in Argentina calls itself "Juan Pablo Magno" (John Paul the Great) — not only support the cause with their prayers, but they study Pope John Paul's writings.

Pope Benedict does not appear jealous of the attention; in fact, from the beginning of his pontificate he has urged the church to continue to study the teachings of his predecessor.

Speaking to the Roman Curia in December, he said: "No pope has left us a quantity of texts equal to what he left us; no pope before him could visit the entire world like he did and speak directly to men and women of every continent."

"The Holy Father, with his words and his works, has given us great things; but no less important is the lesson he gave us from the chair of suffering and silence," Pope Benedict said.

In addition to the television movies, documentaries and books on the life of Pope John Paul, an Italian work focused specifically on the suffering.

"Let Me Go: The Strength in Weakness of John Paul II" was released March 15 in Italy and featured reflections by the pope's longtime secretary, Cardinal Stanislaw Dziwisz of Krakow, Poland, and by Dr. Renato Buzzonetti, the pope's personal physician.

"He always demonstrated an attitude of profound interior serenity which — despite some moments of visible human disappointment and impatience — led him to accept sickness, physical pain and forced inactivity from the hands of God," the doctor said.

The title of the book comes from the pope's last words, murmured in Polish: "Let me go to the house of the Father."

In his contribution to the book, Cardinal Dziwisz said Pope John Paul's life "from the beginning was marked by suffering, which he transformed into an instrument for his apostolate."

The Krakow cardinal said Pope John Paul's obvious suffering in silence and his death were his "last catechesis," telling the world that "moments of suffering and death must be lived in the light of faith, with love and Christian hope, in complete abandonment to the will of God."

The way Pope John Paul lived and the way he died have led millions of people to his tomb.

Archbishop Angelo Comastri, the papal vicar for Vatican City State, said that until Pope John Paul died an average of 300 people a day went down to the grotto below St. Peter's to visit the tombs of the popes.

Now, he said in early March, the daily number is 10 times greater and often reaches 20,000 on Sundays and holidays.

Pope Benedict, one of Pope John Paul's closest aides as prefect of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, obviously tries to connect with those devoted to his predecessor.

At the beginning of his pontificate, Pope Benedict seemed surprised when people would interrupt him — especially during a Mass homily — with applause and cheers.

When he would mention Pope John Paul, the reaction was immediate and predictable, and it did not take long for Pope Benedict to adjust his timing and, especially with young people, to emphasize his predecessor's name and let the crowds roar.

Private meetings, public appearances: A look at pope's first year

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Compared to Pope John Paul II's early years, Pope Benedict XVI appears to be going at a slower pace. All the same, his list of first-year accomplishments is impressive:

— In February, he named 15 new cardinals and convened them March 23 for a discussion on any topic they chose.

— Last fall, he embarked on a reconciliation effort with Lefebvrite traditionalists, meeting with excommunicated Bishop Bernard Fellay and convening top Vatican officials to discuss proposed solutions.

— In October, he opened up the Synod of Bishops to free discussion, joining in the debate at times on such topics as the priest shortage and priestly celibacy.

— In August, he presided over World Youth Day celebrations in Germany, winning the respect of young people with a serious demeanor and some thought-provoking talks. He also met with ecumenical leaders, Muslims, government ministers, bishops and seminarians.

— He has scheduled four foreign visits this year — to Poland, Spain, Germany and Turkey.

— Late last year, he reviewed the major documents of the Second Vatican Council 40 years after its close. Then, in a major talk to the Roman Curia, he explained the right way and wrong way to interpret the council's teachings.

— He moved quietly last summer to encourage the successful appointment of new Chinese bishops acceptable to both their government and the Vatican.

— Throughout the year, he presided over ecumenical liturgies and met with a number of ecumenical groups, pledging continued efforts toward Christian unity.

— He met several times with Jewish leaders, affirming the church's commitment to dialogue and reflecting on the Holocaust.

— In December, he named a new apostolic nuncio to the United States.

occasion "to get the word out about who we really are," Finnerty told Catholic News Service in a phone interview.

He said one of the things the organization has done is provide a brief description of the real Opus Dei for a new Web site funded by the Catholic Communication Campaign, www.jesusdecoded.com.

"Opus Dei" is Latin for "God's work," and members often refer to it simply as "the Work."

And what is the Work really about?

"Coming closer to God and finding God in everyday life," Finnerty said.

While the novel portrays it as being in opposition to the world, "Opus Dei is about seeing the world as a place of encounter with Christ," he said.

Faithful members

Russell Shaw, a Washington-based Catholic journalist and former media spokesman for the National (now U.S.) Conference of Catholic Bishops, told CNS he joined Opus Dei in 1980 and it has helped him develop "a richer, deeper, more meaningful relationship with God."

He said that even when he first became aware of Opus Dei, perhaps 15 years or so before he joined, he was attracted to its concept of a lay vocation, of seeing one's work in the secular world as a form of service to God.

As an Opus Dei member, "I try to do that, I try to cultivate that intention underlying the work that I do. But it's difficult. It's not 100 percent (successful)," he said.

Catherine Hickey of Larchmont, N.Y., called Opus Dei "a wonderful thing in my life." Now 71, she said she learned of Opus Dei in her late 30s when her oldest boy got involved in a club run by some of its members.

"I was very impressed with the young people. I loved their joy and their spirit of giving," she said.

As a busy mother of seven, she said Opus Dei's message that lay people could be "contemplatives in the midst of the world" was a new idea to her. She joined at the age of 39.

For the past 15 years Hickey has worked at the Rosedale Center of the South Bronx Educational Foundation, begun by local Opus Dei members and others to improve the education of girls in the South Bronx, one of New York City's poorest areas.

Staff and volunteers mentor and tutor the inner-city grade-school and high-school girls one-on-one after school and teach classes on Saturdays and in special summer programs, she said. The foundation runs a similar program for boys nearby at the Crotona Center.

Opus Dei's Midtown Educational Foundation in Chicago runs similar programs for disadvantaged boys and girls there.

Criticisms and secrecy

Father John Wauck, an American

Opus Dei is about "coming closer to God and finding God in everyday life."

Founded in Spain in 1928, Opus Dei now has more than 87,000 members in more than 60 countries, including 3,000 in the United States.

Members seek to make their faith infuse all aspects of life, including their jobs. Members are expected to attend daily Mass and to pray the rosary and engage in mental prayer, spiritual reading and meditation every day.

About 70 percent of Opus Dei members are supernumeraries, those who are married or who plan to marry. The rest commit themselves to lives of celibacy.

Of those members, about two-thirds live in Opus Dei centers and are called numeraries; the other third, called associates, live in their own homes. More than half the members around the world are women.

Opus Dei priest who teaches at Opus Dei's Pontifical University of the Holy Cross in Rome, has a personal Web log, known as a blog, on Opus Dei and "The Da Vinci Code."

He predicts the cilice and whip will be what moviegoers vividly remember about Opus Dei when they leave the theater.

The cilice (pronounced SIL-is), which is a belt or chain with sharp points, and the whip are used by numeraries for bodily mortifications.

The priest says Blessed Mother Teresa of Calcutta, founder of the Missionaries of Charity, also used the whip, known as "the discipline," but "everyone knows that's not what the Sisters of Charity are all about. And it's not what Opus Dei's about either."

In contrast to the "heavy knotted rope" that the monk character named Silas uses in the book, Father Wauck said the whip used by Opus Dei numeraries is "small and light enough to carry in a closed fist."

Linda Ruf of Chicago, an Opus Dei member for more than 20 years, has led parish information sessions in the Midwest.

She also appeared on television to discuss the errors in "The Da Vinci Code" — not just errors about Opus Dei, but about Christianity itself, where author Brown constructs an elaborate two-millennium conspiracy theory that challenges fundamental Christian beliefs.

"I was astounded that women were having faith crises over this," she told CNS.

Of the criticisms of Opus Dei that the novel uses to fashion a picture of a secretive sect within the church, she said, "Opus Dei, I'm sure, has made some mistakes in the past with individuals, and we should learn from some of those possible mistakes."

She said a recent book titled "Opus Dei" by John L. Allen Jr., an American journalist and author who covers the Vatican, "does a pretty good job of saying what some of Opus Dei's problems are and what some of its strengths are," giving voice to the critics but also reporting the organization's response to those criticisms.

Some critics claim Opus Dei recruits people aggressively and excessively controls the lives of members, but Shaw and Hickey described their decisions to join as a free choice without pressure from members.

Hickey said that while her children were involved in the organization's clubs, they were never asked to join.

Many benefits

Bruce Lachenauer, 46, of Irvine, Calif., a father of five and a partner in a large executive search firm, said that as a student at Northwestern University he was invited to participate in activities at the nearby Opus Dei center. "There was nothing high pressure about it," he said, and he didn't become interested until a couple of years later, after the center moved closer to campus.

He described himself as "a product of the '60s" who went to public school and to parish religious education classes that didn't get much beyond "how Jesus loves us."

"One of the first things Opus Dei helped me with was a theology class, where I learned so much more about my faith," he said.

Lachenauer said as an Opus Dei member he finds his faith "woven into every aspect of life," from his work environment to his relationships with family and friends.

He said he has invited "many friends to participate" in retreats, talks, parenting seminars and other activities sponsored by Opus Dei because he thinks they will benefit from those experiences.

He said he has invited some people to consider joining Opus Dei, but to his knowledge none have joined, although several friends have become "cooperators" — nonmembers who support Opus Dei financially or volunteer their time for some of its projects.

In Rome, women discuss 'Da Vinci Code' depiction of Mary Magdalene

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ROME — "The Da Vinci Code" came in for resounding criticism at a recent round-table discussion at the Marianum Pontifical Theological Faculty in Rome.

It was not a pick-it-apart session by church historians. Instead, four women spoke about Mary Magdalene and her distorted depiction in Dan Brown's book.

The moderator of the discussion, Marinella Perroni, a New Testament theologian, said "The Da Vinci Code" joins a list of books and other media treatments that exploit the figure of Mary Magdalene.

Perroni said caution is always needed when dealing with scriptural figures, but for some reason people feel free to take great liberties with Mary Magdalene.

Maria Luisa Rigato, a retired professor of exegesis at the Pontifical Gregorian University, said she found Brown's book entertaining fiction — but that it was clear to real scholars that Mary Magdalene was neither the wife nor the lover of Jesus.

The Catholic participants drew a sharp distinction between what is known about Mary Magdalene from the approved Gospels and what has been circulated for centuries in the so-called Gnostic gospels, rejected by the church long ago.

But a Protestant pastor, the Rev. Letizia Tomassone, said she thought the noncanonical gospels, although they are clearly later manuscripts, can be valid secondary sources of information.

In some of these later gospels, she said, Mary Magdalene appears as the "mediator of the resurrected Christ," which aligns with what the Gospel of St. John says about her being the first witness of the resurrection.

Mary Magdalene, Rev. Tomassone said, comes across as "one who knows how to heal the heart of a wounded community."

The experts generally agreed, however, that there is no scriptural evidence that Jesus and Mary were lovers, which is a key element in the plot of

"The Da Vinci Code."

Even the incomplete references in the Gnostic gospels about Jesus' special relationship with Mary Magdalene depict a "spiritual intimacy," not a sexual relationship, Rev. Tomassone said.

Rigato downplayed the impact of "The Da Vinci Code," saying it was "third-rate literature" compared to earlier treatments of similar subjects, like "The Last Temptation of Christ" by Nikos Kazantzakis.

"Dan Brown with his 40 million copies is nothing compared to the billions of copies of the Bible. It's something you consume and forget and will not affect the faith in the least," she said.

But Miriam Diezi Bosch, a Catholic journalist who lectures on communications, said it was disturbing that a book like "The Da Vinci Code" was succeeding so well. Similar books may follow, she said.

The good thing is that "The Da Vinci Code" has given Catholics a chance to explain themselves, she said. The bad part is that Catholics clearly need to be better instructed in their faith, she added.

She said the church in particular needs better catechesis and more widely published scholarship on the figure of Mary Magdalene — something more profound than presenting her as "the icon of the fallen woman."

necessary to provoke something stronger from the Vatican.

Last year, Italian Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, formerly No. 2 at the Vatican's doctrinal congregation, said it was "truly sad and terrible" that "The Da Vinci Code" had become such a popular book among Italian high school students.

What left him aghast was that young people were uncritically accepting the novel's premise that the Catholic Church had tried to obliterate the feminine aspect from the Gospel narratives and from the life of the church.

"There is nothing more false," Cardinal Bertone said.

He pointed to the importance the church gives to Mary and the attention given in the Gospel to Jesus' female disciples, including the women who announced to the male disciples that Jesus had risen from the dead.

"There is nothing more false than the need to rediscover a — how can I say it — an 'amazon' Mary Magdalene in order to recuperate the presence of women" in the church, he said.

The papal preacher, Capuchin Father Raniero Cantalamessa, also blasted "The Da Vinci Code" in one of his last sermons to Pope John Paul II last year.

"In an unending stream of novels, films and plays, writers manipulate the figure of Christ under cover of imaginary and nonexistent new documents and discoveries. 'The Da Vinci Code' is but the last and most aggressive episode of the series. It is becoming a fashion, a literary genre," he said.

"The Da Vinci Code" is loosely based on writings called the Gnostic gospels, which the church rejected as part of the Christian canon many centuries ago.

It's unlikely that Pope Benedict XVI or most of the Vatican's top officials have even read the book. But if they went down to St. Peter's Square and looked in the backpacks of tourists and pilgrims, they'd probably be amazed at how many people are toting it around.

With the film version expected to reach an even bigger audience, some people think the Vatican may not be able to sit on the sidelines of this cultural battle. The strategy should be pro-active and not just defensive, they say.

"We need to point out the errors. But we also need to take advantage of the interest it's stirred up, to talk about real biblical scholarship and the real history of the church," said one Vatican official who works in communications.

Author says McGivney bio could help restore respect for priests

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ROME — Supporters of the sainthood cause of Father Michael McGivney are hoping he will become the first American-born parish priest to be canonized.

A new biography is introducing a wider audience to the 19th-century priest — and may also help restore respect for the many good priests in the United States, said one of the book's authors.

Julie M. Fenster, a historian who co-wrote "Parish Priest: Father Michael McGivney and American Catholicism," spoke about the book to U.S. priests and seminarians Feb. 27 at Rome's Pontifical North American College.

At a time when the image of the U.S. priest has been damaged by sexual abuse committed by a small minority of clergy, the book chronicles the good work of a priest who, after founding the Knights of Columbus, worked as a simple pastor until his death at age 38.

"I'm hoping this book might act as a gyroscope to reset some of the balance for people whose only exposure to parish priests is out of those headlines" on sexual abuse, Fenster said in an interview.

She said part of her motivation for writing the book was anger that so many good priests were being maligned because of the actions of a few.

Father McGivney, she said, provides a model for the kind of selfless pastoral work done by countless priests in the United States. His faith and Catholicism entered into every activity, whether preaching a sermon or playing baseball, she said.

"He believed that when you're having fun you should feel Catholic, too, not just when you're sitting in church," she said.

The book, released in January, has been on the New York Times extended bestseller list for six weeks.

Fenster was impressed with Father McGivney's return to parish work in Connecticut after making an important mark on society through the Knights of Columbus.

"He chose to draw back into the life he really wanted, as parish priest. He gloried in these little details that other people can get distracted away from," she said.

Father McGivney's work is considered influential in animating lay Catholics through the Knights of Columbus, and at the same time helping to remove the widespread anti-Catholic bias in U.S. society.

The Knights, a Catholic men's fraternal benefit society, has grown to include 1.7 million members. The organization sponsors educational, charitable and religious activities around the world.

Father McGivney's sainthood cause is now being reviewed by the Vatican, said Dominican Father Gabriel O'Donnell, postulator for the cause. He said a reported miracle of healing attributed to Father McGivney's intercession also has been submitted to the Vatican for study.

Father O'Donnell said he sees in Father McGivney's life an example of what Pope Benedict XVI described in his recent encyclical, "Deus Caritas Est" ("God Is Love").

"The obligation of the church to exercise charity is what Father McGivney was about," Father O'Donnell said.

One of Father McGivney's gifts, he said, was that he could speak to those at every level of society, relating well with the poor immigrant community of Catholics as well as those who were upwardly mobile, and forging connections between these groups.

Father O'Donnell said that, unlike saints of earlier centuries who were known for their extraordinary accomplishments, Father McGivney falls into the category of "the more modern saint, who is great because he did the ordinary things so well."

"He was humble, compassionate and charitable to a heroic degree, but only within the confines of an ordinary life," he said.

A time to examine commitment to Jesus

BY DAN LUBY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Shivering in the cold spring wind, the crowd buzzed all along the barriers marking the motorcade's route. Teenagers skipping school, grandmothers in old-world scarves and overcoats, VFW officers and union officials — they all crowded forward, hoping to get a glimpse of their hero and maybe obtain a handshake.

Off to one side, some college students stood smoking cigarettes, observing the commotion outside the university auditorium where the charismatic senator was speaking. In their accustomed pose of world-weary cynics, they smiled patronizingly at the crowd. You wouldn't see them getting so excited.

A roar went up when the limo turned the corner. The waiting faithful were galvanized, shouting, waving signs, calling out the senator's name. Suddenly, the college boys actually could see that famous face, feel the power of that megawatt smile.

To their amazement, they found themselves hoarse from cheering, jostling to the front of the barricade, feeling their hearts race and their hope rise just as much as any of the less sophisticated fans they'd mocked only minutes before.

It was a rush that left them excited for days.

Then the gravity of life began, imperceptibly, to pull them down. Friends smirked at their naive change of heart. The campaign meeting they'd vowed to attend turned out to conflict with a party. Exams loomed.

Before long, they were back to their old, jaded selves, wondering what had come over them.

Palm Sunday is the only day in the church's year that calls for two Gospels to be proclaimed — the glorious story of the cheering crowds greeting Jesus' arrival in Jerusalem and the heartbreaking narrative of his betrayal and execution.

The contrast is striking, as it's meant to be. It makes us examine the depth of our commitment to Jesus.

During this sacred and solemn week, may we reflect mindfully on our ongoing struggle against a divided heart and on Christ's example of fidelity.

Questions:

How can my observance of Holy Week deepen my commitment to the Gospel? What is one concrete way to maintain my enthusiasm for following Christ?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"All of you will have your faith shaken" (Mark 14:27)

Jazz pianist, composer to receive Laetare Medal

NOTRE DAME, Ind. (CNS) — Jazz legend Dave Brubeck has been named winner of the 2006 Laetare Medal presented by the University of Notre Dame.

The 85-year-old jazz pianist and composer is scheduled to receive the medal at the university's May 21 commencement.

Brubeck's art "helps us apprehend the fullness of creation," said Holy Cross Father John Jenkins, Notre Dame president.

"His life and his music splendidly interweave the celebration of beauty with the imperative to worship," he said.

The award, first given in 1883, honors a Catholic "whose genius has ennobled the arts and sciences, illustrated the ideals of the church, and enriched the heritage of humanity."

Brubeck became known for his innovations as a piano player and composer. Among his compositions are ballets, a musical, an oratorio, cantatas and a Mass.

In 1951, Time magazine described Brubeck as "the most exciting new jazz artist at work today."

Earlier in March, Brubeck was given the Christopher Life Achievement Award by the Christophers, a nonprofit organization promoting Christian values in the mass media.

Previous medal recipients include Cardinal Joseph L. Bernardin of Chicago.

Compendium of catechism goes on sale in paperback

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The Compendium of the Catechism of the Catholic Church, a 200-page synthesis of the 1992 catechism, is available in paperback from USCCB Publishing, the publishing office of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Both the paperback version and a hardcover edition to be published soon will be available in English and Spanish.

The compendium, made up of 598 questions and answers, echoes to some degree the format of the Baltimore Catechism, which was standard in many U.S. Catholic parishes and schools from 1885 to the 1960s.

It also includes two appendices — a list of Catholic prayers in English or Spanish, side by side with the Latin versions, and a list of "formulas of Catholic doctrine," including the Ten Commandments, the beatitudes, the theological and cardinal virtues, and the spiritual and corporal works of mercy.

Msgr. Daniel Kutys, USCCB deputy secretary for catechesis, said members of the U.S. bishops' Committee on Catechesis have recommended that the compendium "be used as a standard reference companion to which teachers and catechists refer their students in much the same way they use Bibles for instruction."

"It is not meant to replace religion textbooks, but to augment and complement them," he added.

Pope Benedict XVI has said the compendium "contains, in concise form, all the essential and fundamental elements of the church's faith."

Editor's Note: The Compendium of the Catechism of the Catholic Church may be ordered online at www.usccbpublishing.org, or by phone at (800) 235-8722.

Belmont Abbey College hosts educators, students at annual physics conference

BELMONT — Nearly 200 participants — professors, teachers and students from North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia who have a passion for physics — recently attended a joint conference at Belmont Abbey College.

The 11th annual meeting of the North Carolina and Southern Atlantic Coast Chapters of the American Association of Physics Teachers (AAPT) and the Society of Physics Students was held at the college March 24-25.

"The purpose of this conference is to share new ideas with educators who specialize in the field of physics," said Dr. Rajive Tiwari, conference coordinator and professor of physics at Belmont Abbey College.

"We want to meet the needs of physics educators in our region and further an interest in education in this field, its research, the applications of technology; and assist in overall teaching effectiveness," said Tiwari.

Speakers included Paul Hewitt, author of "Conceptual Physics," and Dewey Dykstra, professor of physics at Boise State University.

In addition to student projects and special sessions, there also were hands-on workshops such as techniques in photographing the night sky and using satellite imagery and software for environmental physics.

The AAPT presented special recognition awards for students and teachers to highlight excellence in the field of physics.

"We are pleased to provide an opportunity for these professionals to share their insights and experience with peers and assist in the growth and development of individuals who will design future energy sources," said Richard Jiran of Duke Energy, one of the conference sponsors.

Founded in 1876, the college is inspired by the Benedictine monastic tradition. Listed on the National Register of Historic Places, the college and Abbey Basilica greet thousands of visitors yearly.

Easter and the art of being yourself

Harmonizing with God's plan brings truth, fulfillment

The resurrection teaches us about the purpose of creation. Easter points us in the direction of eternal joy.

When Christ taught us to love one another, he was inviting us to become part of the kingdom of heaven. Hold on to this awesome thought.

The supreme law of love teaches us that the best thing we can do with our life is give it away. This is our fundamental purpose in life.

Jesus calls each one of us to himself, "Come to me all you who labor and are burdened, and I will give you rest," (Mt 11:28). When we come to him we come to the source of our being.

The Bible describes God as the Spirit of peace, love and joy. Jesus recommends that we connect with our Maker to find out who we are.

God intended you to be yourself, which means that you must first find your purpose.

Not to know your purpose would put you at a great disadvantage. What profit would there be in gaining the whole world if on your deathbed you came to the stark realization that during your whole life you had been moving in the wrong direction?

Take time to be your true self.

You came from God, and you will one day return to him. In Genesis 1:26 we learn that we were made in God's image. Our purpose therefore is to be like him, manifesting his love and joy always and everywhere.

Love and joy are two sides of the same coin. The kingdom of God is within you. No matter how low you may have fallen, you are still the same miraculous child of God you were when you were an innocent infant. Get up and be your true self.

The art of being yourself is the art of harmonizing with God's plan for you. Staying connected to him enables you to transcend the limitations of life and the bad experiences of the past.

Do not entertain negative thoughts. Keep to your purpose. Reject fear in all its forms. Let nothing disturb you, let nothing cause you fear.

Do not let bad feelings stop you from attaining your goal. In spiritual matters, feelings are not facts. Faith can move mountains.

You are the child of the King of Heaven, and he loves you. Be your true self.

Everything you need in order to fulfill your destiny is already within you. Align your thoughts with your source, and decide to become an instrument of his love, peace and joy. (For more on this concept visit my Web site: messengerofjoy.com).

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOIR

Stay in tune with your purpose. You will then become a better, happier human being.

Choose to magnify God's love in this world. Be kind. Be generous. God loves a generous giver. A sense of well-being will unfold you.

The recipients of your kindness will grow in grace and feel blessed by God. You will become more yourself, a healer rather than a victim.

Jesus said, "If you love me, feed my lambs, feed my sheep." You can do this. Be an inspiration to others from now on, not a disappointment.

Choose to be joyful. Behold God's beauty in everything, and learn to reflect God's inner glow of joy.

Pray with Mary, the humble handmaid of the Lord, who by the grace of God was able to say, "My soul magnifies the Lord, and my spirit rejoices in God my Savior."

VATICAN CITY — Belief in Jesus Christ should lead people both to a deep communion with God as well as to unity with all men and women, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"Communion with God and communion among us are inseparable," the pope said March 29 at his weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square.

If people are not in communion with the God who created them, "the root or source of unity among us is destroyed," he said. And if people forget that they are all brothers and sisters, "our living in communion with the triune God is not real or true."

Pope Benedict was continuing a new series of audience talks about the apostles and the church, following his prepared text only briefly as he explained that it is through the apostles and their successors that the church continues to be a saving communion.

"This life of communion with God and among us is the aim of the proclamation of the Gospel, the aim of conversion to Christianity," he said.

Pope Benedict told the estimated 37,000 people gathered in St. Peter's Square that the Eucharist nourishes communion with God and with all who gather around the Lord's table throughout the world.

"This network of unity which embraces the world is the anticipation of the world to come in Christ Our Lord," he said.

In a world where "solitude threatens everyone," the pope said, the communion experienced in the church "makes us participants in the love which unites us with God and, therefore, unites us with one another."

"Despite all the human frailties" seen in the church throughout the centuries, he said, the church is "a marvelous creation of love."

"In the church, the Lord remains with us. In the Scriptures the Lord does not speak of the past, but speaks in the present tense. He speaks to us today. He gives us his light. He shows us the path of life. He gives us communion and, in that way, opens us to peace," he said.

Letter to the Editor

Column reiterates importance of knowing Scripture

In Father John Catoir's column, "Faith alone" is not enough" (March 17), he makes our Catholic position on faith and action crystal clear — and he does it through Scripture.

Like Father Catoir stated, I, too, "love our separated brethren." Many of them are convinced that Catholics believe we have to work our way into heaven, but that is not the case. What Father Catoir explains clearly is that if we have faith, this faith empowers us into action.

We need more Scripture-based teaching by our clergy on a regular basis so that we can all be effective Catholic apologists. We need to tell our separated brethren with confidence that we are more fundamental, relative to Scripture, than the so-called "Fundamentalists."

Catholics take Scripture very seriously, but unfortunately, we do not study Scripture seriously enough. As David tells us in Psalm 103, "Forget not all your benefits." We Catholics — because of ignorance of Scripture — cannot name many benefits.

Father McGivney and the death penalty

Priest fought to save young man's life

A new book has been getting enormous coverage in ads and reviews, and rightly so. It is called "Parish Priest, Father Michael McGivney and American Catholicism."

The book is the story of the young Connecticut priest who founded the Knights of Columbus and whose canonization cause has now been introduced.

Moved by seeing the pain of severe poverty and the deaths of too many overworked fathers who died too young, Father McGivney struggled to develop practical ways to ensure financial assistance to families should a breadwinner die.

The Knights of Columbus was formed in 1882 to help such families. The Knights now report an international membership of 1.7 million men.

I long have been intrigued by the amazing story of this priest, who died Aug. 14, 1890, at age 38. The reason for this lies partly in the fact that I live in Connecticut, not too far from the parishes where Father McGivney served.

Now that I have read Father McGivney's story, I will pray ever harder for his canonization because I truly believe in his sainthood. There was a surprise in the book that underscored that for me.

In an era in America when the death penalty was in full force, Father McGivney tried to save a young man from being executed.

The killing by the young man was a headliner. An unemployed 21-year old named James "Chip" Smith, drinking and carousing one late December night, showing off by shooting a pistol near a saloon, was apprehended by a policeman named Dan Hayes.

When the officer, also holding a gun, tried to get Smith's gun away from him, one of the guns went off, hitting the officer, who died a few hours later.

At trial in 1881, Smith was convicted of murder in the first degree and sentenced to be executed. Father McGivney, a regular visitor to the jail in New Haven who offered spiritual support to the prisoners, began to visit and counsel Smith often.

There were appeals on the grounds that this was not a "premeditated" shooting, but since it was a policeman who had lost his life, judges threw these appeals out.

On the Sunday before the execution, Father McGivney, "broken with emotion," as a reporter put it, celebrated a Mass for Smith.

The priest told his people, "I trust that all of you will offer up fervent prayer to the throne of grace that God will strengthen and prepare us to perform that awful duty which we shall be called upon to perform before this time next Sunday.

"To me this duty comes with almost a crushing weight. If I could consistently with my duty be far away from here next Friday, I should escape perhaps the most trying ordeal of my life, but this sad duty is placed my way by providence and must be fulfilled.

"If we receive your prayers, Mr. Smith and I shall be sustained by the supreme power in the hour of our great trial."

Our Catholic bishops have put out a very strong statement calling for the end of the death penalty, asking "the Catholic community to bring about an end to the use of the death penalty in our land."

I find myself praying to Father McGivney in heaven to help us all in this so important respect-life action.

What is the 'seamless garment'?

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Idea has helped right-to-life concept

Q. In articles about abortion recently I've seen reference to a "seamless garment" and a "consistent ethic of life." I recently became Catholic and am not familiar with these names, which as I understand it come from the Catholic Church. What do they mean? (New York)

A. Both terms have approximately the same meaning: All issues involving respect for the dignity and sacredness of human life weave together. They support each other, and none can be ignored or minimized without undermining all of them.

The first to use the phrase "consistent ethic of life" was probably the late Cardinal Joseph Bernardin. The beauty of such an ethic, he once said, "is that it provides an overall vision, and it shows how issues are related to each other, even though they remain distinct."

While he did not use those exact words, no one, I believe, has given a more clear description of this important concept than the late Pope John Paul II in his January 1999 message for the World Day of Peace, and at greater length in the encyclical "The Gospel of Life."

In the first document, titled "Respect for Human Rights: The Secret of True Peace," he repeated that the right to life is inviolable. A culture of life, he wrote, "guarantees to the unborn the right to come into the world. In the same way it protects the newly born, especially girls, from the crime of infanticide. ...

"To choose life involves rejecting every form of violence: the violence of poverty and hunger, which afflicts so many human beings; the violence of armed conflict; the violence of criminal trafficking in drugs and arms; the violence of mindless damage to the natural environment. ... No offense against the right to life, against the dignity of any single person, is ever unimportant" (No. 4).

As the pope indicated, the first of all basic rights is the right to life. For the past 20 years, the seamless garment idea has helped our bishops and all of us better to understand and protect that right.

Coping with the news of war

Through faith we learn of everlasting peace

I was a child during World War II. Every night the radio commentator Gabriel Heater would start, "It's a bad night tonight, folks."

Early on in the war, soldiers, sailors, the air force and especially the merchant marines were taking bad beatings.

Although the Iraq and Afghanistan wars are not all-out wars like World War II, almost every night the news we hear echoes Heater's "It's a bad night tonight, folks." The effect this is having on Americans may not be as obvious as was the effect of World War II, but my guess is that it is reaching a critical point.

These wars aren't going to disappear. In fact, they show signs of escalating and unsettling us for the rest of our lives.

How do we cope with their traumatic effects?

A good place to start is to reflect on our habit of watching the news. If we are watching the news at night and also catching glimpses of it during the day, it might be good to break this habit.

I have found that when I must go out at night and miss the news, I tend to sleep better and am much calmer the next day. Several friends have told me that they actually censure out the news from time to time to clear their minds and relax.

Another helpful exercise is to read history. If we are young, we tend to feel this is the first time wars like this have occurred. This tends to make us feel we are alone in this experience.

But history teaches that we're not alone. Others have gone through the same thing and not only have survived, but became stronger because of the experience.

In fact, wars often have brought out amazing courage in people that they never knew they possessed.

History also teaches us that war is spawned by jealousies and resentments, and that these qualities continue unabated in the world. Perhaps war won't be always with us, but its presence surely is persistent.

Our faith contains our best means for coping by pointing us to a gentle, peaceful Christ who was crucified. His unjust crucifixion is testimony to the evil that exists on earth, which even God had to endure.

It also points us to the Eucharist where we celebrate Christ's sacrificial death and — so important for our lives — his resurrection.

Through our faith, we learn that even though this world doesn't enjoy complete peace, there is another world that offers eternal peace. Our present life is only a very small part of a bigger life.

The Human Side

To the degree that we do our small part trying to make this life more peaceful, we will achieve eternal peace.

PARISH PROFILE

St. Joseph Church embodies spirit of worship and good works in mountain community

BRYSON CITY — St. Joseph Church is located in Swain County, at the foot of the Great Smoky Mountains in western North Carolina. In the 1930s, before the parish was established, a priest 34 miles from Waynesville would travel to Bryson City to celebrate Mass in various homes and at the Fryemont Inn.

As the Catholic community grew, a need for a Catholic church in the area became evident. Land was purchased at the east end of Bryson City's Main Street and construction of St. Joseph Church began.

The church, built at a cost of $11,568, was dedicated by then-Bishop Eugene McGuiness of Raleigh in September 1941 and was a mission of St. John the Evangelist Church in Waynesville.

At that time, St. Joseph Church was the only Catholic church west of Waynesville and is the oldest church in that area of North Carolina.

The church building was constructed with stone from Swain County and wood native to the area was used whenever possible. At the time of the dedication, there were 20 members at St. Joseph Church.

In 1955, Glenmary priests took responsibility for the parish. A nearby training center for Glenmary priests provided an ideal situation for both parishioners and priests. While the priests were able to get hands-on experience dealing with parish life, St. Joseph Church was able to maintain a generous supply of enthusiastic priests.

In the late 1960s, St. Joseph Church was transferred from being a mission of St. John the Evangelist Church in Waynesville to a mission of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Franklin.

On Sept. 8, 1972, St. Joseph Church became an independent parish. Today, the church has its own mission, Our Lady of Guadalupe Church in Cherokee.

Three Glenmary priests served as pastors of St. Joseph Church after its establishment as a parish in 1972: Fathers Donald Levernier, Frank Gardner and Tom Field.

When Father Field retired in 2002, the Glenmary presence at St. Joseph Church ended.

Father Frank Seabo, a diocesan priest, served as administrator between July 2002 and July 2003. In 2003, Father Shawn O'Neal became the administrator.

The parish is involved with SAFE, a center for victims of domestic violence; Habitat for Humanity; Meals on Wheels and it actively collects food for the Bryson City Food Pantry.

In 1983, the church purchased property and began a thrift shop. Now the small shop has grown into one the largest ecumenical charities in the area. In fact, parishioners of St. Joseph Church and other area churches have kept the shop so stocked with donated goods that there has never been a need to go outside the area for donations.

"Our thrift shop volunteers consist of both longtime parishioners and recent arrivals to our area," said Father O'Neal. "No matter when they came, though, they understand the need for providing a place where members of our community can obtain goods at affordable prices."

Due to an influx of retirees moving to Bryson City, land values have been pushed to artificially high levels, said

"Many local residents need as many affordable purchasing options as they can find, because this area suffers from the terrible combination of low wages, high unemployment," he said.

According to Father O'Neal, many local residents can barely afford to remain in Bryson City, where their families have lived for many generations.

"The physical presence on Main Street of both the church and thrift shop helps us to understand the economic crisis of the region, because the people most affected by the crisis come to our doorstep," Father O'Neal said. "Our parishioners respond to local needs with compassion that truly brings the Gospel to life."

Father Jorge Fernandez jogs outside Our Saviour Church March 8 in the Bronx section of New York. Less than a year after he was beaten by teenagers while jogging, Father Fernandez was honored as the Runner of the Year by a New York runners club.

Priest running, winning again after recovery from severe beating

NEW YORK (CNS) — Less than a year after he was attacked and beaten by a gang of teenagers while jogging in a Bronx park, a New York priest is not only up and running again, he's racing, winning and recently collected a top award of the city's premier running organization.

Father Jorge Fernandez, a member of the Yarumal Missionaries and a parochial vicar at Our Saviour Church, was honored in March by the New York Road Runners Club as the Runner of the Year in his age group.

"Thank God, I recovered very well," said Father Fernandez.

"I got a lot of solidarity and prayers from the people, and I started to run with more optimism and motivation than before the attack," he said. "I was running much better."

Father Fernandez, 42, came out first among the seven runners in his group — men ages 40-44 — who were nominated for the annual Runner of the Year Award. To qualify, a runner must be a member of the New York Road Runners Club and have completed at least six fully scored races across a range of distances.

The priest, who spent nine days in the hospital and two months recovering from the attack last May 2, began running again last July and by September was again competing in races.

"Sometimes there are a lot of parish activities and I can't participate in races," he said. "But when I do get the chance, I perform very well."

The priest, who has been running since high school, said that he runs every morning, beginning at 6 a.m. and covering anywhere from six to 15 miles in parks and on the streets of the Bronx.

It was on one of those morning jogs that he was attacked by a gang of about seven or eight youths who began kicking and punching him in what appeared to be a random act of violence.

"They didn't try to rob me; I had no money," Father Fernandez said. He underwent surgery to repair a broken jaw and was treated for pain, swelling and bruising.

Four teenagers were indicted on gang assault and other charges in the attack and face prison terms of up to 10 or 25 years, depending on their age, if convicted. Their cases are in pretrial proceedings in State Supreme Court in the Bronx.

Father Fernandez said that when he began running in earnest as a young man he received several offers from universities to run on their teams.

He decided to stay with his original goal of becoming a priest, however, entering a Colombian missionary order for his seminary training.

"Running is a way to get good health and be in good shape," he said, "but the most important thing for me was my vocation. So I decided to run for Christ."

Christian convert, in Italy, thanks pope for appealing on his behalf

ROME (CNS) — After fleeing to Italy, an Afghan man who faced the death penalty for converting to Christianity thanked Pope Benedict XVI for appealing on his behalf.

"In Kabul they would have killed me, I'm sure of that," Abdul Rahman said after he was granted refugee status in Italy on grounds of religious persecution.

Speaking to Italian reporters March 30, Rahman, 41, thanked a number of people who pressed for his release; the first person he mentioned was the pope.

Rahman, arrived in Italy from Afghanistan in secrecy. He said he intended to stay in the country and find work.

Pope Benedict and others had appealed for Rahman's release, urging Afghan authorities to show respect for freedom of religion. The authorities complied, despite demands from Muslim leaders that Rahman be barred from leaving the country.

Rahman told reporters that he had been estranged from his family after his conversion. He left a wife and two children in Afghanistan.

"I am worried for them because they are my children and could have problems on my account," he said.

On March 25, the Vatican said the pope had urged Afghan President Hamid Karzai to see that the case against the convert was dismissed.

"I am certain, Mr. President, that dropping the case against Mr. Rahman would bestow great honor upon the Afghan people and would raise a chorus of admiration in the international community," said the pope.

Rahman was jailed after declaring his conversion to police officers, and the Afghan Supreme Court had said he could face the death penalty unless he reverted to Islam. He reportedly became a Christian several years ago, after working for a Christian aid agency in Pakistan.

Christians are a tiny minority in Afghanistan, numbering only a few thousand. An estimated 99 percent of the population is Muslim.

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope says people do not need to be perfect to be called to a vocation

'Human frailties' are not obstacles, says pope

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — One does not have to be perfect to be called to a vocation in the priesthood or religious life, but one must recognize that God calls each person to repentance and holiness, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"Human frailties and limits do not represent an obstacle" to having a vocation, "as long as they contribute to making us more aware of the fact that we need the redeeming grace of Christ," the pope said in his message for the 2006 World Day of Prayer for Vocations.

The day dedicated to praying for vocations to the priesthood and religious life will be celebrated May 7 in most countries; the pope's message for the day was released March 30 in Italian.

From Jesus' time, Pope Benedict said, God has called individuals to dedicate their lives totally to serving God and their brothers and sisters.

God's call is not addressed to the perfect, but to those open to God's love, which changes human hearts and makes them capable of communicating the love of God to others, the pope said.

"The church is holy even if its members need to be purified so that holiness, a gift of God, can shine through them in all its brightness," he said.

Pope Benedict asked for special prayers for vocations to the priesthood, a ministry that is essential for the celebration of the sacraments and, therefore, for the ongoing life of the church.

"It is not surprising that where people pray with fervor, vocations flourish," he said.

Papal preacher says obeying God brings inner peace

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Obeying God means living out God's plan, which then brings inner peace and serenity, said the preacher of the papal household.

God wants his flock to be obedient, not because he wants to rule his underlings, but because it means "we are carrying out God's will" and aiming for the same things God wants, said Capuchin Father Raniero Cantalamessa.

The more people conform their lives to what God has planned, the more they will be bathed in the light of truth and, as a result, in peace, the preacher said in a Lenten reflection offered March 31 to Pope Benedict XVI and senior Vatican officials.

The Capuchin said a reflection on the importance of obedience could help contribute to a "good spiritual climate in the church and the Curia" every time one is faced with the possibility of job or personnel changes.

Father Cantalamessa said retirement and bringing one's career to an end was one example of the difficulty of obedience.

Someone once joked that serving in high office was its own cross, but sometimes the hardest thing is not to take up the cross, but to come down and be removed from it, he said.

Obeying, however, and letting go most resembles the example of Christ in his passion, said Father Cantalamessa.

With his ultimate sacrifice, "Jesus cut off his teachings, broke off all activities," without worrying what would happen to his apostles, his mother, his wisdom — "entrusted as it was to just the poor memory of a few fishermen," the papal preacher said.

No concern or worry could keep him from his desire to fulfill God's will, he said. The faithful are to run questions by him in prayer before making decisions.

It is not necessary to get an audible answer from God before one acts, Father Cantalamessa said; what is important is that "I have stripped myself of my will, I have renounced deciding on my own, and I have given to God the possibility to intervene, if he wants, in my life."

People can also gain God's spiritual guidance from reading the Bible or listening closely to scriptural readings at Mass. Often a page or verse will jump out and illuminate the situation, he said, and show the person what to do.

Villains crowned state champions

KERNERSVILLE — The girls' basketball team at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville recently took home the state championship.

The Lady Villains basketball team capped a perfect 31-0 record with an impressive 54-31 win against Southeast Halifax High School in the N.C. High School Athletic Association's 1-A division championship game held at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill March 11.

This is the first time Bishop McGuinness had competed in the public school league and emerged as champions.

On their way to the championship, the Lady Villains also beat four-time defending state champions Thomasville High School.

In USA Today's "Super 25 girls' basketball rankings," the Lady Villains were ranked No. 24 in the nation and

No. 4 in the South.

Coach Brian Robinson said he was "very proud" of the team.

"We are very excited for what we've just accomplished. We realize how hard it is to be a state champion, much less an undefeated state champion," he said.

The team is composed of juniors Katheryn Lyons, Sarah Fouroudi and Margaret Minton; sophomores Maggie Ronan, Megan Rembielak and Mackenzie Wheaton; and freshmen Erinn Thompson, Gina Simmons, Anna DeFrancesco and Brittany Cox.

Several teammates previously had played together at Our Lady of Mercy School in Winston-Salem.

"When they come to Bishop McGuinness, they have an idea of how to play basketball at a very competitive level," said Robinson.

I was thinking how much our daily lives in the world are like that procession," said Bishop Jugis.

"In our eucharistic procession we were contemplatives in action, keeping our attention fixed on God as we moved along through the campus toward our eventual destination of celebrating the vespers liturgy in the Abbey Basilica," said Bishop Jugis.

"So also, as we go about our lives in the world, we keep our attention fixed on God, always trying to do his work, remembering that we are on pilgrimage to our eventual destination of the liturgy of praise and worship of God in heaven," said the bishop.

"The holy Eucharist accompanies us along the way of our pilgrimage as nourishment for our journey," he said.

That pilgrimage, a day of prayer and reflection, was part of the diocese's preparation for the second diocesan Eucharistic Congress, themed "The Love of Christ Impels Us," to be held in Charlotte Oct. 6-7.

The theme is also Bishop Jugis' motto, taken from St. Paul's second letter to the Corinthian Church.

"The love of Christ, which is really present in the Mass, transforms us and becomes an interior force impelling us to live for Christ," said the bishop. "The eucharistic love of Christ informs our lives and makes us become more like him."

Many found the pilgrimage to be spiritually enriching.

"So many of our students didn't have experiences like this growing up," said Gloria Schweizer, Catholic campus minister at Western Carolina University in Cullowhee.

"It increases their awareness and appreciation for the Eucharist," she said.

"A living faith is a deeply rooted faith. Exposure to and active, personal involvement in the various traditions are vital dynamics in the development of committed, devout, faithful Catholics," said Paul Kotlowski, director of diocesan youth ministry.

"We're not dealing with something like a spectator sports event when it comes to our life in Christ. He calls us each by name into an intimate encounter," said Kotlowski. "Personally, I can't think of a better way to facilitate this encounter than time with the Real Presence (of Jesus), with the one exception being the Mass itself."

The pilgrimage included exposition of the Eucharist, evening prayer and Benediction.

"The time spent in eucharistic adoration today should help us grow in our spiritual union with the Lord, and should lead ultimately to our sacramental union with him in holy Communion at Mass," the bishop told the youths.

"We have come to honor our Lord, and to worship him really present in the Blessed Sacrament," he said.

Adam Trufant, 18, a parishioner of St. Barnabas Church in Arden, who helped carry the canopy over the monstrance during the procession.

"I was honored to walk with Jesus," he said. "Walking step by step with Jesus is a beautiful gift."

"Christ established the Eucharist as a means to remain with us, to live in us and for us to live in him," said Kotlowski.

"In the Eucharist — under the sacramental signs of bread and wine — Christ, the mystery of God, is revealed," he said. "He is our nourishment, our medicine and our comfort."

Regional Stewardship Conference has something for everyone

Whether your parish is just starting to promote stewardship as a way of life or has been actively involved for years, the fifth Regional Stewardship Day Conference will feature something for you. The conference, sponsored by the dioceses of Charlotte, Charleston, Raleigh, Savannah and the Archdiocese of Atlanta, will be held on April 29th at the Embassy Suites in Cary, N.C.

The U.S. bishops' pastoral letter, "Stewardship: A Disciple's Response," is the document that defines stewardship, inspires us and challenges us to embrace a way of life that includes the giving of our time, talent, and treasure out of gratitude for God's gifts to us.

Our keynote speaker, Dan Conway, will use the pastoral letter as well as the apostolic letter of Pope John Paul II, "The Church in America," as he highlights ways that a commitment to stewardship can be countercultural in U.S. society today.

Dan comes from a rich background in the stewardship arena. He has served on the faculty of the International Catholic Stewardship Council's Winter and Summer Institutes in addition to directing stewardship and development efforts in the archdioceses of Chicago, Louisville and Indianapolis.

Dan is president of RSI, Catholic Service Group. His talk, "Stewardship in America: A Countercultural Way of Life," will be both challenging and inspiring. Dan's breakout session on the spirituality of stewardship will include practical suggestions on living stewardship as a way of life for individuals, families and parish communities.

The six breakout sessions will cover a wide array of topics and provide some concrete ideas for promoting stewardship in your parish. Each session will be offered twice during the three breakout time slots. Just in case your parish cannot send participants to all six of the breakouts, a notebook of materials from all sessions will be provided for each registrant.

The South is truly a melting pot of cultures which carries its own challenges to promoting stewardship in our parishes. Enrique Gomez-Palacio of St. Thomas More Church in Chapel Hill, N.C. will address "Stewardship in a Multicultural Parish."

If you are looking for some new ideas to promote stewardship of time and talent through ministry fairs, then Joel Gray of St. Brigid Church in Alpharetta, Ga. will share his experiences during his session.

Stewardship efforts at St. Pius X Church in Greensboro have touched the lives of everyone in the parish, from children to the elderly. Pastoral associates Pat Spivey and Tracy Welliver will team with stewardship committee chairperson Patti Dunning to present a profile of stewardship in their parish.

Margo Truett of St. Anne Church in Columbus, Ga. has developed a dynamic stewardship leadership retreat. She will present her ideas in a practical and inspirational breakout on "Developing Leaders of Stewardship."

Pastors will be delighted to hear Very Reverend John McGee, OSFS, VF, pastor of Holy Infant Church in Durham speak about his role in promoting stewardship in the parish.

This year a closing panel discussion will bring all of the presenters together for one final opportunity to answer questions, clarify ideas and send us forth with an enthusiasm for promoting stewardship in our parishes. It is the hope of conference planners that participants will return to their own parishes with a renewed emphasis on living and promoting stewardship as a way of life – a life of real Christian discipleship.

For additional information on the Regional Stewardship Day or to receive a registration brochure, contact Jim Kelley at (704) 370-3301 or jkkelley@charlottediocese.org or Barbara Gaddy at (704) 370-3302, bagaddy@charlottediocese.org.

MISSION WORK

Mission trip to Bolivia builds hope, faith

Humanity project and prayers for the success and safety of all those involved in the mission work.

"A great deal of advance planning went into the trip," said Dr. Hernan Fabio, a parishioner of St. Leo the Great Church.

Fabio traveled to Bolivia on a scouting mission last October with Father Kessler and fellow parishioners Roy Benson and Graziano Camastra. Fabio, a native of Puerto Rico, coordinated the medical preplanning with Dr. David Paz, a key leader in the El Torno community.

The four also worked closely with other Bolivian leaders to arrange for housing, technology and other anticipated needs of the missionaries.

The missionaries to Bolivia were comprised of seven facilitators, four translators, three nurses/medical support staff, seven physicians and Father Kessler. Many were parishioners of St. Leo the Great Church.

The medical team set up practice for five days in the clinic run by Paz, who in the weeks prior to their arrival, encouraged the locals to make appointments for free medical attention.

During the week, the team doctors saw 446 patients, performed 14 surgeries and 16 infiltrations to reduce joint pain.

Two members of the medical team were Dave O'Brien and Mary Claire O'Brien, both physicians and parishioners of St. Leo the Great Church.

Dave O'Brien trained one of the Bolivian doctors at the clinic to perform the infiltrations himself.

"It was much more difficult than I ever thought it would be. I didn't anticipate the great emotional toll it would take on me," admitted Mary Claire O'Brien.

"You feel like you're trying to empty an ocean with an eyedropper. But it's the idea that the parish cared enough to be physically present that meant so much to the Bolivian people," she said.

"Our trip to Bolivia was just short of miraculous."

— Father Tom Kessler

She described the people of El Torno as open and generous.

"As important as it is for us to give to them, they are giving to us in the same measure," she said. "I hope we are able to sustain a liaison with them."

Free medications were also made available to the patients. Mary Beth Phillips, a nurse and parishioner of St. Leo the Great Church, worked in the clinic's pharmacy, filling 420 prescriptions. Fellow parishioner Sandra Clapp and two translators from Bolivia, one a college student from Santa Cruz who heard about the mission and took a week off from school to help, assisted.

Translations were provided by team photographer and journalist Luis Paez, a native of Colombia; Deacon Carlos Medina, permanent deacon at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte and a native of Nicaragua; Sister of St. Joseph Joan Pearson, Hispanic ministry coordinator for the Salisbury Vicariate; and Benson, who served as a U.S. Army Green Beret in Central America for six years.

Donations from parishioners of St. Leo the Great Church helped provide medications and medical equipment — 32 suitcases' worth — as well as improvements to St. James the Apostle Church's property and library, which Father Kessler helped build more than a decade ago.

After the missionaries repainted the library's interior, Benson installed two computers with Internet access, a printer, a scanner and a telephone line.

New educational materials and schoolbooks, selected with the help of several educators in El Torno, were purchased for a local school. Guitars were also purchased, one for the church's choir and eight for the school in conjunction with a promise from El Torno's mayor to provide a music teacher.

Donations also funded the construction of a 7-foot-high brick security wall around the church's library and cultural center during that week.

The missionaries also visited several locations around El Torno, including a center for the elderly, where a donation was made to help grow produce for the residents; a school and clinic staffed by Dominican Sisters, where a computer and related equipment were donated; and a dermatology hospital run by the Daughters of Charity.

During the trip, Father Kessler concelebrated Mass with Father Erwin Graus, pastor of St. James the Apostle Church. The Mass, attended by the missionaries and El Torno residents, was followed by a fiesta at which awards were presented to various team members.

Benson said the missionaries were part of a larger team.

"None of this could have happened without the generous support of the entire community of faith that we know as the parish of St. Leo the Great," he said.

"We had money to get the job done, but we also felt the prayers and concerns of each and every member of the community," said Benson.

"Our trip to Bolivia was just short of miraculous," said Father Kessler. "Everything went incredibly well in that the missionaries, as well as the Bolivians, were all very much touched by God."

"I'm very grateful to almighty God for his many blessings in this faith-filled endeavor," he said.

PROTECTING GOD'S CHILDREN

Diocese in compliance with charter dioceses and Eastern-rite eparchies in implementing every applicable article of the U.S. bishops' policies to prevent clergy sex abuse of minors as of Dec. 31, 2005, according to an independent audit released March 30.

The statistics are contained in the 2005 annual report on the implementation of the charter. The U.S. bishops' Office of Child and Youth Protection prepared the report for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops and the National Review Board, appointed by the bishops to monitor compliance with the charter.

The all-lay review board approved the report before it was sent to the USCCB.

The charter was approved by the bishops in 2002 and calls for an annual compliance report.

This was the third consecutive year that on-site audits were done in dioceses, with much of the data based on self-reporting by church officials. While the charter requires the child protection office to issue annual compliance reports, it does not stipulate how to gather the data for the report.

Because the Diocese of Charlotte was in compliance with the audit conducted in 2004, the audit for 2005 was self-reported. To complete the audit, the diocese responded to a questionnaire from the investigation and security firm The Gavin Group of Winthrop, Mass.

"It is gratifying that we continue to be found in compliance with the charter," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis. "I will continue my daily prayers for all victims of abuse in our society."

Local statistics

During the reporting period for the 2005 audit, the Diocese of Charlotte received no new allegations of sexual misconduct with children. The diocese provided $14,215 in ongoing financial assistance to or on behalf of victims, all of which was for counseling services.

As in the past, none of the funds came from parish savings or the Diocesan Support Appeal.

In the nearly four years since the implementation of the charter, 36,017 members of the clergy, diocesan employees, volunteer religious education teachers, other parish volunteers and students have received safe environment training that describes inappropriate behavior and explains what steps to take when the behavior is witnessed.

During the 2005 audit period, the diocese conducted background checks on 7,684 members of the clergy, diocesan employees, volunteer religious education teachers and other parish volunteers.

The cost of the safe environment training programs, the background checks and other measures associated with compliance was $88,928 during the fiscal year that ended June 30, 2005.

The diocese is committed to both the training and the background checks on an ongoing basis.

"Here in the Diocese of Charlotte, we have policies, programs, people and, most importantly, prayer to address this problem," said Bishop Jugis. "Prayer is the primary response for the people of God when confronted with something as evil as sex abuse."

HIGHLIGHTS OF THE 2005 REPORT ON COMPLIANCE WITH SEX ABUSE NORMS

BY AGOSTINO BONO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Following are the major findings of the 2005 report on the implementation of the "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People" adopted by the U.S. bishops in 2002 and revised in 2005:

— Almost nine in 10 of the participating dioceses and eparchies were in full compliance with the charter.

— Twenty-one dioceses and eparchies were noncompliant regarding the completion of child sex-abuse prevention training for clergy, employees, volunteers and children.

— Five dioceses and eparchies were noncompliant regarding the background checks of clergy, employees and volunteers.

— Almost 95 percent of the 7.7 million people needing child sex-abuse prevention training, including 5.8 million children, received training.

— More than 98 percent of the 1.7 million people needing background checks were checked.

The report is based on independent audits of dioceses and Eastern-rite eparchies conducted by the Gavin Group, based in Boston. This information was supplemented by data collected by the Center for Applied Research in the Apostolate, based at Georgetown University in Washington, on the number of new allegations against clergy and on the amount of money spent on sex abuse-related activities.

The Gavin Group audited 191 of the 195 U.S. dioceses and Eastern-rite eparchies. CARA received responses from 94 percent of the dioceses and eparchies and 67 percent of the 221 religious communities.

The report, released in Washington March 30, was prepared by the bishops' Office of Child and Youth Protection, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops and the all-lay National Review Board responsible for monitoring compliance with the charter.

Confession's healing power

Absolution, penance lead to Christ, joy, says evangelist

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

HENDERSONVILLE — "Here's the question that comes up whether you're Catholic or not: Why do we have to go to confession?" Dr. Marcellino D'Ambrosio asked the audience. "Why can't we just say to God that we're sorry?"

D'Ambrosio, founder of The Crossroads Initiative, a Catholic renewal and evangelization group, spoke on the topics "Who Needs Confession" and "Making Lent Count" at Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville March 25.

The Asheville Vicariate sponsored the program: "Awake, Heal, Reconcile."

"I loved it," said Kay Lantrip of Immaculate Conception Church. "Having a speaker like this really helps to build our Catholic life."

"Sin is not just a sin on the law books somewhere," D'Ambrosio said. "Sin doesn't damage God; it damages us. There is no private sin, even in private (such as viewing pornography alone)."

A gift from God

D'Ambrosio spoke of the healing power of the sacrament of reconciliation.

"Confession is a gift from God to heal us," he said. "Baptism is the original healing, but when we're old enough to make choices we mess up."

Confession is mandatory for anyone who believes he or she has committed a serious (mortal) sin. But venial (light) sins can pile up, weighing a person down. Frequent reconciliation relieves the burden, said D'Ambrosio.

"You wouldn't wait to go to the doctor until you're on your deathbed," he said. "We do preventive maintenance. The same is true with confession."

For the sacrament of reconciliation, what's needed, he said, are contrition and penance.

Contrition is sincere sorrow for the sin, evidenced by a willingness to change and to avoid near occasions of sin — those tempting circumstances or situations.

D'Ambrosio suggested examining one's conscience by reading Scripture, such as the Sermon on the Mount (Matthew 5:1-12), and meditating on how one is living the Beatitudes.

Then there's 1 Corinthians 13. D'Ambrosio suggested substituting your own name for the word "love," which appears frequently throughout the chapter, and reflecting on how patient, kind and so forth you have been.

"One of the values of reconciliation is hearing the words of absolution," said D'Ambrosio.

Next comes penance.

"Penance is not to earn salvation; Jesus already redeemed the world," D'Ambrosio said. "Penance is therapy to regain wholeness, just as physical therapy heals. Penance is to get rid of the poison in your life. It should be helpful, real therapy, not just rote prayers."

He told how in reconciliation he confessed that he had made some nasty remarks about a man he didn't like. His penance: pray for the man for five minutes every day. After a couple of weeks of this, he began to see good qualities in the person and actually came to like him.

Dr. Marcellino D'Ambrosio speaks at "Awake, Heal, Reconcile" at Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville March 25.

"Who needs confession?" asked D'Ambrosio. "Only people who want to be free, who want to change, to not just get by but have a real relationship with Christ, people who want joy."

Seeking forgiveness

But forgiveness isn't limited to the reconciliation room or confessional.

"We need to develop a Catholic culture in our families that we need to ask forgiveness of anyone we've hurt and to give forgiveness," he said.

And sometimes the hardest person to forgive is oneself.

"Forgiving ourselves — it's not about feelings but is a decision: 'Lord, I forgive myself and I thank you for forgiving me.' Also, imagine Jesus looking at you lovingly," D'Ambrosio said.

During the two-hour lunch break, at least six priests from the Asheville Vicariate were stationed around the church to hear confessions.

Radical ideas

On "Making Lent Count," D'Ambrosio said "Lent is a time for the church to grow — to fast and pray for others as well as ourselves."

During the early Catholic Church, Lent's 40 days were a time of intense preparation as candidates prepared for baptism. The whole church prepared with them, he said.

"We need to capture the original meaning of Lent: praying for those being baptized or received into the Church," D'Ambrosio said.

"Also, we need to be thinking of ways not just to give up things but about renewal," he said. "A lot of people have special disciplines for Lent but drop them as soon as Lent is over. Lent is a time to form new patterns that keep growing after Lent."

It can even mean giving up good things if they get in the way of one's relationship with God.

"Good things become a little bad when we become attached to them," he said. "Satan can't invent an ounce of pleasure, but he can invent ways that are out of context with God's will. Fasting says, 'God, you're first with me.'"

Many things are not bad in themselves. For instance, television and gourmet coffee are OK — up to a point.

"Fasting also frees up time and money," D'Ambrosio said. "A lot of Americans waste a lot of money on junk. There are a lot of ministries out there that could flourish on the dollar a day we could give up."

His suggestion?

"Get really radical. Try living without TV or radio for the next few weeks," he said.

And while get getting ready for and driving to church, "don't just fast from food before Mass, fast from the media," he said. "We've got to empty ourselves out if we're going to be filled with the feast of faith. Fasting prepares us for feasting."

"There's a lot to be said for that," Immaculate Conception parishioner Mark Cordaro said. "It's a responsibility that we have to accept. In today's society there are so many distractions."

'God or the Girl'

A&E chronicles vocational call of four men

BY HARRY FORBES
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — It's finally happened: Reality TV has found religion.

In the A&E cable channel's new five-part "God or the Girl," four young men with a calling to the priesthood must decide whether to enter the seminary or serve God as laypeople.

The series will air, appropriately enough, during Easter week, with the first two episodes premiering on Easter, April 16. (The third and fourth hours debut April 17, with the finale April 23.)

Apart from the slightly sensational title — actually a misnomer as none of these devout men would ever consider abandoning God — the series offers a surprisingly reverential treatment of a profound life passage.

The series is as serious-minded as a public television documentary on the subject, albeit fitted out with all the trappings of "Survivor."

The four are a varied bunch.

There's Joe Adair, a 28-year-old procrastinator from Ohio who has already been in the seminary twice but can't decide about a lifelong commitment, particularly when there's a warm and attractive girl who could be waiting for him in Germany.

There's Steve Horvath, a 25-year-old Virginian who chucked his lucrative consulting job and girlfriend to become a university campus missionary.

Horvath is the most emotional of the four, his quivering sensitivity coming to the fore when he reluctantly accepts the challenge to go solo to Guatemala.

The 24-year-old Mike Lechniak from Scranton, Pa., felt a calling at age 17, but has such a natural rapport with sympathetic girlfriend Aly that it's clear why he's highly conflicted.

And finally there's Dan DeMatte, a 21-year-old Ohio Dominican University student with an obvious talent for youth ministry who lives with nine other celibate young men in a house they call "Fort Zion."

His relationship with girlfriend Amber is as amiable as Mike's is with Aly. The tug between collar and wedding ring promised by the title seems most vivid with Mike and Dan.

At one point, we see Dan organize a demonstration at an abortion clinic during which he engages in a lively debate with a couple of young women who support legalized abortion.

The series careens among all four, as Joe sets out for World Youth Day in Germany, hoping to contact 24-year-old Anne — though once there, days go by before he calls her.

Later in the series, he'll set off on a "pilgrimage" to Niagara Falls with not a dime in his pocket, and charm waitresses into feeding him, sometimes in return for doing odd jobs.

Though his housemates are skeptical, Dan — on the advice of his mentor, a Dominican priest, to "seek the Lord in a radical way" — embarks on a project to build and then carry a wooden cross for 20 miles.

The sincerity of all four is never in doubt even if their respective worldviews sometimes border on the naive, as when Mike describes his occasional yearning to hug his girlfriend as "sick and disgusting."

The program touches only lightly on the sex abuse shadow. "Everyone will think you're a child molester," remarks Steve at one point, anticipating outsiders' reactions.

We won't ruin the surprise of which of the four (if any) actually decides to enter the seminary, but the filmmakers have done all in their power to hook viewers, with standard pre-commercial teases and cliffhanger closes.

And if those methods build a large audience for such an atypically religious-based series, then why not?

The filmmakers shot footage on a fifth subject who will appear on the forthcoming DVD version only.

An occasional crass expression and a few sexually related words and innuendo are the only flags among otherwise unobjectionable content.

Forbes is director of the Office for Film & Broadcasting of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

We must make Christ visible to others

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

As a child I had one of those little instruction books on how to be a secret agent. This was the heyday of "007" and the "Man from U.N.C.L.E.," before modern wireless electronic devices.

One of my favorite and most ingenious spy skills was writing with "invisible ink" made from ordinary household substances such as onion juice. (For the faint of nose and eyes, milk worked just fine.)

Using a small watercolor brush, I'd paint my message on a white sheet of paper, let it dry and leave it for an "accomplice spy" to find, whereupon that person would hold it over a flame until the message magically appeared.

The beauty of this technique was that the communicate on that nondescript piece of paper — highly significant for global security, of course — was hidden even while in plain sight. Of course, the message was of no use unless another person made it visible to the eye.

Practically the entire world knows the story of Easter — of Jesus, once crucified and buried, now raised to new life. For Christians especially, it is the event that changes our human situation forever.

But all too often the danger of familiarity is invisibility. It's like the secret message, there in plain sight, ineffective unless decoded or made visible.

In the New Testament, the word "witness" is translated from the Greek "martyros" — the root of our word "martyr." Witnesses were not only those who saw the resurrected Christ with their own eyes, but, more important, they were the ones who made this same Christ visible to others in their speech and actions, sometimes at risk of death.

We, too, are witnesses to the risen Lord, often in cultures that are indifferent or hostile to his message. The miracle of Easter is that his death-conquering love, bursting anew from an empty tomb, invites and enables our hearts to burst into the flame that makes him clearly evident in our own lives.

In Paul's letter to the Colossians, he writes: "For you have died, and your life is hidden with Christ in God. When Christ your life appears, then you too will appear with him in glory."

The great paradox is that Christ's appearance depends upon us, his witnesses, making him visible to others. Then will his glory be manifested to all the world.

Positive themes, great acting 'Take the Lead' in dance flick

BY KEVINE E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — Making positive choices and believing in oneself are among the themes that dance off the screen in "Take the Lead."

The film, debuting today, April 7, was inspired by events in the life of instructor Pierre Dulaine, who brought the positive effects of ballroom dance to urban high school students in New York.

In addition to committed performances from Antonio Banderas (as Dulaine) and a young cast of unknown actors, the film carries a strong message about how dance can impart trust, dignity and respect. There is also the appeal of kids succeeding after being consigned to failure.

The story follows Dulaine as he gets permission from Augustine James (Alfre Woodard), the principal of a New York inner-city high school, to teach ballroom dancing to the troubled students.

The kids are much more interested in rap and hip-hop than Gershwin or Porter. But the film cleverly keeps an even balance between the two disparate sounds, starting with the opening credits that meld a Lena Horne standard with rap.

You just know the narrative will lead to a fusion of musical — and dancing — styles.

Slowly but surely, the students fall in step (literally), with some amusingly mismatched pairs working together in reasonable harmony. Some of the teachers object to Dulaine's methods, but his strong convictions prevail.

The film's climax is the citywide ballroom competition where the students compete against the dance studio snobs. Their lively steps — traditional ballroom dancing at times combined with improvised hip-hop moves — inspired authentic cheers and applause from viewers at the advance screening in Charlotte, as if they were attending the actual competition.

Antonio Banderas and Anna Dimitrie Melamed dance in "Take the Lead."

The language is sometimes salty as befits the tough inner-city milieu, and there's a smattering of violence, as one student struggles to overcome his environment. But, apart from this cautionary note, this is a feel-good film with genuine laughs, tears and a great message that young people should see.

The film contains some crude language and expressions, implied prostitution, an amorous advance to a minor, a vulgar gesture, violent car vandalism and gunplay, which preclude viewing by younger adolescents.

The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

FROM THE COVER

Bill analyzed by U.S. bishops

ones they oppose.

The letter lauded provisions of the bill approved by the Judiciary Committee that would allow the 12 million undocumented immigrants the chance to legalize their status, establish a temporary worker program and reorganize legal immigration procedures to reduce the backlog of applications for family reunification visas.

Bishop Barnes praised the committee bill for including legislation known as the Agricultural Jobs, Opportunity, Benefits and Security Act, or AgJOBS, and the Development, Relief and Education of Alien Minors Act, known as the DREAM Act.

AgJOBS would allow several hundred thousand agricultural workers already in the United States to legalize their status and seek permanent residency visas.

The DREAM Act would create a way for students who were brought illegally to the United States by their parents to legalize their own status while getting a college education at in-state resident rates.

The letter also expressed appreciation for amendments to the committee bill that would exempt from criminal prosecution church and other humanitarian workers who provide social, medical and other types of service to undocumented immigrants.

It currently is a violation of civil law to be in the country without permission.

Among provisions that concern the bishops are those that would expand the definition of an aggravated felony, which would make "many deserving aliens ineligible for immigration relief."

Also troubling are provisions that would increase the use of "indiscriminate, mandatory and indefinite detention" and expand the use of expedited removal, he said.

Those changes "might return refugees, asylum seekers, unaccompanied children, trafficking victims, battered spouses and other vulnerable populations to situations where they may face harm," he said.

Bishop Barnes objected to provisions limiting judicial review "at a time when the judiciary has leveled unprecedented charges that the immigration court system is making unjust decisions," and that would empower state and local law enforcement agencies to enforce federal civil immigration laws.

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

Each year at this time, we receive inquiries at the diocesan Pastoral Center regarding the Holy Thursday evening Mass of the Lord's Supper, specifically about whether or not the particular directive in the Sacramentary regarding the washing of men's feet has changed.

There has not been any directive from Rome regarding a change for the Holy Thursday Mass in that regard.

A change in practice from that which is given in the Sacramentary for the Holy Thursday liturgy requires the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops to request a "recognitio" from the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of Sacraments, as outlined in canon 838§3 and "Redemptionis Sacramentum" nn. 27, 28.

The washing of feet ceremony at the Holy Thursday Mass is an option that the celebrant is allowed to exercise if it is deemed advisable or recommended for pastoral reasons ("ubi ratio pastoralis id suadeat").

I will remember all of you in my prayers as we approach the Easter Triduum.

Sincerely yours in Christ,

Christian community needs commitment to truth, Gospel, says pope

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The love and unity that are essential marks of a truly Christian community cannot endure without a strong commitment to truth and fidelity to the Gospel, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Those who believe in Christ and want to live in communion with his church have "a precise obligation" to "interrupt communion with those who have moved themselves away from the doctrine that saves," the pope said April 5 at his weekly general audience.

Differences and divisions have marked the history of the church since its beginning, he said, "and we should not be surprised that it exists today as well."

Preserving the unity of the church requires a firm commitment to loving others and to holding fast to the truth, the pope said during an audience talk marked by repeated departures from his prepared text.

"Truth and love are two sides of the same gift that comes from God and is preserved in the church thanks to the apostolic ministry," he said.

With some 30,000 people gathered in a windblown St. Peter's Square, Pope Benedict explained that, while the church was born of the Holy Spirit and lives by the Spirit's grace, Jesus also gave the church a structure with the apostles and their successors, the bishops, to be "authentic custodians and witnesses of the deposit of truth."

The First Letter of John, he said, contains the Bible's strongest admonition about the obligation of believers to love one another, but it also "addresses with drastic severity those adversaries who were once members of the community, but are no longer."

"The family of the children of God, in order to live in unity and peace, need someone who safeguards them in truth and guides them with wise and authoritative discernment," the pope said.

The bishops are called to protect and promote the truth while also serving as "ministers of love — they always must be aware of the inseparability of this double service of truth and love," he said.

Pope Benedict ended his main talk in Italian by asking his audience to pray for their bishops and for him, asking God to ensure that through their ministry "the light of truth and love will never be extinguished in the church and the world."

The names for God

Q. When and why was the word "Yahweh," the name for God, practically eliminated from the Bible? What is the meaning of the terms "God" and "Lord" and "Jesus Christ," which seem to substitute for it? Are they more ancient than "Yahweh"? (Indiana)

A. First of all, the name of God expressed by our word "Yahweh" was never eliminated from the Bible. It is, in fact, the name by which God is called more than any other in the Hebrew Bible, our Old Testament.

The problem arises from the fact that this divine name was so revered by the Hebrew people that it was normally never pronounced or written, especially after the destruction of the Jerusalem temple in A.D. 70.

In fact, even to this day there is no certainty about how the name should be pronounced.

An author would write only the four consonants of the name, YHWH. When the name was spoken, the reader used instead the name "Adonai," Lord.

In writing, the combination of YHWH and the vowels of Adonai (a-o-a) resulted in the composite Jehovah, which appeared centuries later in English Bibles. In modern times, scholars have concluded that the most apt pronunciation of the name is Yahweh.

In addition to "Adonai," the Scriptures give other names to God, like "El" and "Elohim." The name YHWH, however, predominates over all others put together, appearing more than 6,700 times.

When Jewish scholars eventually translated their Bible into Greek, YHWH became "o theos," the God, or "o kyrios," the Lord; then later in English usually God or Lord.

The background of the word "Yahweh" is not clear. Scholars offer numerous interpretations, but one now accepted as perhaps most likely was suggested first by the renowned Scripture scholar W.F. Albright.

"Yahweh," he believed, was the first word of the full Hebrew title "yahweh aser yihweh" — "He brings into being all that comes into being."

Whatever its original meaning, however, there is no doubt that this sacred name declared the unique relationship Israel had with its God, the God who was always with them.

While they never developed a complex theology about God's name or his nature, he was the divine Being infinitely beyond all other gods who brought all things into existence, who revealed himself through an irrevocable covenant with them as a people, who brought them through the exodus, who is always their protector and savior.

For Christians, this is the God Jesus knew and proclaimed as his — and our — Father. He is the divine Son, the Christ, the anointed one who became human and, in his person and life, reveals totally the nature and life of his Father Yahweh.

As he tells the disciples at the Last Supper, "Whoever has seen me has seen the Father" (Jn 14:9).

Communion at two Masses daily

Q. May a person who attends two Masses in a day receive Communion at both Masses? I thought we could, but one catechism I searched said we could receive a second time only at baptisms, weddings, funerals, confirmations or similar occasions. What is right? (Iowa)

A. Church law states that anyone who has received the Eucharist may receive it again on the same day, but only within a Mass in which the person participates (Canon 917).

Later, in 1984, the Vatican Commission for the Interpretation of Canon Law explained that, even at Mass, Communion should not be received more than twice a day. No special occasion is required for the second Communion, but it must be within a Mass.

The rule is meant to encourage reception of Communion whenever we attend Mass, but also to prevent abuses in receiving multiple Communion out of superstition or mistaken devotion.

Learning from John Paul the Great

Late pope marked papacy with courageous action

It's hard to believe that one year already has gone by since Pope John Paul II passed on. In many ways it's as if he never left us.

How could we possibly forget this great soul? His multifaceted, far-reaching papacy so deeply influenced both church and world. Generations yet to be born will benefit from the faith-filled life of Karol Wojtyla.

The church's first Polish pope hit the ground running. Just months after his election he was standing in the shadow of the U.S. Capitol, proclaiming:

"We will stand up every time that human life is threatened. When the sacredness of life before birth is attacked, we will stand up and proclaim that no one ever has the authority to destroy unborn life!"

After hearing those words, I knew that the man then standing in the shoes of the fisherman was a dynamic leader. A truly a prayerful man, John Paul marked his papacy with action — bold, challenging, courageous action!

Everywhere he went and in everything he did, he proclaimed the Gospel's liberating power. John Paul proclaimed that Christ came to free us from sin and every form of oppression, and that it was the church's task to continue his liberating work.

He was a powerful foe of abortion, infanticide, euthanasia, embryonic stem-cell research and cloning. With equal zeal he denounced the inhumanity of war and military preparations.

Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said, "The pope's basic position rests on this premise: War in the 21st century is not the way to resolve problems." The conditions justifying war are in the modern age "so rare that they are almost nonexistent!"

The late pope wrote in his Jan. 1, 2000, World Day of Peace message that "war is a defeat for humanity. Only in peace and through peace can respect for human dignity and its inalienable rights be guaranteed."

He called for an end to the death penalty. He urged us to be faithful stewards of the Earth.

And he condemned the greed of market-driven capitalism, which overwhelmingly favors the rich while often crushing the poor.

He asked, "How can we fail to consider the violence against life done to millions of human beings, especially children, who are forced into poverty, malnutrition and hunger because of an unjust distribution of resources between peoples and between social classes?" ("The Gospel of Life," 10).

Pope John Paul II was unconditionally pro-life!

For our own growth in holiness, as well as for the good of our church and world, we should commit ourselves to reading, reflecting, dialoguing and praying over the writings and example of John Paul the Great.

Like St. Thomas More, he was "a man for all seasons." His life has much to teach us.

Bishops and priests can better learn from him to lead passionately and relentlessly in the defense of life and human dignity.

Educators can learn to be completely consistent in teaching respect for people in every stage of existence.

Legislators can learn to promote legislation courageously that protects all life and promotes the full development of the world's peoples.

Each of us can learn to do more to build the kingdom of God — a kingdom of justice, peace and love.

How those who are gone live on in us

The Human Side

FATHER
EUGENE HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

"The real question before our death, then, is not, 'How much can I still accomplish?' or 'How much influence can I still exert?' but, 'How can I live so that I can continue to be fruitful when I am no longer here among my family and friends?'"

In this quote, the noted spiritual writer Father Henri Nouwen gave us much food for thought about the true meaning of our existence. How do we live on in others after we are gone?

No doubt books, movies and outside events have played a role in making our life fruitful. But when it comes to the most lasting influences, isn't it true that there were particular persons who continue to touch us deeply even though they are dead?

In my case, my mom, dad and grandparents still live on in me. During World War II, all Americans were encouraged to conserve. I remember my parents and grandparents driving this home to me when I was a young child.

They taught me the value of a victory garden where we grew our own vegetables. We saved everything that could be saved, and we turned out the lights whenever they weren't needed.

Every Sunday we walked to Mass, and when novenas were conducted at the basilica, we took the streetcar to attend them. During Holy Week we visited all the churches in the old Italian neighborhood.

Though my parents and grandparents are dead, they continue to enrich my life. I grow my own vegetables, save whatever can be saved and turn out the lights.

I love devotions, walking to church and taking public transportation.

Outside my family, others also continue to enrich my life, even though they are gone. Thanks to a history professor who visited Europe each summer and returned with spellbinding stories of his travels, I have traveled to Europe, often immersing myself in its history.

Thanks to a teacher who taught us the history of music, I have a collection of classical music I love.

During the early days of my priesthood, I lived with priests who taught me that we priests are human beings and not glorified idols on a pedestal. They were always on the same level with the parishioners, and they had a great sense of humor.

They are dead now, but their down-to-earth spirit lives on in me.

And even though he is dead, Father Nouwen continues to enrich us by reminding us that those who added splendor to our lives while living continue to do so; they lived a fruitful life. He reminded us that as long as we breathe, the meaning of our life deepens when we make it as fruitful as possible for others.

Our good, enriching, supportive and wholesome example immortalizes us.

Marriage after the first years

When romance fades, deeper intimacy needed

I've watched Cinderella 10 times this week.

My 2-year-old is obsessed with the fairy tale. It might be the fantastic dress or the glass slippers, but it's probably prince charming and the idea of "happily ever after."

At 2, she may not be ready for a frank talk about marriage (how commitment and devotion have more to do making love last than a magical spell), but I think it's crucial for her to learn the truth at some point because too many young adults go into marriage believing in the "happily ever after" myth.

As I approach my 10-year wedding anniversary, I don't mean to sound like the grim reaper, suggesting that marriage is all work and no fun.

But let's face it: Sitting down at the breakfast table with my husband day after day for years on end loses a bit of its initial excitement; children and a combined "to-do" list hold hostage some of the spontaneity and romance of those first few years.

Most of us have to work at keeping the flame burning.

Biologically speaking, there is a reason for this. When the first sparks of romance fly, the brain is flooded with a neurotransmitter called dopamine. Dopamine creates the intense feelings, the exhilaration, that have you wanting to spend every waking moment with your loved one.

But like a drug, the brain adapts to the neurotransmitter, and the neurons need more and more of it to produce the high.

In long-term relationships, successful couples have learned how to stimulate and sustain production of oxytocin, a hormone that promotes feelings of connection and bonding.

According to anthropologist Helen Fisher, married couples can do things to help production of oxytocin like massage and making love.

Knowing marriage has stages can be helpful to the young couple getting ready to say "I do."

"Love changes," says Les Parrott III, co-author of "Saving Your Marriage Before It Starts."

"There is an ebb and flow to it. When romance is present, life is wonderful. But we cannot demand this of love or of our partner," he said.

Parrott blames the tragedy of so many failed marriages on the "happy ever after" myth we are sold in childhood.

Our Turn

THERESE J.
BORCHARD

When the romance fades, it's critical for couples to hang in there and to communicate as best they can until they find a new place of cooperation and comfort, and a real happiness that is different — and better — than what the myth promised.

If they can make it through the disillusionment period, they eventually will encounter a deeper intimacy with their partner in which they accept weaknesses and strengths together, and make good on their wedding vows.

Moreover, knowing that the good stuff comes with sticking it out can help when you wake up one morning and find your mate is no prince charming.

Mountain mission provides spiritual home for Alexander County Catholics

ACTIVE YOUTH GROUPS, OUTREACH PROGRAMS A PART OF HOLY TRINITY CHURCH

TAYLORSVILLE — Holy Trinity Church lies nestled in the heart of the Brushy Mountains just southeast of Hickory. In 1984, the church was established as a mission of St. Aloysius Church in Hickory.

With the combined efforts of St. Aloysius Church pastor Msgr. Eugene Livelsberger and Catholic families in Taylorsville, a farmhouse on a 6.7-acre lot was purchased and two rooms were renovated to make a chapel for the growing community.

The first Mass in Taylorsville was celebrated Easter Sunday 1984. Msgr. Livelsberger, who retired shortly after that first Mass, said he wanted the mission to be one of the crowning points of his final year in the priesthood.

The first few weeks, about 22 families attended Masses and four children were enrolled in Sunday school. That fall, religious education classes were begun, consisting of two teachers and eight children together in one classroom.

The mission family was growing rapidly and a necessary expansion of the chapel area was completed in 1988. Less than a year later, Father Joseph Waters, minister to migrants for western North Carolina, began using Holy Trinity Church as living quarters and became the mission's administrator.

In 1990, the mission had outgrown the farmhouse chapel and a capital campaign was begun to provide funds for a new facility. Catholic families worked long hours on the project, building everything from the framework to the stained glass window behind the altar.

The building, which seats 180 people and is located behind the original parish farmhouse, was dedicated March 22, 1992.

In 2000, Holy Trinity Church was reassigned as a mission of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Lenoir.

In 2003, administration of Holy Trinity Church was once again transferred, this time to St. Philip the Apostle Church in Statesville.

In recent years, Holy Trinity Church has continued to grow. While the first few months of Masses in 1984 had an average attendance of 35, today nearly 300 Catholics worship at two Masses each Sunday. Usually 80 to 100 people attend the English-language Mass, and more than 200 Hispanics fill the church to standing room only at the Spanish-language Mass.

The religious education program now has 60 students registered, most of whom are Hispanic.

The church currently has an active parish council, youth group, Hispanic ministry and youth group, food closet and soup kitchen, and an outreach ministry program.

Members of Holy Trinity Church also minister to the inmates at Alexander Correctional Institute in Taylorsville.

As one of the younger Catholic communities in the Diocese of Charlotte, Holy Trinity Church continues to succeed because of the pioneering spirit of its members and the insightful leadership of its clergy.

RING OF FAITH

Pictured on the hand of Debbie Squicciarri is the $15,000 engagement ring recovered by Ron Bledsoe, a plumber at Mount St. Mary's University in Emmitsburg, Md. Squicciarri's ring slipped off her finger and vanished into the toilet and believes Bledsoe's efforts, and St. Anthony's intercession helped find it.

Plumber rescues $15,000 ring with help from St. Anthony EMMITSBURG, Md. (CNS) — As a plumber at Mount St. Mary's University in Emmitsburg for 24 years, Ron Bledsoe has recovered all kinds of items accidentally dropped down sinks and washed away in the sewer system.

Calls for help usually involve saving lost contact lenses or the occasional cell phone.

But on Feb. 20, Bledsoe faced his most challenging rescue mission ever: finding a $15,000 engagement ring that disappeared down a toilet at Cogan Student Union Building.

Debbie Squicciarri, a high school teacher from Ramsey, N.J., was visiting Mount St. Mary's when she went to the ladies room. After blowing her nose and tossing the tissue into the toilet, the diamond engagement ring slipped off her finger and vanished when the automatic-flushing system kicked in before she could grab it.

"I immediately freaked out," said Squicciarri, who had received the ring only six weeks earlier on Christmas night.

Bledsoe turned off the water and removed the toilet from the wall in a failed attempt to find the ring. A few weeks later, he took all the pipes apart, but still couldn't track it down.

Acting on a hunch that the ring may have traveled through the underground plumbing system to a bend under the fourth manhole cover from the Cogan building, Bledsoe began checking the spot twice a week.

On March 20, the determined plumber saw the glistening ring resting under an inch of murky water.

The ring was returned to its elated owner March 27.

"Not only did he continue looking for it, when he found it he was honest enough to return it," said Squicciarri, who gave Bledsoe a cash reward for his efforts. "He's a very kind, honest and humble man."

Bledsoe said he was driven by the sad expression on Squicciarri's face when she lost the ring.

"Just the way she looked that day made me want to find it," he said. "She was devastated."

While the plumber did the grunt work, Squicciarri is convinced he received heavenly assistance. After losing the ring, Mary Battaglini, Squicciarri's aunt, started a prayer chain consisting of six people praying to St. Anthony, the patron saint of lost items.

Did the intercessor make a difference? "Absolutely," said Squicciarri.

As soon as she returned home from Mount St. Mary's, Squicciarri went to the jeweler to have round balls soldered into the band so that it won't fall off again.

At Catholic prayer breakfast, bishop urges battling moral relativism

WASHINGTON (CNS) — From commonly used language to societal priorities, the "moral relativism" decried by Pope Benedict XVI often seems to be the only way to cope with modern times, said Bishop Robert C. Morlino of Madison, Wis., urging participants at the National Catholic Prayer Breakfast April 7 to work against that tide.

In a program that also included remarks by President George W. Bush and the Vatican's representative in Washington, Bishop Morlino's keynote address warned about the "dictatorship of relativism" and described the enforcement mechanisms employed in maintaining that dictatorship.

He said the mass media and "those who pander to polls" keep society focused on relativism. They employ inconsistency between civil laws and practices and the use of language that hides the true meaning of certain activities to keep people from applying the moral standards of natural law to everyday life, he said.

Bishop Morlino gave the example of protests by some people against "warrantless surveillance" by government agencies in pursuing terrorists, while other U.S. groups encourage warrantless surveillance of people's garbage bins, to ensure they are following local laws about recycling.

One type of surveillance is considered "politically incorrect," he said, while the other is "politically correct" and accepted by the same people who decry the other type of surveillance.

"Redefinitions, euphemisms and anomalies" are among the language games he said people use to make what under natural law would be morally unacceptable to everyone become an accepted part of the normal life, Bishop Morlino said.

"Language games are very dangerous," Bishop Morlino said.

FROM THE VATICAN

Scientific progress must not come at cost of human dignity, says pope

Pope: Universities can play key role in sustaining values

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Scientific and technological progress must never come at the cost of the life and dignity of people, Pope Benedict XVI told participants of a Vatican conference on higher education.

He said universities and other institutions of higher learning can play a key role in sustaining the ideals and values that uphold and protect humanity while still pursuing scientific advancements.

The pope made his remarks in an April 1 meeting with educators and government ministers who took part in a seminar sponsored by the Vatican's Congregation for Catholic Education.

The international gathering focused on the cultural heritage and academic values of European universities.

Universities have always stood out for their "love of knowledge and search for the truth," the pope said in his address.

But educators and university heads must clarify the purpose of institutions of higher learning: Are they at the service of individuals caught up in their own special interests or at the service of those who are "open to solidarity with others in the search for the true meaning of existence?" the pope asked.

He said universities must never just pass on knowledge to students, but also must be concerned with educating new generations by "appealing to the heritage of ideals and values" upon which Europe was built.

The humanistic tradition was founded on Christian values, he said, making European universities "authentic laboratories for research" and deepening knowledge.

Pope urges students at Opus Dei conference to share their faith

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Meeting with some 5,000 university students attending an Opus Dei-sponsored conference, Pope Benedict XVI encouraged them to deepen their friendship with Christ so they can share their faith with their friends.

The UNIV 2006 Conference brought students from some 200 universities in 32 countries to Rome for a week of study and exchanges on faith and modern life, focusing especially on the mass media.

Meeting the students April 10, the pope said it was obvious that the mass media do not always promote "personal relations, sincere dialogue and friendship among people," and they do not always help people cultivate their relationships with God.

The only way to combat the negative influence of the media, he said, is to "keep Jesus as one of your dearest friends, rather your best friend. Then you will see how friendship with him will lead to you opening yourselves to others."

Pope Benedict reminded the students that St. Josemaria Escriva de Balaguer, the founder of Opus Dei, used to preach about the "apostolate of friendship," which involved being a true friend to others and sharing faith with them.

"Every Christian is called to be a friend of God and, with his grace, to attract one's friends to him," the pope said.

The pope told the students that through prayer and the sacraments, especially the Eucharist and penance, they would grow in friendship with Jesus and become a "new generation of apostles."

Anthony Njubi Gichiki from the Opus Dei-related Strathmore University in Nairobi, Kenya, spoke on behalf of the students, first of all in conveying their best wishes to the pope for his 79th birthday April 16.

DIOCESAN REQUIREMENTS FOR REPORTING MINISTRY-RELATED SEXUAL ABUSE OF A MINOR

1. Any individual having actual knowledge of or reasonable cause to suspect an incident of ministry-related sexual abuse is to immediately report the incident to the Chancery.
2. The Chancery will then report the incident to the proper civil authorities. The individual reporting the incident to the Chancery will be notified of the particulars regarding the Chancery's filing of the incident with civil authorities.
3. This reporting requirement is not intended to supersede the right of an individual to make a report to civil authority, but is to ensure proper, complete and timely reporting. Should an individual choose to make a report to civil authority, a report is still to be made to the Chancery.

Celebrating stewards

PARISH DINNER HIGHLIGHTS STEWARDSHIP EFFORTS

ARDEN — St. Barnabas Church in Arden recently celebrated its fifth anniversary of stewardship efforts in the parish.

A spaghetti dinner, prepared by the Knights of Columbus, was held in the parish hall March 25 as a way to acknowledge and thank parishioners who have given of their time, talent and treasure.

Father Roger Arnsparger, pastor, and Deacon Art Kingsley, permanent deacon at the parish, helped serve the dinner.

"St. Barnabas' stewardship program has become a way of life for its parishioners with the many ministries that are provided for their participation," said Cathie Stout, coordinator of volunteers at St. Barnabas Church.

Parish ministries include family and community life, youth, respect life, eucharistic adoration and evangelization.

"Parish life benefits from this participation as the parishioners give freely and generously," she said.

CLEMMONS — The Knights of Columbus of North Carolina's District No. 11 recently awarded more than $40,000 to organizations that assist people with mental disabilities.

The funds were distributed to 21 organizations during a dinner held at Holy Family Church in Clemmons March 30. Approximately 135 people attended the dinner, catered Holy Family Church volunteers.

Councils participating in the fundraising were Santa Maria Council 2829, Holy Cross Council 8509, Bishop Greco Council 9499 and Our Lady of Mercy Council 10504.

A total of $40,804.24 was raised through the Knights' Operation LAMB (Least Among My Brethren) campaign. Most of the funds were raised through the councils' annual Tootsie Roll drives at supermarkets, industrial complexes and restaurants.

Since 1973, $15.5 million has been raised by the Knights to assist individuals with mental disabilities throughout North Carolina.

volunteers, as well as Augustinian friars and nuns in Kwa-Zulu-Natal, a rural region in South Africa.

The volunteers, mostly recent college graduates, spend a year ministering in various locations in the United States, Mexico, Peru and South Africa. Like Echelmeier, the other Kwa-Zulu-Natal volunteers have written Lenten reflections about working in St. Theresa's Orphanage.

After Mass on March 26, Father Doyle, pastor of St. Margaret of Scotland Church in Maggie Valley, greeted members of the parish's youth faith formation group and their parents with "Sawubona," Zulu for "hello."

The youngsters' attention was locked on Father Doyle as he told about his visit to the orphanage and the nearby Our Lady of Mercy Church and St. Leo's School.

St. Leo's wasn't like the schools they attend in Haywood County. It has nine classrooms for its 390 students but no electricity to light the rooms on dark, rainy days.

"Don't they have candles?" Christopher Peterson, 13, asked.

"No," Father Doyle replied. "No candles. Nothing."

When it's windy, sand and dirt blow through the unscreened windows, bringing eye and skin irritation and a parasite that gets under the children's skin. Not fatal, but extremely irritating.

"Imagine your attention or lack of attention (if you were scratching at these parasites)," Father Doyle said.

Father Doyle visited 14 orphaned children living in a hut, three hours' walk from the school. They leave at 4:30 a.m. each day to attend classes at St. Leo's School.

They come to school hungry. For some, lunch is the day's only meal.

St. Theresa's Orphanage has its own school, but not necessarily much food.

A friar there told Father Doyle that one day he noticed a group of children around a fire in a nearby vacant lot. When he investigated, he found that they had shot a bird out of the air and were cooking it.

Celebrating Christmas

The Augustinian sisters, whose convent is in France, have been in Kwa-

Zulu-Natal for 100 years. They staff the orphanage, and the Augustinian volunteers are working with them and at the school. Some have asked to stay at Kwa-Zulu-Natal another year.

The volunteers, Father Doyle said, "were the light in the darkness for me. I was so touched by their dedication."

While Fathers Doyle and Wenzel were there, 16 Villanova University students arrived to spend two weeks of their Christmas break at the orphanage, painting buildings and playing with the children.

On Christmas day, Cecilia, a parish volunteer, took the priests to visit four families in their unfurnished mud houses. Well, not entirely unfurnished — one house did have a bed for the five people who live there.

The visitors brought food to the families, who apparently wanted to save it for later.

"Do you know what one family had for Christmas dinner?" Father Doyle asked the youth faith formation group at St. Margaret of Scotland Church.

The children shook their heads. "Tea," he said. "They boiled water and their entire Christmas dinner was tea."

At one house in South Africa, the children were each given a Christmas present but had no idea what to do with them. They simply held the wrapped packages until told to open them.

Restoring dignity

Several years ago, the nuns asked for a priest to come to minister. The first to volunteer was Augustinian Father Ed Hatrick, now 76. He had been stationed in Japan for 40 years, but moved to Kwa-Zulu-Natal, where he learned the Zulu language.

Father Doyle asked him why he transferred to South Africa.

"I'll never forget what he told me," said Father Doyle, his voice filled with awe. "He said he wanted to spend his last years doing the works of mercy."

Father Hatrick contacted wealthy Japanese friends who had funded building Our Lady of Mercy Church, where worship is joyful.

"I was there for Mass in Zulu and it was so spirit-filled I couldn't believe it," Father Doyle said. "People were singing and swaying."

Apartheid, which kept blacks separate from whites, officially ended in 1994, but is still a factor. A wealthy parish about five miles away ignores the nearby poverty.

"That's why we're there," Father Doyle said of the Augustinian presence.

He reminded those indignant over the neglect that this happens in other places, too, including the United States.

St. Margaret of Scotland Church children and parents wanted to know what they could do to help the people in Kwa-Zulu-Natal.

He asked the parents to get together to decide how they would like to help.

"It isn't just material poverty," he said. "That's one issue. 'It's also a poverty of human dignity, but they are rich in love, in sharing whatever they do have.'"

"It's just horrible to hear about (the poverty)," Christopher Peterson said after the presentation.

"I think it's good for the kids to hear this," his mother, Carol Peterson, said. "I want them to know there are kids whose needs aren't always met. It's a humbling experience to know that we're not the center of the world and (for them) to maybe do something when they're college graduates, and to do something now."

Young Hispanic men and women, including 50 from the Diocese of Charlotte, take part in a procession as part of a regional youth encounter in Atlanta March 24.

Hispanic youths gather in Atlanta to examine life in America

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

ATLANTA — Nearly 600 Hispanic young adults recently worked together to prepare a document examining the situation of Hispanic youth and young adults in the Southeast episcopal region.

Fifty young Hispanic men and women from the Diocese of Charlotte traveled to Atlanta March 24 to take part in the Regional Youth Encuentro de la Red March 24.

The goals of the encuentro (encounter) were to identify the needs and aspirations of Hispanic youths; develop a common vision and pastoral principles; create pastoral models and practices; create strategies to improve pastoral action; and provide leadership training and promotion.

Throughout the United States, Hispanic young adults have spent the past year participating in a grassroots study of their lives as young Catholics in the country.

"Anyone observing these young adults could not help but admire them for their diligent work ethic and sincere desire to give of themselves completely to the task at hand," said Grey Nun of the Sacred Heart Sister Eileen Spanier, young adult director for the Diocese of Charlotte.

"These young men and women are strong leaders who possess a wide array of skills for competent, collaborative leadership," she said. "They are willing to contribute what they are and have to build the kingdom of God."

The grassroots process has been used by the National Hispanic Ministry office three times in the last 35 years: in 1972, 1977 and 1985. The U.S. bishops' National Hispanic Pastoral Plan published in 1987 was the result.

This year marks the first time the process has been used specifically with youth and young adults. Materials and simultaneous translation were available in English and Spanish to facilitate the participation of non-Spanish-speaking Hispanic youths and for non-Hispanic youths and adult observers at the meeting.

"It is my hope that what we are accomplishing here will be shared with other ethnic populations to build a strong base for the Catholic Church," said Sister Spanier. "A church that is inclusive and dependent on the shared gift of all, a church that will truly reflect 'unity in diversity.'"

"The Hispanic young people's enthusiasm and desire to help one another has always been an inspiration to me, and it was evident among the 600 participants in Atlanta," said Franciscan Sister Andrea Inkrott, director for Hispanic Ministry for the Diocese of Charlotte.

Juan Jose Rodriguez, the Southeast Pastoral Institute for Hispanic Ministry's youth director will edit the results from 60 groups into a regional document that will be taken to the national encuentro in Notre Dame, Ind., June 8-12.

Thirty delegates from the Diocese of Charlotte will represent the diocese, along with Ricardo Veloz, diocesan Hispanic youth and young adult coordinator.

"There are 45 million Hispanics in the United States, and half of them are younger than 27," Piarist Father Mario Vizcaino, Southeast Pastoral Institute director, said in a gathering of the region in October 2005. "They are not the church of tomorrow; they are the young church of today."

Rallies, prayers and marches show nationwide support for immigrants

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — From Los Angeles to St. Louis, and from Jackson, Miss., to Washington, D.C., hundreds of thousands of people nationwide put on white shirts and picked up American flags to join rallies, marches and prayer services April 9 and 10.

The events were part of the National Day of Action for Immigrant Justice, to call attention to the contributions of immigrants and to ask for changes in immigration law and policies.

In several cities, Catholic bishops gave speeches and led prayers. Many participants were encouraged to join the activities at their churches.

Crowds estimated to be as large as 500,000 in Dallas April 9 and in Washington April 10 blocked city streets and surprised even organizers with their size.

At an April 10 vigil at Our Lady Queen of Angels Church in downtown Los Angeles, Cardinal Roger M. Mahony prayed in Spanish to "the God of one and all" to help members of Congress not be exclusionary, and he asked for the intercession of Mary, an immigrant who fled to Egypt with her son, Jesus.

In St. Louis the day before, Archbishop Raymond L. Burke said, "It is not right to make immigrants the scapegoats of social and political problems of our nation. It is profoundly unjust to place the blame for the acts of terrorism perpetrated by a few at the door of all immigrants."

On a stage where he was joined by Protestant, Jewish and Muslim leaders, he said: "Our presence here today expresses the teaching common to our different religious traditions which instructs us to receive immigrants as true brothers and sisters."

In Chicago about 400 people gathered to pray for immigration reform April 10 at Our Lady of Tepeyac Church, days after senators left Washington for a two-week recess without voting on a comprehensive immigration bill worked out in a bipartisan compromise.

The congregation prayed the Stations of the Cross, with each station focused on one aspect of immigrant life, from the lack of access to health care to unscrupulous employers stripping undocumented workers of their dignity.

At the last station, "Jesus is laid in the tomb," Our Lady of Tepeyac pastor Father Robert Casey said that for immigration reform advocates it is a "time of watchful waiting ... of waiting inside the tomb."

In Colorado Springs, Colo., more than 500 people participated in a lunch-time immigration rally April 10.

"These are people who are paying taxes, buying from our stores and paying the sales taxes, contributing to their communities and churches and schools," said one speaker, a migrant worker named Jesus who did not give his last name. "This is not a group that should be pushed off to the side."

"Some people say that we come here and take all their resources, but we pay taxes," said a rally organizer, Victor Orozco.

"Immigrants pay taxes, immigrants work. ... The immigration system does not work," he said. "So when people think that we come and take all their resources, we say 'No, we want to work.'"

In a statement for an April 10 rally in El Paso, Texas, Bishop Armando X. Ochoa urged people to use the two-week Senate recess to contact their representatives "to let them know that we expect true reform, and not just enforcement that does little to address the reality of the immigration situation in our country."

About 2,000 people were reported to have attended that rally. A few days earlier, a march for Cesar Chavez Day brought out more than 6,000 people in El Paso.

In Indianapolis, about 20,000 people — dressed in white to show solidarity — lined up for blocks on downtown streets, waving American flags and carrying placards.

"God Bless America," "The Dream continues," "Immigrants make good Americans," "Immigrants are Hoosiers" and "Somos todos inmigrantes/We are all immigrants" read some of the signs.

"I think it's important to stand up for the rights of people," said Juan Escamez, pastoral associate for the Hispanic community at St. Phillip Neri Church in Indianapolis.

A native of Spain, Escamez moved to the United States with his family 25 years ago.

"It is important to defend the poor, the oppressed, the outcast. That's why we're here," he said.

Thousands rally in Winston-Salem for immigration rights

April 10. As in other cities, many involved wore white shirts meant as a symbol of their peaceful intentions.

The events were part of the National Day of Action for Immigrant Justice, aimed at opposing strict immigration enforcement legislation passed by the U.S. House of Representatives in December and encouraging more comprehensive bills that would not criminalize illegal immigrants and those who provide services to them.

Organizers also support legislation that would make it possible for the estimated 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants to legalize their status.

"Nationally, Saturday, April 10 was designated as a day to pray, to fast and to demonstrate that immigrants are willing to do work and want to be legalized so they can come out of the shadows while they contribute to the economy of the United States," said Sandra Hoyle, a parishioner of Holy Cross Church in Kernersville.

"These people want it known that they do pay taxes and obey laws," she said. "They also want to send their children to schools of higher education."

Martin Mata, director of the parish's Hispanic ministry, helped in the demonstration's planning.

"It was also in response to the Catholic campaign for justice and reform and to the U.S. bishops' call for justice for immigrants," said Mata. "It comes from the roots of the people — to practice what Jesus told us to do — to welcome the immigrants."

Amid a sea of American flags and a smattering of Mexican flags were posters that read, "We are not criminals," "We are all immigrants here," "I am only a kid, what have I done?" and "Plymouth Rock, landing of the first undocumented immigrants."

There were calls for unity and solidarity among all peoples.

The keynote speaker was Juan Hernandez, an American who grew up in Mexico and served as special advisor to Mexican President Vicente Fox on immigration issues.

Hernandez fought to end border violence and helped establish programs of the U.S.-Mexico Partnership for Prosperity to improve Mexico's poorest regions.

"The giant has awoken," said Hernandez of the crowd. "And it's a friendly giant; it's a giant that loves the United States."

Hernandez asked those gathered if they are willing to learn English, to which they replied, "Si, se puede" ("Yes, we are able"). He asked if they were willing to pay taxes. Again, in unison, the reply was, "Yes, we are able."

When asked if they were willing to become U.S. citizens, they overwhelmingly replied, "Yes, we are able."

Billy Hunt, a member of the Tuscaroro Native American tribe who resides in Brown Summit, said he came to support the immigrants.

"If anybody has a right to be here, I see them (as having that right) as much as anyone else," he said. "Puerto Rican, Mexican or whatever other nation they come from, they have a right to be here."

Mark Atkinson, an immigration lawyer in Winston-Salem, said the rally's purpose was to show support for a comprehensive immigration reform that secures the nation's borders and creates a path for legalization for immigrants currently in the country.

Many Hispanics in the past, he said, have stayed quiet during immigration debates, working hard at jobs that offer little rest.

"Now is the time to no longer be quiet," Atkinson said to the crowd.

Carmen Dugarte, a native of Venezuela and parishioner of Holy Family Church, attended the rally to support her fellow immigrants.

"We want to be free in this country," she said. "We want our voices to be heard in the government because they are working for the United States. We want our children to go to college, to have health insurance, to build businesses here."

Enedino Aquino, Hispanic ministry coordinator for the Greensboro Vicariate, also came to support the immigrants.

"We are here because we believe in the Gospel of Jesus, where it says man has dignity, which is a gift from God," he said. "This country needs to respect our dignity, because we are not criminals, we are human beings."

"And if we remain unified, we have a voice," he said.

Catholic, Protestant women gather for reflection, learning

BREVARD — Catholic and Protestant women came together to enrich their Lenten experiences.

Approximately 200 women from 21 churches including Baptist, Presbyterian and Methodist, gathered for a Women's Day of Reflection at Sacred Heart Church in Brevard March 30.

The event, themed "Trusting in God," was hosted by Sacred Heart Church's Ladies Guild.

It was the first interfaith gathering of women in the Brevard area for a day of learning and prayer.

Jane Derrick, Bible teacher and workshop leader at the Billy Graham Training Center in Asheville, was the event's featured speaker. Drawing on Scripture and her own experiences, Derrick spoke on "Trusting in God when the Path is Hard" and "Trusting God's Love."

Many of the participants, who worked in small groups for sharing and insight, said they were looking forward to another Women's Day of Reflection next year.

Priests rededicate to ministry, bishop blesses oils at Mass

During the annual Mass, priests rededicate themselves to their priestly ministry.

During the Mass, the bishop blessed the oils to be used in administering the sacraments of baptism, confirmations and anointing of the sick throughout the diocese in the upcoming year.

Bishop Jugis, along with concelebrants Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin; Benedictine Abbot Placid Solari, abbot of Belmont Abbey; Abbot Patrick Shelton, pastor of St. James Church in Hamlet; Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and chancellor; Father John Putnam, judicial vicar; Father Paul Gary, rector of St. Patrick Cathedral; and other clergy of the diocese, gathered with about 100 priests, permanent deacons and seminarians for the diocese to celebrate the liturgy with the people of faith whom they serve.

During his homily, the bishop extended a special welcome to the priests who will retire this summer and those who are celebrating anniversaries of priesthood ordination.

The recommitment ceremony, which followed the Liturgy of the Word, included the priests' renewal of their dedication as ministers of Christ, striving to be more like Christ and being faithful to their sacred ministry.

"The priest has so much to give, because he constantly draws from the wellsprings of compassion and holiness in heart of the high priest with whom he is sacramentally identified," said the bishop.

Bishop Jugis urged the priests to be authentic in their ministry, a ministry that reveals Jesus Christ.

"The priest is a reservoir of the holiness and compassion of Christ for the people of God," he said. "The faithful come to us ... to drink of the holiness and compassion of Christ. The priest acts in person of Christ as high priest and good shepherd."

Following the liturgy of the Eucharist, Bishop Jugis blessed the three oils used in sacramental and liturgical practices.

Vials of the oils are dispensed to every parish and mission church in the diocese. With the sacred oils — and having recommitted themselves to the mission they share with their bishop — the priests returned to their parishes, rededicated in spiritual union with the diocesan faithful.

Seventh-graders at Our Lady of Grace School in Greensboro re-enact the Passion and death of Jesus during a living Stations of the Cross at Our Lady of Grace Church April 12. An earlier presentation was offered March 29.

"I was moved by the solemnity and prayerfulness of our students as 'Jesus' is condemned and begins to carry the cross up the aisle of the church," said Principal Gary Gelo.

Gelo said both he and many of the students were moved by the performance. After Jesus was taken down from the cross, the students left the church in reverent silence.

"The kindergarten students went back to their classrooms and drew what they learned from the experience," said Gelo.

The drawings are shown to the seventh-graders, who "recognized the impact and importance of their message as Catholic leaders in our school and community," said Gelo.

Gelo said the re-enactment was "the most moving and prayerful experience I have had in my 20 years in Catholic schools."

"At moments like this, one recognizes that our school has the opportunity to provide faith-filled memories for children that will last a lifetime," he said. "This is what makes us unique and special ... each day our children teach us by their example to be faith-filled followers of our Savior."

CELEBRATING EASTER

Have palms, will process

GREENSBORO — Catholics in Greensboro recently joined Protestants in a palm procession.

Parishioners of St. Pius X Church joined members from Newlyn Street United Methodist Church and Northside Baptist Church in the procession through Greensboro on Palm Sunday, April 9.

The procession included a donkey, handled by a member of the Methodist church.

The event was covered by a

Greensboro television news station.

Palm Sunday, also known as Passion Sunday, commemorates Christ's jubilant entry into Jerusalem and marks the beginning of Holy Week.

Pope Benedict XVI lead Palm Sunday Mass in St. Peter's Square at the Vatican April 9.

During the Mass, the pope said that the poverty of the Gospel must be understood not only as a material condition, but as a spiritual state of humility.

Lenten program focuses on Jesus' life, suffering

THOMASVILLE — Aspects of Jesus' life have been the focus of a unique Lenten program at Our Lady of the Highways Church in Thomasville.

Hundreds of parishioners have participated in the weekly program, which followed Mass and was based on the Marketplace 29 A.D. Vacation Bible School curriculum, customized by Kathy Laskis, the parish's faith formation director.

"Each Wednesday night of Lent we are concentrating on a different aspect of Jesus' human life," said Laskis.

With 110 people signed up to participate the first night, parishioners dressed in period costumes visited the Nativity, "walking" to Bethlehem behind Mary and Joseph and their donkey.

"We ate bag suppers out of cloth bags that we carried with us," said Laskis. "When we got to Bethlehem, we signed our names to the census with a quill pen and paid our taxes."

"Then the angels announced the birth of Jesus to the shepherds and then to everyone at the manger," she said.

Following Wednesdays featured other events in Jesus' life: the wedding feast at Cana, the Sermon on the Mount, the Good Shepherd story. On April 12, participants enjoyed a Seder meal.

"The idea is to live like Jesus did and eat the foods he probably ate so we can understand his human side and appreciate more his suffering and dying for us," said Laskis.

Students walk in U.S. leaders' footsteps

Conference offers historical perspectives

WINSTON-SALEM — Five students from Our Lady of Mercy School in Winston-Salem joined more than 200 outstanding middle school students from across the United States in a leadership conference in Washington, D.C. March 11-16.

Themed "The Legacy of American Leadership," the Junior National Young Leaders Conference (JrNYLC) introduced the students to tradition of leadership throughout U.S. history, while helping them develop their own leadership skills.

Joe Griffith, Rebecca Doyle, Carly Wooten, Allie Cross and Austin Smith, sixth-graders at Our Lady of Mercy School, were selected by teacher Barbara Burke to attend the six-day conference based upon their academics and leadership skills.

"The aim of the Junior National Young Leaders Conference is to inspire students to recognize their own leadership skills, measure their skills against those of current and former leaders and return home with new found confidence in their ability to exercise positive influence within their communities," said Mike Lasday, executive director of the Congressional Youth Leadership Council, the organization that sponsors JrNYLC.

"Young people are not only welcome in Washington, D.C., they actually keep this city and our country running," he said.

During the program, students took part in educational activities and presentations, and met with elected officials and key Congressional staff members on Capitol Hill. They also visited historical sites, such as Harpers Ferry, National Museum of American History, Washington's monuments and memorials and ended with a trip to Maryland Science Center in Baltimore, Md.

In addition to examining notable U.S. leaders and historic figures, students studied leadership throughout critical periods of U.S. history, including the Civil War, World War II, the Great Depression and the Civil Rights Movement.

Upon completion of the JrNYLC, the students from Our Lady of Mercy School gained a greater sense of understanding of the role of individuals in U.S. democracy, as well as the responsibilities of being a leader.

The Congressional Youth Leadership Council is a nonprofit educational organization. Since 1985, the council has inspired more than 200,000 young people to achieve their leadership potential.

Nearly 425 members of the U.S. Congress join the company's commitment by serving on the CYLC Honorary Congressional Board of Advisors. In addition, more than 40 embassies participate in the council's Honorary Board of Embassies.

Pen pals return from Iraq

Principal Gary Gelo and students of Our Lady of Grace School in Greensboro are pictured with U.S. Marine Staff Sergeant Travis Hawley (left) and Sergeant Oronde Smalls, who visited the school April 7. The Marines presented the school with an American flag that was flown on missions over Al Fallujah, Baghdad and Al Asad in Iraq in January.

Hawley and Smalls visited each classroom to personally thank the students for their support during the seventh months the Marine squadron was based in Iraq. The Marines answered questions and presented each student with an American flag as a thank you for their support of the squadron and a reminder of the importance of defending democracy.

Last Fall, Our Lady of Grace School students "adopted" Hawley's squadron of 23 Marines. Every grade level was involved in the project, corresponding with the squadron throughout the year.

For Christmas, the students made cards and raised money to buy phone cards that enabled the Marines to call their loved ones for the holidays.

Pages of falsehoods

'Da Vinci Code' lies could bring more interest in faith, speaker says

BY ANA RODRIGUEZ-SOTO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

CORAL GABLES, Fla. — Instead of fearing or trashing "The Da Vinci Code," people of faith should view it as a much-needed vaccine against ignorance, according to Thomas Ryan, chairman of the religious studies department at St. Thomas University in Miami.

"It is a novel that holds a mirror up to us — to silly academics and people who misuse facts," Ryan told a group of Protestant, Catholic and Jewish leaders gathered March 22 for the monthly clergy dialogue sponsored by the National Conference for Community and Justice.

He said talking about the popular book — and upcoming movie — should "strengthen our congregations to be able to deal with what's out there" in terms of religious ignorance and misconceptions.

"This is a vaccine," said Ryan, whose area of specialization is medieval church history.

"This articulates the silliness that's out there. We could use it as a way of inoculating ourselves," he said.

Ryan, who only recently read the novel, said his personal reaction to it was: "Thank you, Dan Brown. ... I am grateful to (the novel) for driving me to learn more about my faith. It raises questions that I need to go and see. I'm a smarter person as a result of it."

He described the novel as "a brilliant money-maker" with all the right ingredients: a murder, a mystery and a conspiracy.

As one character in the book acknowledges, "Everyone loves a conspiracy." Even more so, Ryan said, when "it incenses the faithful."

Brown "wants us to think that this is nonfiction. And a lot of people have fallen for the bait," Ryan said. But "it's not nonfiction."

He said that "on practically every page there is falsehood" and "outrageous claims that are completely unfactual."

"I think the author puts in all those mistakes to alert us" to the fact that it is a work of fiction, Ryan said. "It's a story of people who use false evidence to support their claims. And don't we meet those people every day?"

"I think it's a story of humanity," he said. "I think Dan Brown is kind of laughing at us. It mocks our gullibility."

Participants at the clergy meeting noted that the novel might not have been as popular, or raised such a polemic, in a less secular age.

Many people today are seeking spiritual answers outside mainstream religions, and the Catholic Church is not the only one dealing with misconceptions and revisionist theories about the foundations of the faith.

Some in Judaism, for example, are questioning whether Abraham really existed or the Exodus actually took place, said Rabbi Herbert Baumgard, rabbi emeritus of Temple Beth Am in Pinecrest.

"It is out there and it's all over the place. The whole thing is being questioned and has to be considered," said Rabbi Baumgard, who has read the novel.

Rev. Priscilla Felisky Whitehead, associate minister at the Church by the Sea in Bal Harbour, also read it, and described it as "fiction robed in age-old rumors." Her church is affiliated with the United Church of Christ.

Members of her congregation have asked her questions about what is true and what is false in "The Da Vinci Code," she said. The problem is they do not want to take the time to do the research.

"They want me (to dig it out) for them," she said.

Like Ryan, however, she is grateful to Brown for one thing: "It's no longer inappropriate to talk about Jesus at a cocktail party."

"When there's something in the popular culture going on, it's a great opportunity to agree with it, disagree with it or talk about it," said Rabbi Edwin Goldberg, who hosted the clergy meeting at Temple Judea in Coral Gables.

"One thousand years from now, God willing, there will be people talking about the Bible. No one will be talking about Dan Brown," he said.

God is ready to clear our doubts, fears

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Perhaps Thomas is the best model for belief we have. He's so modern. He believes in nothing he can't see or touch with his own eyes and hands. He's outspoken, hard-headed.

He's so much like us, and his behavior is so much like the contesting and quarreling attitude so many of us take on claims that seem just a little too good to be true.

After all, weren't we raised on the Better Business slogan: "If it seems too good to be true, it probably is?"

But Jesus, knowing just how contentious Thomas is, still responds in as humble and generous a fashion as is possible, so much better than Thomas, or we, deserve.

"Take your finger and examine my hands. Put your hand into my side. Do not persist in your unbelief, but believe!" Jesus tells Thomas, who at that very moment must have been the most dumbfounded, incredulous person on the planet.

It was enough for him, as he said in response for all of us: "My Lord and my God."

This account should embolden not only our belief but our willingness to encourage others, even as they express their anger and disbelief.

A lot of times people want to hush others as they express their anger at God, and certainly there must be some outer limits to such expressions as we seek to respect our place in a universe we did not create.

But I always feel that God, the same God who responds to Thomas' doubts, is big enough to handle any doubts, anger or disbelief we may have, always ready to meet doubters to their faces.

So I think we can tell doubters to express their questions to God and ask him to make the reality of his presence clear to them.

He did it for Thomas, and I believe he will do it for each one who needs to know, just as much as Thomas did that he came in the flesh, died and rose from the dead so that we could be forgiven of our failures and shortcomings, our sins, and live in fellowship with God.

Questions:

What doubts do you have about God's presence in our world? What beliefs about the resurrected Christ require the most faith for you?

THE BEAUTY OF FAITH

At Vatican Museums, a new way of looking at old things

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The problem with being a 500-year-old museum is that the science of collecting and displaying pieces has changed dramatically.

To celebrate its half-millennium, the Vatican Museums has decided not to host special temporary exhibits, but to focus on restoring, rearranging or reopening significant pieces of its permanent collection and opening new collections.

One of the Vatican Museums' new collections is composed of the smallest items that once belonged to the Pio-Christian Museum: a collection of sculptures, epigraphs and sarcophagi from the catacombs of Rome.

The new collection of early Christian antiquities had been under the care of the Vatican Library, but in 1999 Pope John Paul II transferred it to the Vatican Museums.

For seven years, experts in archaeology and museum design prepared the collection for its late-March opening.

Gone, for the most part, is the 18th-century organizational plan, which basically boiled down to putting all the round items together and all the square items together.

The collection includes more than 1,000 medals, cameos, etched or gold-painted glass, ivories, oil lamps and bronze or silver cups and bottles found in the catacombs of Rome and surrounding towns.

While they are not famous masterpieces, "the objects are signs of deep personal devotion, of martyrdom and of conversion — this is the value, the beauty they still transmit today," said Francesco Buranelli, director of the Vatican Museums.

Although the previous arrangement of the collection was old-fashioned, the impulse that led Popes Clement XI and Clement XII to gather the artifacts was not, said Guido Cornini, the museum's director of decorative arts.

"Collecting paleo-Christian artifacts not so much as art, but as documentation is a very modern idea in museography," Cornini said.

The objects "speak of a way of living the faith, not by the elite who commission great paintings, but by ordinary Christians," he said.

In 1756 Pope Benedict XIV ordered his predecessors' collections to be organized and displayed in a new museum with the aim of "promoting the splendor of Rome and affirming the truth of Christian religion."

The museum's collection does not take people's breath away as much as it demonstrates the care taken even by ordinary Christians to bury their loved ones with signs of their religious identity and their trust that they would join the saints and martyrs in heaven.

Today, the Christian Museum occupies a long corridor on the main thoroughfare from the Sistine Chapel to the museums' exit, and most visitors simply would walk past the glass-fronted antique cupboards filled with the little artifacts.

The Vatican Museums hope more people will pause for a look now that the cupboards have been restored, the lighting modernized and the items rearranged.

The first step, Cornini said, involved "a long, painstaking research into the pedigree of each piece."

While the new exhibit does place some items together based on the material they are made of — for example, the images of saints on glass or the terra-cotta oil lamps — most of the objects are now grouped together according to the catacomb in which they were found.

"Putting them in their context gives an idea of life and death from the first to the sixth centuries," Buranelli said.

The objects probably will not stop people in their tracks, as does the awe-inspiring grandeur of the Sistine Chapel with Michelangelo's famous frescoes, he said, but even a quick peek in the cupboards demonstrates that almost from the beginning Christians felt a need to communicate the beauty of their faith by making something beautiful.

Pope watches TV movie, calls predecessor 'untiring prophet of hope'

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II was "an untiring prophet of hope and peace," Pope Benedict XVI said after watching a made-for-television movie about his predecessor's pontificate.

Pope Benedict joined an estimated 8,000 people March 30 in the Vatican's audience hall for the premiere of the Italian production, "Karol: A Pope Who Remained a Man."

The movie is the sequel to "Karol: A Man Who Became Pope," which aired in Italy shortly after Pope John Paul's April 2, 2005, death and in August on the Hallmark Channel in the United States.

The first movie portrayed the life of Karol Wojtyla up until his 1978 election as Pope John Paul. The second film covered the years of his papacy, ending with news footage of his funeral.

Both films were based on the Vatican-approved book, "Stories of Karol: The Unknown Life of John Paul II."

Pope Benedict told those watching the film with him, "The sequence of images showed us a pope immersed in contact with God and, precisely because of that, always sensitive to human hopes."

Recreating scenes from his trips around the world and from audiences at the Vatican, "it gave us a way to relive his meetings with many people, from the great of the earth to simple citizens, from famous personalities to the unknown," the pope said.

High school team shines at Model Security Council

KERNERSVILLE — The Model United Nations team from Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville is again making strides.

The team participated in a high school Model Security Council at Appalachian State University April 5.

Under the leadership of faculty advisor David Seidel, the team worked in pairs to represent the interests of different countries while discussing a variety of issues, including human trafficking to peace in the Middle East.

Twenty-six students of the 48-member team won awards.

Honorable mentions were given to the following pairs of students: P.J. Dascoli and Neil Goodman, Molly Riazzi and Maggie Ronan, Jenny Pentz and Hannah LaRoe, P.J. Stanford and Andy Ronan, and Matt Sutter and Mike O' Shea.

Four pairs of students were recognized as excellent delegations: Melissa Plunkett and Teri Walsh, Lohr Beck and Sarah Booker, Ify Wilson and Breanne Long, and John Valitutto and Brendan Regan.

Students Matt O'Neill and Tony Barker were awarded the distinction of superior delegation. Jordan Cain and Tyler Frankenburg were honored with best delegation.

The event marks the end of a victorious season for the Model U.N. team, which was designated as "best high school" in the national Model U.N. competition in Washington, D.C. in February.

Survivors shocked by tornado destruction

"You never think it's going to happen to you," said Trahan, a parishioner at St. Stephen Church in nearby Old Hickory.

Across the state the storms damaged as many as 3,000 buildings and 167 people were injured. In Sumner County, there were reports of nine deaths, 150 people were injured, and up to 900 homes, farms and businesses were damaged or destroyed.

"You never think you're going to be on the receiving end," Trahan said. "It's tough being on the receiving end. It's humbling."

People from three Nashville parishes have rallied to help Trahan, her son and fiancé, Chad Rowan, find an apartment, clothes and furnishings.

Trahan was at the house of her friends with her son when the tornado ripped through Gallatin, a small town of about 20,000 people about 15 miles northeast of Nashville.

When her fiancé heard about the coming storms, he raced to their home to check on their dogs.

He pulled into the garage just minutes ahead of the tornado, took care of the dogs, and jumped into a closet for safety, Trahan said.

He did not have time to close the garage door, and when a woman driving by saw the approaching tornado and the open door, she ran into the garage for cover with her 4-year-old daughter.

Rowan did not know they were there until the tornado had passed and he heard the woman screaming, Trahan said.

One of the brick walls of the garage had fallen and the woman was pinned under the work bench. The woman suffered some broken ribs and a cracked hip but her daughter was unhurt, Trahan said.

Jean Lovell, her husband and two daughters were in the family's veterinary clinic when the tornado hit.

When they saw the storm approaching, the Lovells gathered in an interior room with no windows.

The storm blew the windows and doors out of the clinic, she said. "I heard the roof being peeled off."

Afterward, while the clinic was still standing, Lovell said, a woman was found dead in her car in the parking lot. The vehicle was blown into the lot and landed upside down.

The business next to the clinic was a pile of rubble. Found dead there were two people, including the 25-year-old son of the owner of the business.

Overcome with emotion, Lovell said through tears, "His business is gone, his son is gone."

Joseph Handsonman carries a mattress April 9 from his aunt's home in Goodlettsville, Tenn.; the home was destroyed by one of several tornadoes that hit the area April 7.

Vianney Church in Gallatin, were unable to leave the clinic immediately after the storm because the winds had knocked down electrical lines and they didn't know if they were hot, Lovell said.

The family started to become upset when they could smell leaking gas, Lovell added. But emergency workers were soon on the scene to help.

The Lovells will operate their large-animal clinic from their farm until they can reopen their clinic, Jean Lovell said. In the meantime, friends and fellow parishioners have been helping them clean up the damage at the clinic.

About 30 people showed up April 8 at Trahan's home to help her family begin cleaning up, Trahan said.

At St. John Vianney Church, there was no damage to the church or school and no parishioners were killed in the tornado.

But many parishioners' homes were damaged, and "nine families lost their homes completely," said Debbie Dawes, parish secretary.

She was busy in the aftermath of the storms trying to link the many offers to help with the people in need. "We have a list of about 40 families offering to do whatever anybody needs," Dawes said.

The night the tornado hit, the parish's Knights of Columbus council had a fish fry planned. Several Knights came to the parish in the hours after the tornado and started frying the fish, which they later handed out to rescue workers and people who had lost their homes, Dawes said.

The gift we must give children

Focusing on God's beauty fights pessimism

St. Augustine wrote, "We are an Easter People, and alleluia is our song."

I wonder how true that is for the average Catholic.

There is so much cynicism and discouragement in the air these days that we need a strong antidote against joylessness.

We need to ponder the words of Jesus, who has the power to lift us higher: "Be not afraid; in this world you will have many troubles, but take heart, for I have overcome the world."

It is so important to teach our children to count their blessings.

Of course we must teach them the catechism, but religion is more than theology. Teaching religion involves conveying a spirit of excitement about the gifts of faith, life and the promise of eternal happiness.

Religion is about interacting with the infinite love of God, about giving ourselves joyfully to our Maker. The Mass is a celebration, not merely a religious duty or a church ritual. It is an act of love.

We give ourselves to God at the Offertory, and he gives himself right back to us in the reception of holy Communion.

When we allow the spirit of complaint and negativity to flourish in our families and schools, we do children a great disservice.

Pope John Paul II taught, "Christ came to bring joy, joy to children, joy to parents, joy to friends and families ..., joy to all people. Joy is indeed the keynote message of Christianity, and the recurring motif of the Gospel."

The problems of this world are monumental, but they could be infinitely worse. Even if all those problems were solved tomorrow, the media still would report bad news, and people still would find things to complain about.

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOIR
CNS COLUMNIST

Our tendency to give in to discouragement too easily is at the heart of the problem.

Dr. Robert Muller wrote: "People all too easily forget, and are induced by the media to forget, how beautiful life really is, and how good the vast majority of people really are."

We all need to become messengers of joy, especially for the sake of the children.

We have to instruct children that optimism is hard work, so too is devotion and love of neighbor, and that the highest values of the human spirit are attainable, with the help of God.

The only way to root out the tendency to give in to self-pity and negativity is to demand more of ourselves and of the children we teach.

How can we do this? Start with the practice of helping them to focus on God's beauty all around them by smelling the roses and listening more closely to the birds as they sing their lovely songs of joy.

We can all learn to do a better job of giving thanks to God for the wonders of his creation.

Help the children to look within in order to find God, the source of their being, who is love, joy and peace. Teach them that God's beauty enters one's heart through all the senses.

"Just as the body grows and flourishes on a healthy diet, our joy can grow and flourish when fed a steady diet of beauty" (Thomas Kinkadee).

Teaching children how to protect themselves from pessimism and fear is the greatest gift we can give them.

Pope says Easter preparation with penance is good for the world

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The traditional practice of preparing for Easter by going to confession is good not only for individuals, but for the world, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Acknowledging one's sins and being forgiven for them, he said, gives a person peace, which spreads from the heart to an individual's actions, bringing peace to the family, the community and eventually the world.

Explaining the church's Holy Week and Easter rituals during his April 12 general audience, the pope said the violence that exists in the world is a sign of too many people's inability "to reconcile themselves in order to begin again with sincere forgiveness."

Jesus' resurrection "gives us the certainty that despite all the darkness in the world sin will not have the last word," he said. "Strengthened by this certainty, with greater courage and enthusiasm we can commit ourselves to the birth of a more just world."

After discussing the Holy Thursday Mass of the Lord's Supper, the pope spoke about the eucharistic adoration that follows the liturgy.

In the dark and silence before the Blessed Sacrament, he said, Jesus calls Catholics to "stay and watch" with him the night before his death, just as he asked his disciples to do.

But also like the disciples, he said, "too often we fall asleep."

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

On Good Friday, the pope said, Catholics contemplate Jesus on the cross, gazing "at his pierced heart" in order to recognize "the cosmic dimension" of God's love for all creation, "a love that goes beyond all understanding."

To prepare for the great joy of the Resurrection, he said, "the church asks its faithful to receive the sacrament of penance as a type of death and resurrection," a new beginning in the life of faith.

"Aware that we are sinners, but trusting in divine mercy, let us be reconciled with Christ in order to experience more fully the joy that he gives us with his resurrection," he said.

The grace given through forgiveness and absolution, Pope Benedict said, "is a source of interior and exterior peace and makes us apostles of peace in a world where, unfortunately, divisions, suffering and the dramas of injustice, hatred and violence continue."

At the end of the audience, a children's choir sang "Happy Birthday" to the pope in English. He will celebrate his 79th birthday April 16, Easter.

Letters to the Editor

NFP helps couples operate within God's laws

I was happy to see The Catholic News & Herald spreading the good news about natural family planning in the March 10 issue ("Gynecologist employs natural family planning principles in practice").

Natural family planning (NFP) is a highly effective and safe method for married couples to postpone or avoid pregnancy, or for couples wishing to conceive a baby.

While it is well documented that NFP is superior to artificial birth control when it comes to physical side effects and potential health risks, it is difficult to put into words why NFP is also superior when it comes to spiritual and emotional implications. Perhaps it comes down to trusting what Jesus Christ teaches us through the Catholic Church concerning human sexuality, marriage and contraception.

Once we put into practice what he teaches us, we begin to experience and understand its benefits. Anyone can have sex, but only a husband and wife operating within God's laws can have each other.

When married couples practice kindness, affection, mutual obedience, faithfulness, forgiveness and openness to life, together they can take on the unique crosses they are given by divine providence with joy, trust and confidence.

Power of prayer and peace

Thank you for the article on the Power of Prayer Penny Project for our troops ("Louisiana woman's penny project sends prayers, support to U.S. troops," March 24).

Military families sacrifice so much for freedom; it's good to see people rallying in support and prayer. Prayer for peace is one thing Pope John Paul II asked of all the world's children.

COMPLACENCY BLINDS US

I was pleased to read Karen Osborne's column in the March 17 issue ("Just when you thought discrimination was gone"). She is right that our complacency can blind us to the discriminatory attitudes that keep us from valuing and respecting others.

— Jeanne Devany Cummings

Easter season is for falling in love again

Jesus' death, resurrection offers hope

There is something peculiar about the greatest celebration of the liturgical year. We actually celebrate this great event at a different date every year because we still go by the phases of the moon.

In fact, we celebrate Easter on the first Sunday after the first full moon of the spring equinox, obviously set to coincide with the rebirth of life that erupts from a bulb planted in the winter ground, representing a message of hope from nature.

Rabbits, eggs, butterflies and lilies don't make Easter, but they are powerful signs of fertility, resurrection and hope.

But for me, the most powerful symbol is the empty tomb. I have been in many cemeteries to bless tombs, and yet I have never seen an empty one.

The two Marys who went to the tomb were astonished to see the empty tomb, and I don't blame them. By reading the account of the Resurrection, we clearly understand that this empty tomb is as important as the cross — were it not for the empty tomb, the cross would have been a tragedy.

The women were determined to again see the Lord they loved. Perhaps the crucified Lord was only the beginning of their spiritual journey. Their love story had to continue. Once we fall in love with the Lord, he becomes a magnet in our lives.

Guest Column

FATHER JOHN
C. AURILIA
GUEST COLUMNIST

We search for him because we want to be with him. We don't know everything about the God-man who died for us until we become part of his love story.

The Resurrection, therefore, is about "witnessing" the cross and the empty tomb. Whenever we experience or witness Jesus, we celebrate his life and our lives.

Easter must be more than lilies, rabbits, butterflies and eggs when we really listen to what the Gospels tell about the Resurrection. We Catholics are the Gospel's people who see the real Jesus, not simply the picture or the statue.

Happy Easter, and enjoy the real person of Jesus in our eucharistic banquet.

No good alibi

Coming of Age

KASE JOHNSTUN
CNS COLUMNIST

Hurting others hurts God

I have no alibi. I have no excuse. I have no reason. I have no story.

I just have to say I am sorry.

Saying "I'm sorry" for doing something stupid can be the hardest thing in the world to do. It can eat at your insides and make your head feel like a brick.

But when it is time to say it, we just have to say we're sorry.

The difficulty of saying it rises sharply when we've done something stupid and there is no logical reason behind our actions.

You didn't call a friend when the rest of you went out, and you knew it would hurt his feelings. You didn't stand up for someone who truly needed standing up for; you didn't use your ability to protect someone when you could.

If you never find yourself saying you are sorry, then the blinders you're keeping over your eyes need to be taken off and shelved. There is no one who hasn't wronged friends, family or strangers.

Sometimes we don't mean to harm, but we do it anyway. Yes, even priests, nuns and deacons will be the first to admit they are not perfect and that they need to say they're sorry sometimes.

One of our struggles throughout life is trying to avoid the reason for saying we're sorry: hurting others. It all boils down to avoiding what hurts others.

But when we do hurt others, we just have to say we're sorry.

Saying this to God is just as difficult. We hurt God as much as we hurt our friends. You, me, your parents and everyone else in the congregation has sat in the rows on Sunday and heard, "When you hurt others, you hurt God."

This is a difficult concept to accept because we can't imagine actually hurting God, can we? But truly accepting that when we hurt others we hurt God makes saying we're sorry a lot more serious and it makes the offense more slicing.

So when I say, "I just have to say I'm sorry," I don't mean that saying sorry is a way out. I mean that there is nothing else I can say because what I did to hurt you was wrong, there were no reasons for it and I can't explain it.

The only thing there is to say is, "Sorry."

The 'how' and 'why' of fasting

Q. Every Lent we are told about the "power of fasting," or that we should fast and pray about a particular problem. I know the rules about fast days, but can you explain more about why people fast and how? (Indiana)

A. Interestingly, fasting of some sort is observed by adherents of nearly every religion in the world. It takes many forms, perhaps total restraint from food and drink for a whole day or more, or "one full meal" with occasional snacks, or anywhere in between.

There are numerous valid and "practical" reasons people fast: to withdraw occasionally from one's normal intake of food and drink, to feel more alert and healthier, to sleep better, to lose weight, to gain self-control and so on.

Whatever else it may be, however, from the Christian perspective fasting is above all a religious act that puts people in better touch with God.

It is a unique way of expressing praise, love, hope and faith in God, of keeping ourselves open to the Lord's continual desire to fashion us in the image of Jesus Christ, into the complete human beings we were created to become.

The renowned second-century theologian St. Irenaeus wrote that God shaped us and continues to do so. Our job is to offer the Creator a heart that is soft and malleable.

Let the clay be moist, he says, so we don't grow hard and lose the imprint of his fingers.

A major challenge with fasting, as with all practices of self-denial, is that they can become mere external formalities, an end in themselves, and lose touch with their spiritual implications.

The prophet Isaiah once described how the people complained because they fasted faithfully but God didn't seem to notice (Chapter 58). God's reply was that they fasted, but then they quarreled and fought, they were selfish and cheated each other.

"This rather is the fasting I want," he said: Free the oppressed, share bread with the hungry, shelter the homeless and don't turn your backs on each other. Then, said God, people will fast and he will listen.

Marvelous words to reflect on during this Lent!

Food and drink are one of the great treasures of our lives. They are blessings God obviously wants us to enjoy intensely.

One of the great motives for fasting, therefore, is the one we find presented most often in the Scriptures. It is a way of responding to God's persistent flirting to get our attention, of telling God we're really serious about what we pray for, whether the prayer is praise and worship, asking some favor, giving thanks or any other intention.

Some relatively recent and excellent books about fasting are on the market. One of them is "Fasting Rediscovered," by Paulist Father Thomas Ryan.

He tells how in the Old Testament God falls all over himself to convince his people that he is there to give them what they need; they respond by telling God in this way how urgent are their wants.

Father Ryan describes how his father used to ride his bicycle around the block where his mother lived, hoping to get a glimpse of her through the window. Our sense of God, he says, must be like what his mother felt.

She knew he was out there circling, watching, hoping. When she went to the window, she knew he would know her, would listen to her concerns and would make a loving response.

As Father Ryan says: "Fasting is sending God a message. He's very good about answering his mail."

That is something people of faith who fast often already know, and the rest of us might learn.

Send-off of pilgrim cross opens countdown to World Youth Day 2008

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — With the unveiling of a logo, the handover of a pilgrim cross and the cheers of young Australians, the "road to Sydney" for World Youth Day 2008 was officially opened at the Vatican.

Pope Benedict XVI sent the World Youth Day cross on a two-year trip across Africa and Oceania after a Palm Sunday liturgy April 9.

Accepting it were young Australians, eager for the spiritual spotlight that will soon begin to swing across their country.

With Australian flags unfurled, the young people indulged in some lively celebration after the liturgy in St. Peter's Square.

"That was the spirit of Sydney on display," Morris Iemma, premier of the Australian state New South Wales, remarked at a press conference afterward.

He predicted that young people would find Sydney "the friendliest city and the most welcoming city" in the world.

Pope Benedict XVI gave the organizers a morale boost when he told pilgrims, "See you in Sydney, God willing."

When Australia was announced last year as the venue for the next international gathering, there was doubt about whether the pope would make the trip.

But the pontiff recently assured Cardinal George Pell of Sydney that he planned to come, said Bishop Anthony Fisher, an auxiliary bishop in Sydney and a chief organizer of the event.

Civil authorities say they expect about 130,000 foreign youths to come to Australia in 2008 for the July 15-20 celebrations, to be joined by about twice that number from Australia.

Some 500,000 people are expected to attend the closing papal Mass, which would make it the biggest event ever to take place in Sydney.

The cardinal said authorities had been extremely cooperative in discussions on visas, a chronic problem during the international World Youth Day encounters. He said the government would keep current immigration rules in place, but would impose no quotas on visas — and no quotas on individual countries.

Within Australia, Bishop Fisher said, the invitation to participate will be broader.

"What we're saying is that World Youth Day is an unabashedly Catholic event, but is open to all — those who have any or no religion," he said.

It's the first time the event will be held in Oceania, and the distance means fewer participants are expected from Europe, North America and South America.

On the other hand, organizers are drumming up interest in New Zealand, Papua New Guinea and the Pacific, offering travel subsidies to poorer youths, and are counting on significant participation from Asian nations like the Philippines, South Korea and India.

Cardinal Pell said World Youth Day would also welcome Chinese Catholics "with open arms."

The pilgrimage of the World Youth Day cross will have a key role in awakening interest and spurring spiritual reflection across the country, Bishop Fisher said.

He compared it to the relay of the Olympic torch, which came through Australia when the country hosted the Summer Olympics in 2000.

"But this time it's not about sport; it's about faith, and hope in young people," he said.

The World Youth Day program includes a Way of the Cross through Sydney, which will probably traverse five of the seven bridges over Sydney Harbor, Bishop Fisher said.

There were reports last year that Mel Gibson, who directed "The Passion of the Christ," would help stage part of the Way of the Cross in Sydney. Carolyn Grant, managing director of a public relations firm working with the Archdiocese of Sydney, said April 9 that "Mel's not officially on board."

The World Youth Day logo, publicly displayed during the Palm Sunday liturgy, features a design that combines the cross, the flame of the Holy Spirit and the distinctive shells of the Sydney Opera House.

When Australian journalists wondered, tongue in cheek, whether the opera house was in flames, Cardinal Pell assured them, "No, that's the flame of love."

Young people submitted hundreds of ideas for the logo, and a professional design company worked with the best suggestions. The outcome reflects the official World Youth Day theme, taken from the Acts of the Apostles:

"You will receive power when the Holy Spirit has come upon you; and you will be my witnesses."

A year after Pope world sees new style of papacy

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — In April, the church marks the first anniversary of the death of Pope John Paul II and the election of Pope Benedict XVI, events that captured the world's attention and introduced a new style of papacy.

Thousands gathered to pray in St. Peter's Square the evening of April 2, a poignant reminder of the vigil outside the late pope's window on that date last year, when a hushed crowd was told the pontiff had "returned to the house of the Father."

As his sainthood cause gathers momentum, Pope John

GIVING DIGNITY TO THE DECEASED

Volunteers bring prayers, concern to funerals of Louisville's poor

LOUISVILLE, Ky. (CNS) — Bordered by black hills of sludge, railroad tracks and a power station, River Valley Cemetery sets a dismal scene for the burials of Louisville's poorest citizens.

Only a handful of permanent headstones stand in the dirt-pocked grass field. Many of the ground-level grave markers — made of metal and plastic — have been mangled and moved by mowing equipment.

The scene was worse a couple of years ago when indigent men, women and children were laid to rest in particleboard caskets without a witness or word of prayer.

The particleboard boxes are still used but now, thanks to the Jefferson County Coroner's office and volunteers from Epiphany Catholic Church in Louisville, each burial includes at least one witness, a bouquet of flowers and a prayer.

And St. Xavier High School students are poised to brighten the scene further, volunteering as pallbearers for the 100 or so 15-minute paupers' funerals held at River Valley each year.

Dr. Ron Holmes, Jefferson County coroner, met with students at the cemetery recently to show them what to expect during a funeral, including where they would place the casket and how it should be moved to the burial site.

Headstones are an important part of the cemetery ministry. Holmes' office has raised funds to pay for about 250 permanent stones. Epiphany Church also has donated more than $6,000.

So far Holmes has installed 200 stones, with more expected to be installed by June.

Holmes' office also is working to plant grass seed and keep the area trimmed. All of these efforts are about human dignity, he said.

"These people have had a life; they had families," he said. "No one needs to go out (of the world) alone like that.

"I think the (students) are going to get more out of it than they think," he said. "It's a neat feeling after (a funeral). You ... feel like you were a part of their life — that you're worthwhile. You did something for somebody that no one else would do."

Several young men from St. Xavier are forming the St. Joseph of Arimathea Society to carry out the need for pallbearers at River Valley.

"We're excited about taking part in this," said Ben Kresse, a theology teacher at St. Xavier and member of Epiphany Church. "It's a necessary part of our faith. We hope through our own efforts people will learn how many people come into the world with parents but leave the world with no one."

St. Elizabeth Ann Seton named patron saint of Maryland

BALTIMORE (CNS) — Maryland has a new heavenly protector.

St. Elizabeth Ann Seton, the first U.S.-born saint and a founder of what would become the Catholic school system in the United States, has been named the official patroness of Maryland by the Vatican.

Cardinal Francis Arinze, prefect of the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments at the Vatican, announced the title earlier this year in a letter to Baltimore Cardinal William H. Keeler.

The idea for the special designation came from Paul and Janet Venter, parishioners of Mother Seton Church in Germantown, Md., located in the Archdiocese of Washington, who asked Cardinal Keeler to seek the title from Rome.

The Baltimore prelate liked the idea and petitioned the Vatican for the special designation in a letter.

"Certainly, this is very appropriate for Maryland because of her role here," said Cardinal Keeler, pointing out that St. Elizabeth Ann was the founder of the Sisters of Charity, the first religious institute in the United States that was dedicated to education.

A New Yorker who belonged to the Episcopal Church before she became a Catholic, St. Elizabeth Ann established the first Catholic school in Baltimore in 1808 before relocating to the nearby town of Emmitsburg and moving her school there on land purchased by a donor in 1809.

Her religious order, now known as the Daughters of Charity, was approved by Archbishop John Carroll in 1812, and St. Elizabeth Ann Seton was elected superior. Members of her community established schools and ministered to the sick throughout the region and around the country.

Trust in God's mercy should be central to all Christians, pope says

Christians should mark every Sunday as feast of Lord's resurrection, pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Trust in God's divine mercy was central to the teaching of Pope John Paul II and should be central to the faith and prayer of every Christian, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Marking Divine Mercy Sunday April 23, Pope Benedict also prayed that God's blessings of reconciliation and peace would be given to all people.

Reciting the "Regina Coeli" prayer at midday, he wished a happy Easter to Orthodox and Eastern-rite Catholics celebrating Jesus' resurrection according to the Julian calendar.

"May the risen Lord give the gifts of his light and his peace to all," the pope prayed.

He also offered special prayers for the people of Serbia and Montenegro, Romania and Bulgaria suffering from the effects of flooding over the past week.

In his main talk, the pope focused on the Gospel accounts of the risen Lord appearing to his disciples and showing them the physical signs of his crucifixion.

"Those sacred wounds on his hands, feet and side are inexhaustible founts of faith, hope and love which everyone can draw from, especially the souls most thirsty for divine mercy," he said.

The pope prayed that Christians would mark every Sunday as the feast of the Lord's resurrection, experiencing "the beauty of an encounter with the risen Lord and drawing from the fount of his merciful love in order to be apostles of his peace."

Pope asks Jesuits to focus on teaching, research, dialogue

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Invoking the Jesuits' special vow to fulfill missions assigned by the pope, Pope Benedict XVI asked the Society of Jesus to concentrate on teaching and research in theology and philosophy, dialogue with modern culture and the Christian education of future generations.

Pope Benedict met with hundreds of Jesuits and their collaborators April 22 in St. Peter's Basilica after a Mass honoring three of the first members of the order.

The Mass commemorated the 450th anniversary of the death of St. Ignatius of Loyola, the order's founder, and the 500th anniversary of the births of two of his first companions: St. Francis Xavier and Blessed Peter Faber.

Pope Benedict called the three "men of extraordinary holiness and exceptional apostolic zeal."

"Precisely because he was a man of God, St. Ignatius was a faithful servant of the church," the pope said. "From his desire to serve the church in the most useful and efficient way, the vow of special obedience to the pope was born."

Pope Benedict asked the Jesuits to continue to be faithful to that vow so that "the urgent, current needs" of the church could be met.

Father Peter-Hans Kolvenbach, superior general of the more than 19,500-member order, thanked the pope for his affection and trust in the Society of Jesus.

He told the pope that it was right for the order to honor the three early Jesuits and "see them as enlightened and secure guides for our spiritual journey and our apostolic activity even though the times and circumstances in which we live and work have changed radically."

Vatican official named coadjutor bishop in Venice, Fla.

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI has named Msgr. Frank J. Dewane, undersecretary of the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace at the Vatican, as coadjutor bishop of Venice, Fla.

As coadjutor, Bishop-designate Dewane will become head of the diocese upon the retirement or death of the current bishop, Bishop John J. Nevins of Venice.

The appointment was announced in Washington April 25 by Archbishop Pietro Sambì, apostolic nuncio to the United States.

In Florida, Archbishop John C. Favalora of Miami said in a statement he welcomed the appointment and was grateful the pope named a coadjutor for Bishop Nevins, 74, who had requested "additional assistance as his responsibilities continue to grow in the southwest part of the state."

The 9,000-square-mile diocese has a Catholic population of about 218,000.

An ongoing journey

Youths use labyrinth as prayer tool

LENOIR — Catholics in Lenoir were recently able to explore an ancient form of prayer.

The youth group at St. Francis of Assisi Church in Lenoir created a temporary labyrinth for use by parishioners April 7-9.

The labyrinth was created by Lorena Cowart, Emily Diehl, Hannah Doll, Amber Scarlett and Courtney Rascoe in a grassy area on the church grounds, with hay and fluorescent paint defining the path.

The parish was invited to "participate in a prayerful meditation journey that has been used in centuries past," said Linda Cowart, youth minister.

Mazes and labyrinths have been used by civilizations around the world, with the earliest known designs dating from about 3,000 years ago.

While a maze has dead ends, a labyrinth has only one twisting path that weaves its way to the center and back out again. There is only one entrance and one exit, no dead ends and no crossing of paths with a choice of which way to turn.

There has been a recent re-emergence of the labyrinth as a prayer tool within the Christian community.

The labyrinth at St. Francis of Assisi Church in Lenoir was inspired by the youth group's visit last year to a labyrinth at an Episcopal church in Wilkesboro. That labyrinth was based on the labyrinth design at Notre Dame Cathedral in Paris.

The "cathedral labyrinth" combines ancient Christian tradition with contemporary music, meditations, art and activities at 11 stations along the path.

"The more simple labyrinth we created is considered a classic design and has been found in some form in all parts of the world, in almost every culture throughout history," said Cowart.

It offered parishioners a chance to "travel a path to the center and contemplate the mysteries of our faith" and their own lives, said Cowart.

Young adults benefit from speaker series

THEOLOGY, from page 1

"Many young adults in the church struggle with their faith. Theology on Tap is a social, non-threatening atmosphere that encourages questions and learning," said Grey Nun of the Sacred Heart Sister Eileen Spanier, director of diocesan young adult ministry.

Many Protestant young adults can easily quote Scripture, said Sister Spanier, while many Catholic young adults do not truly understand the tenets of their faith.

"Many of us grew up Catholic, attending faith formation classes each Sunday and still aren't able to explain our faith or answer questions about the Catholic Church's teachings," said Catrina Conway.

Conway, planning committee chair for the Charlotte-based Theology on Tap, said the program is a way for young adults to learn and address concerns with others their own age while enjoying food, drinks and friends.

"Sometimes people are hesitant or intimidated to ask questions about their faith. Being with people your own age, you're more likely to ask questions because you feel they have them too," said Deb McCarty, program coordinator for the Greensboro-based Theology on Tap.

"Learning from each other's experiences inspires people and makes them think more about their faith," she said.

The Archdiocese of Chicago agrees. Its young adult ministry founded the speaker series 26 years ago to try to bring back young adults, who tend to drift away from the church.

The program aims to reach young adults where they are, and takes place in a variety of settings from restaurants and bars to parish halls.

The program has grown in popularity over the years and has inspired others to initiate similar speaker series. Dioceses in approximately 44 U.S. states and a half-dozen other countries now offer Theology on Tap.

Father John Cusick, director of young adult ministry in the Chicago Archdiocese and co-founder of Theology on Tap, estimates that tens of thousands of young adults have attended Theology on Tap over the past quarter-century.

Many of them tend to be "Catholic, but don't have a parish," he said, and have a poor understanding of church traditions.

"We hear a lot about spiritual hunger," he said. "People are having a restless experience in everyday life. You put on a Theology on Tap program, and they're there."

A 2005 survey conducted by the U.S. bishops' Subcommittee on Youth and Young Adults found Theology on Tap as one of the most popular programs the church has for reaching young adults.

"Through Theology on Tap, Catholic young adults can gain a greater appreciation of their faith, a closer relationship with God and a network of friends who share their beliefs and values," said Conway.

"Groups like this promote Catholicism and offer a sense of connectedness," said Melissa Schuler, a parishioner of St. Mark Church in Huntersville. "The informal environment gives you a better opportunity to learn things you didn't know."

The April 18 gathering in Charlotte featured a panel of two women religious, two seminarians and a layperson discussing their vocational callings. Upcoming sessions will cover social justice and the misinformation of "The Da Vinci Code" novel and soon-to-be-released movie.

The Greensboro gatherings typically draw 25 to 30 people. Charlotte gatherings usually see 45 to 75 people.

"Attendance at the spring 2005 series was high. The theme was 'Uncorking the Truth about God, Sex and the Sanctity of Life,'" said Conway.

Topics included Pope John Paul II's "theology of the body," the harsh realities of abortions, natural family planning and the abortifacient nature of chemical contraceptives.

"I think young adults want to know why the church takes such a strong stance on certain topics, and in learning why, they can learn the beauty of the Catholic faith," said Conway.

"Even after the meeting is over, people are still standing around and talking about the topic," said McCarty. "I'd consider that a success."

"It's a great way to get the truth of the Gospel across to people," said Worthington. "It's a superb social event with a bit of learning thrown in."

As Worthington discussed his road to the seminary, he encouraged those in attendance, whether or not they were considering the religious life, to have a spiritual director.

"Find people to talk to about, and who will support you in, your faith," he suggested to the group.

Catholic young adults can help discover and live out their purposes in life "by using the gifts God has given us to serve each other and those who are less fortunate," said Conway.

"There are numerous ministry opportunities and many activities may not be labeled as a ministry, but in reality they are some sort of ministry," she said.

"We're all called in different ways," said McCarty. "My calling is to help provide a place for Catholic young adults to come together and learn."

Pax Christi group gathers for immigrant rights at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in Hayesville, N.C., was one of 12 people demonstrating on the Cherokee County courthouse steps in Murphy.

Eleven were from the Pax Christi group Mahon started, which includes members of Immaculate Heart of Mary Church and St. William Church in Murphy.

The twelfth demonstrator was Josh Hampsher, pastor of Cornerstone Wesleyan Church in Bryson City, who learned of the rally via the Internet.

"We're called by God to show our love for each other and to help the marginalized," Hampsher said, adding that he wanted to "make some connections with others concerned with peace and social justice."

They held placards with such Bible quotations as, "You shall not oppress an alien ... for you were once aliens in the land of Egypt" (Exodus 23:9), and the opening verse from Emma Lazarus' poem on the Statue of Liberty: "Give me your tired, your poor, your huddled masses yearning to breathe free."

Everyone took turns reading aloud Bible quotes, such as Jesus' admonition: "What you did (or did not) do for one of these least ones, you did (or did not do) for me" (from Matthew 25:31-46).

"We don't realize that all we have is a gift," Notre Dame Sister Terry Martin said. "What we have is not just for our own use. We need to share our blessings."

On April 4, the Pax Christi group attended a program at St. William Church. Lori Khamala, outreach coordinator with the Durham, N.C., office of the National Farm Worker Ministry, presented information about migrant work and housing conditions.

The group learned about these conditions last year when it visited a camp near Murphy and now wanted to know more about how to help migrants.

Khamala's presentation underscored what they had learned from the migrants: men working all day in the fields, then working long hours at night in the packing house; boots with soles eaten away by pesticides; no portable toilets in the fields; insufficient numbers of showers to enable workers to shower quickly to remove pesticides.

The Catholic Migrant Farmworker Network Web site states:

"Dermatitis and respiratory problems caused by natural fungi, dusts, and pesticides are common. Lack of safe drinking water contributes to dehydration and heat stroke. The absence of toilet facilities leads to urinary retention, which is in turn linked to urinary tract infection. Farmworkers suffer such infections more often than the general population."

The site adds that, "Migrant workers don't generally earn enough to pay for health care, and they almost never have health insurance. They may also lack transportation to the clinic or, since they don't receive sick leave, be afraid of losing wages or even their jobs if they take time off to seek health care."

As Michael Kauffman, a parishioner of Immaculate Heart of Mary Church and Pax Christi member, said, "I think it was at Lori's presentation that I heard that we used to own our slaves; now we rent them by the season."

Immigrant men are often crowded three or four into a bedroom, and some sleep on the floor because not everyone has a bed or mattress.

"Nobody deserves to sleep on the floor. Everyone has dignity," Mahon said.

He added that in the Bible, the Israelites were judged by how they treated widows and orphans, the most powerless members of that society.

At one camp, where Father George Kloster, pastor of St. William and Immaculate Heart of Mary churches, celebrated Mass, Mahon recalled, "One man said, 'We had to leave our country and our families to come here to find work. We really miss the sacraments, and we thank you for bringing them to us.'"

Diocese of Charlotte investigating alleged incident of sexual misconduct

CHARLOTTE — The Diocese of Charlotte is currently investigating an alleged incident of sexual misconduct involving a high school teacher.

The incident was reported April 24 by a senior at Charlotte Catholic High School. The alleged incident involved a Charlotte Catholic High School teacher and occurred two years ago at the teacher's home.

The teacher, who denied the allegation, was suspended April 24.

The Diocese of Charlotte reported the incident to the Department of Social Services as required by state law that day, April 24.

The diocese will comply and cooperate fully with any investigation by the authorities, while conducting its own investigation of the allegation.

The Chancery has notified the Diocesan Review Board, which reviews cases of sexual misconduct reported in the Diocese of Charlotte.

A letter was sent April 25 to parents of Charlotte Catholic High School students, informing them of the incident. A statement also was posted on the diocesan Web site.

The teacher was hired in 2001 after passing a background check. No other allegations regarding this teacher have been reported in the diocese.

The teacher had undergone diocesan training on and awareness of sexual misconduct by church personnel, as is required by diocesan policy of all diocesan employees and volunteers.

To date, approximately 13,000 employees and volunteers have attended this training at more than 300 sessions held throughout the 46-county diocese.

The Diocese of Charlotte continues its commitment to providing a safe environment for all people, especially the young and the vulnerable.

That really struck me."

Many migrants feel they have no choice but to leave their homelands to seek employment in the United States. Economic policies such as the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), passed in 1993, have forced thousands of Mexican farmers off their land.

"I wish I had enough money to pay a just wage, by Mexican standards, to every Mexican worker to go home for two years and see what that would do to our economy," Father Kloster said.

The fact is, migrants are willing to work for less money, and Americans are willing to let them.

As Mahon points out, "We need the cheap labor to supply cheap goods and services."

World sees new style of papacy since Pope Benedict's election

Paul remains in people's hearts, a fact witnessed daily in the seemingly endless line of pilgrims who come to his grave carrying flowers, notes or a silent prayer.

Pope Benedict, meanwhile, has used a simple and direct approach to win over the record crowds that are flocking to his appearances at the Vatican and elsewhere. Quietly and slowly, in more than 200 sermons and speeches, he has engaged the faithful and the wider society on the fundamental issues of truth, freedom, faith and human dignity.

"He's demonstrating that he's a true pastor of the universal church," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis. "He is bringing his great learning and academic achievements to bear in this role."

In some ways, it has taken a full year for the papal transition — a year to absorb the legacy of Pope John Paul's long pontificate and a year for Pope Benedict's papacy to come into focus.

"You can see Pope Benedict XVI has a great admiration and respect for Pope John Paul II, both as a person and as a leader in the Catholic community and beyond," said Father James Hawker, vicar for education in the Diocese of Charlotte.

The first year

The new pope found himself presiding over many events scheduled under his predecessor, like the Synod of Bishops last October, several canonizations, the closing of the eucharistic year, and numerous meetings and liturgies.

Pope Benedict has eased gently into his role. Those who hoped for tough new doctrinal pronouncements, wholesale removal of liberal bishops and a rollback in liturgical reform have been disappointed.

The pope's only major document so far has been an encyclical that focused on what he called the foundation of the Christian message, "God is love," and its implications for personal and institutional charity.

"I liked the theme of Pope Benedict's

"He's demonstrating that he's a true pastor of the universal church. He is bringing his great learning and academic achievements to bear in this role."

— Bishop Peter J. Jugis

first encyclical. It shows the stamp of his great intellect and was a good start for his papacy," said Bishop Jugis.

The much-discussed Vatican document barring men with deep-seated homosexual tendencies from the priesthood, although approved by Pope Benedict, was a project inherited from the previous pontificate.

The long-rumored replacements in the Roman Curia has happened yet. But in March, the pope made his first move to streamline Vatican offices. At least temporarily, the council dealing with migration was combined with the justice and peace council, and the council that dialogues with non-Christian religions — including Muslims — was combined with the council for culture.

The final alignment of curial offices is not yet clear and the changes may take months, but most expect a significant shrinking of the number of agencies.

Teaching the faith

For the last year, however, Pope Benedict's priorities have not been administrative. Instead, he has embarked on what might be described as a project to water the roots of the faith.

He has urged Catholics to rediscover Christ as the focus of their personal lives and to resist the tendency to make the individual ego "the only criterion" for their choices. The pope has been careful to phrase this as a sympathetic invitation and not a warning.

"We continually close our doors; we continually want to feel secure and do not want to be disturbed by others and by God" — and yet still Christ will come for his people, the pope said in a sermon last May.

As a teacher, he has turned to Scripture far more than doctrine, making connections between the early Christians of apostolic times and modern men and women struggling to live their faith.

"Pope Benedict has a very healthy understanding of the nature of education," said Father Hawker, "in that, with education, you share information so people will be formed and grow spiritually."

Pope Benedict XVI smiles as he leaves his weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square at the Vatican on the first anniversary of his pontificate April 19.

Pope Benedict has tackled contemporary social and political issues by emphasizing a few main principles: that human rights rest on human dignity, that people come before profits, that the right to life is an ancient measure of humanity and not just a Catholic teaching, and that efforts to exclude God from civil affairs are corroding modern society.

He returns often to a central theme — the relationship between God and man — in language that can be clear-cut and gripping.

"Human life is a relationship ... and the basic relationship is with the Creator, otherwise all relationships are fragile. To choose God, that is the essential thing. A world emptied of God, a world that has forgotten God, loses life and falls into a culture of death," the pope said in a talk in March.

He has zeroed in on what he has called Europe's spiritual fatigue, occasionally rattling the cages and rallying the forces on issues like gay marriage, cohabitation and abortion.

A steady pace

Compared to his predecessor's early years, Pope Benedict appears to be going at a slower pace. All the same, his list of first-year accomplishments is impressive:

— In February, he named 15 new cardinals and convened them March 23 for a discussion on any topic they chose.

— Last fall, he embarked on a reconciliation effort with Lefebvrite traditionalists.

— In August, he presided over World Youth Day celebrations in his native Germany, winning the respect of young people some thought-provoking talks. He also met with ecumenical leaders, Muslims, government ministers, bishops and seminarians.

— Late last year, he reviewed the major documents of the Second Vatican Council 40 years after its close. Then, in a major talk to the Roman Curia, he explained the right way and wrong way to interpret the council's teachings.

— He moved quietly last summer to encourage the successful appointment of new Chinese bishops acceptable to both their government and the Vatican.

— In December, he named a new apostolic nuncio to the United States.

"Pope Benedict has a marvelous commitment to ecumenism and reaching out to other religious bodies," said Father Hawker.

Throughout the year, the pope presided over ecumenical liturgies and met with a number of ecumenical groups, pledging continued efforts toward Christian unity. He also met several times with Jewish leaders, affirming the church's commitment to dialogue and reflecting on the Holocaust.

Papal stylings

Pope Benedict has had an overwhelmingly favorable reception among the tens of thousands of pilgrims who come to see him each week. When he moves through a crowd, he seems to look people in the eye.

"He enjoys meeting the faithful and being with them. He makes himself available and is generous with his time when meeting with all groups of people in both public and private audiences," said Bishop Jugis, who met twice with Pope Benedict in 2005.

Father Hawker, who served with consultants from around the world to the Vatican's Congregation for the Clergy in the 1990s, met then-Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger while he was head of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

"He was at home with people from every corner of the world," said Father Hawker. "He was extremely kind, gentle and humble, and a very good listener."

Last year, when the pope waived the normal five-year waiting period for the start of Pope John Paul II's sainthood cause, he showed he was sensitive to the popular voice of the church.

In April, when the crowds gathered to pray in St. Peter's Square, he joined them in remembering the late pontiff and the dramatic events set in motion by his death.

Churches celebrate Passover Seder

COURTESY PHOTOS

Parishioners of Sacred Heart Church in Brevard (above) and Our Lady of the Highways Church in Thomasville (below) celebrate the Passover Seder, a meal-and-prayer service in Jewish homes on the eve of the first day of Passover (and on the eve of the second day as well by Orthodox Jews outside Israel).

Some Christian families and parish groups hold modified Seder observances because the Last Supper, at which Jesus instituted the Eucharist the night before his death, is traditionally believed to have been a Seder meal.

Christian celebrations of Seder offer insight into the symbolism of the traditional Passover foods that are used in the Mass, such as unleavened bread and wine, according to Father Bob Colaresi, director of the Carmelite Spiritual Center in Darien, Ill.

"It helps you understand the symbols Jesus was offering us in the historical context of the day," said Father Colaresi. "Our understanding of the Eucharist is rooted in the celebration of Jewish Passover."

The Seder at Sacred Heart Church was led by Arthur Narins, who converted to Catholicism from Judaism. He has led Seders at churches and homes for 15 years.

More than 90 people attended the Seder at Our Lady of the Highways Church, led by John Dillon.

WAY OF THE CROSS

Via Crucis celebrated at Hamlet parish

HAMLET — Via Crucis, or Way of the Cross, was celebrated at St. James the Greater Church in Hamlet on Good Friday, April 14.

Way (or Stations) of the Cross is a traditional Catholic Lenten devotion, a public but nonliturgical act of prayer.

Parishioners at St. James the Greater Church, many of whom are Hispanic, celebrated Via Crucis in Spanish and faithfully depicted the Last Supper and the 14 stations depicting Jesus' procession with the cross to his crucifixion and burial.

"It's a way of experiencing what Christ experienced, certainly for our community," said Benedictine Father David Draim, parochial vicar. "They have a strong faith that Christ died for us."

In many South American countries, entire towns turn out for Via Crucis.

"It's huge there," said Nestor Restrepo, a native of Colombia. "Religion is very close to culture, I think, and this is a way to feel that connection."

Pope Benedict XVI led the first Way of the Cross service of his pontificate in the shadows of Rome's torch-lit Colosseum April 14.

The meditations on the 14 stations, written by Archbishop Angelo Comastri, vicar for Vatican City State, were written to help people realize that even today the sin and evil that led to Christ's suffering and death continue.

Archbishop Comastri noted that sins and divisions add weight to the cross Christ must bear. But he drew from Pope Benedict's first encyclical, "Deus Caritas Est" ("God Is Love"), to remind those who follow the Stations of the Cross that Christ's death and resurrection are the supreme signs of God's love and his desire to forgive.

"In his death, Jesus filled death itself with love; he filled it with the presence of God," the archbishop wrote.

Catholic author Muriel Spark dies at 88 in Italy

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Catholic novelist Muriel Spark, author of "The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie" and more than 20 other books, died April 13 in a hospital in Florence, Italy. She was 88.

Her funeral took place April 15 in the Tuscan town of Civitella della Chiana, where Spark had lived for almost three decades.

Spark, who became a Catholic in 1954, received the 2001 Campion Award, given annually to a noted Christian person of letters by the Catholic Book Club, a subsidiary of America Press.

A working journalist, editor and biographer, Spark did not publish any novels until she was 39, three years after she became Catholic. Her first novel, "The Comforters" (1957), was inspired by her studies on the Book of Job, according to a BBC Web site.

"Several critics agree that her religious conversion was the central event of her life," the BBC said of Spark.

In 1961 she published her most famous work, "The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie," the story of a charismatic teacher and her influence on a group of favorite girls.

It continues to be recommended reading for young adults for its perceptive observations on the allure of fascism and adolescent susceptibility to adult manipulation.

The student narrator in the novel converts to Catholicism as an adult. Adaptations of the novel for the stage in 1966 and for film in 1969 increased Spark's fame.

In a 1997 interview with the Sunday Telegraph, Spark talked about how being a Catholic influenced her writing.

"I don't propagate the Catholic faith but in a funny sort of way my books couldn't be written by anyone except a Catholic," she said.

"It's the only religion I view as rational — it helps you get rid of all the other problems in your life," Spark added. "There really is such a thing as beauty of morals."

In a later interview for BBC Radio 3, Spark said Catholicism "gives me an inner stability which enables me to write better, I feel."

"I was very tentative before" becoming a Catholic, she added. "I wrote biographies and I was very tentative about creative work. ... And somehow with my religion — whether one has anything to do with the other, I don't know — but it does seem so, that I just gained confidence, and I don't care if it's foolish or anything, I just write."

Spark's last novel, "The Finishing School," was published in 2005. She also wrote several volumes of poetry and biographical works on the Bronte family, Mary Shelley and others.

As followers of God, we should know one another

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Travis and Zach are twin brothers in the confirmation class I'm leading this year. There are a dozen other high school juniors in the group, nearly all of whom I've known since they were in sixth grade.

The twins, however, began participating in parish religious education classes only a couple of years ago, so I didn't know them too well.

I mostly saw them as somewhat disengaged in youth gatherings at church while their mother diligently insisted they attend regularly. Eventually I noticed signs of maturity. They at least made a show of seriousness in confirmation classes.

Travis occasionally spoke up in discussions. Still, it seemed obvious that they were doing only what was necessary to get confirmed and make Mom happy.

As confirmation neared, the group went on a weekend retreat. Beforehand, I mentioned to the twins' mother that we appreciated her sons' efforts but lamented that Zach was strongly dependent on Travis.

During the weekend, however, it became clear that I was wrong. In fact the two had not only very different personalities and interests, they were completely independent in the social sphere.

They shared their developing faith openly, and I had several informal conversations with each one in our time together. I realized I had not worked very hard at getting to know them.

At the end of the retreat we were hugging each other goodbye, and the next day I caught myself checking their baseball schedule so I could go to the next home game, drawing them into a growing group of young adults I've been blessed to know and love as I do my own children.

I'm not the Good Shepherd, but as his follower I needed that lesson. Jesus said he knows his sheep and they know him, and that he will choose to lay down his life for them.

It is hard to love and take on the concerns of those we don't know. We disciples are called to take the time and make the effort to appreciate the complex people God has created and placed in our lives — offered to us — so we will be able to love them as he does, placing their needs first.

Questions:

Who are some of the people you interact with regularly but whom you haven't gotten to know very well? What can you do to deepen those relationships?

Scripture to Illustrate:

"I am the good shepherd. I know my sheep and my sheep know me in the same way that the Father knows me and I know the Father" (John 10:14-15ab).

'United' heroes heralded in film

Lewis Alsamari (left) and Jamie Harding star in "United 93," a tense, well-acted documentary-style drama about the hijacking of an aircraft on Sept. 11, 2001, when passengers fought back, downing the plane in the ensuing melee and preventing destruction of a probable Washington target, while air traffic controllers on the ground struggled to make sense of what was happening.

Director Paul Greengrass has avoided exploitation with his dispassionate approach and the use of a no-name cast, but many will obviously find this extremely distressing. Yet as a testament to heroism and a vivid cautionary tale, the film is, on balance, a worthwhile endeavor.

Harrowing suspense, violence and bloodshed (though discreetly shot with quick editing), other disturbing Sept. 11 imagery, a smattering of profanity and four-letter words uttered under extreme distress.

The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted. Under 17 requires accompanying parent or adult guardian.

Traps of technology

Blogs pose dangers to students, Catholic legal expert says

ATLANTA (CNS) — Blogging poses grave safety and legal issues, said Sister Mary Angela Shaughnessy, a Sister of Charity of Nazareth, Ky., who is executive director of the Education Law Institute in Louisville, Ky.

"Two years ago, I don't think I could have told you what blogging is," Sister Shaughnessy said during an April 19 workshop at the National Catholic Educational Association's annual convention in Atlanta. "Now, I'm some sort of expert."

Blogs, a contraction of the phrase "Web logs," are archives of diarylike postings on individuals' own Web pages. Blogs are often collected on certain Web sites, such as www.myspace.com.

High school students, who often create blogs, "don't get it," Sister Shaughnessy said. "They don't get that giving their name, their address, their telephone number, the school they go to and the hours they go might get them caught."

Despite teens' seeming ignorance of the dangers of blogs, "parents know even less about computers than their kids do," she added.

School officials can get their students to remove any school logo from a blog, since it is an unauthorized use of a copyrighted symbol, but a blog, like much else in cyberspace, is "archived forever and you can't cut it off," Sister Shaughnessy said.

Father Fernandez answers call heard long ago

Lord," said Bishop Jugis during his homily. "A double measure of joy is given to us this season, as (we) give thanks to our blessed savior for the gift of a new priest."

Journey to the altar

For Father Fernandez, becoming a priest meant answering a call he had first heard as a high school student.

Born in Cuba, Father Fernandez immigrated to Philadelphia with his family when he was 9 years old.

As a young man, he earned a bachelor's degree in piano performance and a master's degree in psychology at the Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C. He settled in the Washington area, working as a school psychologist for the next 10 years.

In 1996, he said he received his call to a vocation in the priesthood — a call that first came when he was a high school student.

"It was kind of a difficult year.... I had accomplished all my goals ... but there was a void within me," he said. "As I prayed more about it, I realized my call was coming back."

After a year of discernment, Father Fernandez said, "Finally, God gave me the grace to say 'yes.'"

After five visits to Belmont Abbey,

"Finally, God gave me the grace to say 'yes.'"

Father Fernandez decided that the life of a Benedictine was the life meant for him.

"I felt at home the first time I walked through the door," he said.

Father Fernandez began his postulate in 1998, and went on to earn a second master's degree, this one in theology from Saint John's University's School of Theology/Seminary in Collegeville, Minn.

At the altar at last

"The power flowing from our Lord's resurrection will now be seen also in your priestly ministry, Father Agostino," Bishop Jugis said in his homily. "The grace of the sacrament of holy orders will configure you to Christ, the High Priest. You will act in the person of Christ, who desires to be always present to his faithful people."

Concelebrants of the ordination Mass included Abbot Placid Solari, head of the monastic community at Belmont Abbey; monks of the abbey; and other priests serving in the Diocese of Charlotte.

During the rite of ordination, Father Fernandez confirmed his promise to fulfill the office of the priesthood. Kneeling, he placed his hands between Bishop Jugis' hands in a promise of obedience.

The congregation was invited to join in prayer for the priestly candidate, the church and its people as he lay prostrate before the altar.

During the rite's most solemn moment, Father Fernandez knelt in silence before Bishop Jugis, who laid his hands on Father Fernandez's head in prayer. The Benedictine monks then followed suit, praying over their brother monk.

The celebration of the sacrament of holy orders was completed as the bishop extended his hands over the kneeling candidate and prayed the prayer of consecration.

Father Fernandez was vested with a stole and a chasuble — outer garments of the priestly office. The bishop anointed Father Fernandez's hands with sacred chrism and he was then presented with a chalice and paten signifying his role as celebrant of the Eucharist.

"Since you will reveal the presence of Christ and the power of his paschal mystery, celebrate the sacraments, especially the sacrifice of the Mass, with reverence and devotion," said the bishop.

The newly ordained Father Fernandez then joined his brother priests to concelebrate the Mass, thus opening the new chapter in his life.

of the six monks in formation, and serves as master-of-ceremonies at liturgies.

Father Fernandez said his main fidelity is to the monastery. Benedictines take a vow of stability, and the monastery becomes the family they remain with for the rest of their lives.

"With God's grace, I look forward to serving our Lord and being a witness to the Gospel as I serve my community," said Father Fernandez.

A daughter's question about hunger and homelessness

Q. I need an answer for my daughter. In the Bible it says that Jesus performed a miracle of multiplying fish and loaves of bread, and fed thousands of people.

Why, she asks, doesn't he perform the same miracle for all the millions of people starving and homeless today? It's a good question, but I couldn't come up with a good answer. Please help. (Kentucky)

A. Your question has been asked thousands of times over the centuries by Christians and others. Ultimately, I believe, there is no clean-cut final answer, because we're dealing with a huge mystery of creation, the mystery of evil.

An essential part of the explanation we can give is the basic truth that Jesus became flesh on earth not to take away all suffering, but to be part of it, to help us find a way through it by our compassion and love for each other.

Why did a good, wise and gracious God not remove all the pain? Or why did God not eliminate disease for everyone, but just for a few?

Theoretically he could have, so obviously God sees something in the whole picture that we miss, something perhaps that we are simply incapable of seeing because of our extremely limited perspective.

For some reason he made us responsible for each other and accountable for the consequences when we refuse that responsibility, when we abuse, reject and isolate ourselves from our brothers and sisters on this planet.

The solution Jesus gave us was simple, but not easy: The first and basic command is to love God with your whole heart, mind and soul, and love your neighbor as yourself.

He expanded on this often, most specifically in his description of the final days when we will be judged on how we fulfilled our duty to feed, clothe and support each other.

God has, then, given us the keys to the elimination of suffering and moral evil. All his saving grace and love, all his call to discipleship, is to give direction and to help us use those keys.

In other words, God has bound himself to depend on our hands. He does all he can to walk with us and help us. But he respects our humanity, our dignity, so much that he refuses to despair of our potential, to shove us out of the way and take over everything himself.

Therefore, our responsibility here is enormous.

Why did Jesus cry in the presence of death (Jn 11:35)? Why did he weep when he realized his own people were rejecting him (Lk 19:41)?

We must conclude that he shares deeply in our hurt and pain, but he would not repent of the trust, hope and love he invested in the human family at the beginning.

We need to ask questions; it is good and important that we do so. In the end, however, we need a good dose of humility before this mystery.

Does this mean God ceased to love us or to care? Absolutely not.

It explains, in fact, why Jesus was so obedient to the Father, who wanted the Son to live a perfect human life, with all its weaknesses and heartache, obedient even to death on the cross. He honors his Father by bringing us to honor our Father with that same obedience.

Does this require some faith? Yes.

But it makes more spiritual and common sense, and reflects more wisdom, than to try to reduce God to our size just so we can understand and be emotionally uncomfortable with everything harsh this earthly life holds for us.

Church tradition helps keep connection with Christ's life, apostles

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Remaining faithful to church tradition keeps Christians connected to Christ and the apostles' firsthand experience of the savior's life, teachings, death and resurrection, Pope Benedict XVI said at his weekly general audience.

By adhering to church tradition, Christ remains present in the ecclesial communion, linking women and men across the world and throughout history by the same faith, he said in his catechesis delivered April 26 in St. Peter's Square.

"Tradition is the communion of faithful gathered round the legitimate shepherds throughout history, a communion which the Holy Spirit nourishes, guaranteeing a connection between the experience of apostolic faith lived by the original community of disciples and the present experience of Christ in his church," he said.

Tradition, however, is not handing down inert things or words; "tradition is a living river" that links the faithful directly to its origins and to Christ, he said.

Being immersed in this "great river" will carry the faithful to the doors of eternity in heaven, he said. Since it is "a living river," being part of the church's

2,000-year tradition reminds people that God will always be with his people, until the end of time, said the pope.

In his catechesis on ecclesial communion, the pope spoke on how the church is sustained by the Holy Spirit and "safeguarded and promoted by the apostolic ministry."

Thanks to the presence of the Holy Spirit, the experience of the risen Lord "will always be lived by successive generations" through their common faith, lived through worship and the church community, he said. In this way, the Holy Spirit, Christ's disciples and the Christian communities remain forever linked, he said.

The Holy Spirit helps guide the church and its pastors to be in uninterrupted continuity with its origins so that Jesus always remains present in the church's life and its future, the pope said.

An encounter with the suffering Christ

Terminally ill child still a bittersweet gift

"It started as a routine ultrasound," began Danny Eisenbacher. He and his wife Jeannine were expecting their fifth child.

The doctor discovered that the baby had anencephaly, a condition in which the child's brain fails to develop properly and the baby's head is noticeably misshapen. Babies with the condition usually do not survive more than a few days after birth, if they survive birth at all.

There was never a question in Danny and Jeannine's minds as to whether they would accept and love the child God gave them. They would never consider aborting their daughter and they made their medical providers aware of this fact.

Still, they were pressed to consider all their "options."

"How many times have we been asked already if we would like to terminate? It is not at all an option for us," said Danny. "This is our child that we are going to love and nurture for as long as we can. And actually, it isn't even our child ultimately. It is God's child. Like all of our children."

After learning their baby was a girl, they named her Angela and commended their prayers to, among others, St. Angela. They prayed daily for Angela's miraculous healing but they also prepared for the worst — a funeral was planned well before the baby's birth.

They wondered: Will her siblings have a chance to meet and hold her? How will they deal with the death of their baby sister?

As Jeannine began to look more obviously pregnant, it was an ever-present reminder that the baby was on the way.

But this was for them a time of sorrow, knowing that the baby likely would not live for more than a few days after birth. Their long Lent began.

Angela was born April 3. Danny and Jeannine embraced every moment that came with her labor and delivery. They did not receive the miraculous cure for which they had prayed, but they were granted what they called "the miracle of having some time with her."

Angela was baptized, confirmed and anointed. Three days after her birth, she died surrounded by her parents, grandparents and friends. Her birth gave the Eisenbachers a chance to meet, face-to-face, a precious if bittersweet gift. In the face of every human being lies an encounter with God.

Carrying, giving birth to and caring for a child with a disability is an encounter with our suffering-God, with Jesus crucified. As Christians, we know that the crucifixion is not the final word.

And one day, Angel's family will rejoice with her in the company of our risen Lord.

An immigrant's confession

We must remember where we came from and why

I have a confession to make. My people came to America, uninvited and without papers.

My great-great-grandfather was James Barrett of County Kerry. Driven out of Ireland by the great potato famine, he landed in Boston around 1850. Eventually he made his way to New York and, although not a true American, was welcomed to fight in the Civil War with a Union artillery unit.

He was discharged in Baltimore in 1865 and returned to New York, where he worked as a stonemason in New Rochelle, where I was born 87 years later.

When Irish people like Jimmy Barrett arrived, they were vilified, made fun of and feared. So it also was with the Chinese, the eastern Europeans and, once freed from the chattel of slavery, the Africans.

But all of them were also asked to do the hard, dirty work that no one else wanted to do. The Chinese built the railroads; the Europeans worked in the offal pits of the meat packing industry; the slaves, well ... they were slaves.

Many of the children of immigrants have since moved up in society. We speak the language; our children are team captains and homecoming queens.

This is our country now. We like it here and we aren't going back.

Some of us have forgotten why our ancestors came here. America was and is the "Disneyland" of countries. Everyone wants to come here because, in biblical terms, we are "a land flowing with milk and honey."

We have the biggest Wal-Marts, the safest amusement parks, the best-tasting junk food. And we have so much money that we spend more on dog food than the gross domestic product (GDP) of less fortunate countries. The new immigrants must think there are a few scraps from this table of plenty.

But there are those among us who want to build high walls at the borders and make criminals of the people who come here to work as our landscapers and hotel maids. Jimmy Barrett was forced to leave his home because he was hungry and poor and if he hadn't, he probably would have died.

For the new immigrants, the trip to America is shorter and the names sound different, but many of their motivations and desires are the same.

For those who have forgotten their immigrant roots and don't want to share this country's spoils, there are some familiar Scripture passages that remind us about love and peace and justice.

And don't forget the Lord's words: "Whatever you did not do for one of the least of these, you did not do for me" (Mt 25:40).

God bless those Hispanic leaders who have organized the peaceful marches and rallies all over the country that put the plight of immigrants on the front burners of discussion in the media.

It is gratifying to know that an anti-immigrant rally held at a Charlotte high school in January drew about 20 people. The pro-immigration gathering in Charlotte's Marshall Park in March drew 7,000; a Winston-Salem rally drew 3,000.

Franciscan Sister Andrea Inkrott, director of Hispanic ministry in the Diocese of Charlotte, read a letter at the Marshall Park rally from Bishop Peter J. Jugis. The mere mention of the bishop's name and the Catholic Church, which has a long history supporting the rights of immigrants, drew a thunder of applause from those gathered.

In the 2004 film "The Day After Tomorrow," there is an intriguing scene in which Mexican border guards are holding off a hoard of Americans fleeing to the south to escape the new ice age gripping the northern hemisphere. After phone calls from the White House, the Mexican guards relent and the American immigrants are allowed in.

The film was a fantasy, but in reality the reverse situation exists and our border guards offer no such welcome.

We older immigrants need to remember our roots and our Scripture as these newer immigrants come to the bountiful table that is America.

What will your endowment do?

Guest Column

JUDY SMITH
GUEST COLUMNIST

Endowment funds are growing in popularity as more and more donors discover the remarkable benefits they provide. Perhaps you have even thought of creating one of these funds yourself.

Through your endowment, you can accomplish many objectives. Here are just three to consider:

1) Your endowment will endure.

Diocesan Foundation endowments exist in perpetuity. Because our policies prohibit us from spending the principal, only the income from interest can be used to meet the purposes of the endowment.

For example, let's say you create an endowment to provide assistance to your parish or school through an educational scholarship. Once established, the endowment will generate these financial grants each year.

One hundred years from now, parishioners and students will benefit from your prudent planning and generosity. This enduring quality makes endowments the perfect tool to create a lasting legacy.

2) Your endowment will enable.

Regular cash gifts to your parish, school or a Catholic agency certainly help them meet their financial obligations. But what happens when the donor dies? Or what if these cash gifts are not so readily available in lean years?

Because of their enduring quality, endowments enable us to plan ahead with confidence. We can project endowment income and develop programs accordingly.

Donors sometimes create endowment funds to enable us to accomplish things we would not ordinarily be able to do through normal operating income. An endowment may provide ongoing resources for such things as student enrichment, refugee support or social justice outreach.

3) Your endowment will inspire.

When you establish an endowment, you inspire your Catholic community. You deepen our financial foundation and lift us higher in the minds of fellow Catholics.

Through your endowment, you say, "The Catholic Church is worthy of my resources. I expect the church to be fulfilling its mission far into the future."

Your prudent and forward-looking decision encourages us and challenges us to honor your "investment."

This inspiration spreads to your family as well. Your children and grandchildren have added reason to appreciate their Catholic heritage. The ongoing impact of your endowment reminds them of who they are. It lifts their sights and inspires a benevolent spirit.

Honoring Mary

God gave her most privileged position

The month of May is dedicated to Mary, the mother of Jesus.

St. Elizabeth, the mother of John the Baptist, once said, "Of all women, Mary, you are the most blessed; blessed is the fruit of your womb" (Lk 1:42-45, The Jerusalem Bible).

We honor Mary every May because God gave her the most privileged position in human history when she became the mother of our Lord and savior, Jesus Christ.

The divine command to honor one's mother is found in Exodus 20:12. We know that Jesus honors his mother, just as any good son would honor his mother.

Since the Lord's love flows through us, we love and honor Mary as well.

The Hebrew Bible helps us to imagine how Jesus might relate to Mary in heaven. We read that King Solomon had his mother sitting to the right of his throne.

She often interceded with him on behalf of his subjects saying, "I have a favor to ask of you. ... Do not refuse me." Solomon would answer, "My mother, make your request for I will not refuse you" (1 Kgs 2:21).

When Catholics recite the Hail Mary, "Pray for us, now and at the hour of our death," they do not think of Mary as a kind of goddess with independent power. They know that her power is from the Lord.

They simply ask her to intercede for them, knowing well that Jesus will honor her request.

St. Elizabeth is recorded in Scripture as saying, "Blessed are you who believed that what was spoken to you by the Lord would be fulfilled."

Mary believed and then surrendered herself to the Lord in perfect submission: "Be it done unto me according to thy word" (Lk 1:38), and the miracle of the incarnation took place in her womb. Jesus became flesh of her flesh and bone of her bone.

Each of us has some special memory about Mary.

My story is about my maternal grandmother, Anna Caslin. She had a rich devotion to Our Lady because she was born Sept. 8, the same day the church celebrates Mary's birthday.

I'm told my grandmother always prayed that at least one of her nine children would be born on that day too. She also prayed that one of her four sons would become a priest, but they all married.

She later realized that God answers our prayers, but in his own way, taking his own sweet time.

Grandma Anna's prayers were answered a generation later when I was born Sept. 8, 1931. She must have been exceedingly happy, but I'm sure her joy did not stop her from continuing to pray to have a priest in the family.

I still have an old photograph of Grandma Anna holding me in her arms as a newborn infant. She died when I was 6 months old, so I never got to know her.

I didn't even learn of her secret prayer campaign until I was about 50, when my aunt told me the story.

For all those years, I thought my early struggle to discern my vocation was exclusively my own business; something private between God and me. Today I see it in a slightly different light.

My grandmother never stopped asking Mary to help me to accept my calling. All that grace finally wore me down.

And so, without taking my freedom away, God led me to my ordination May 28, 1960, and I have lived happily ever after, as the story goes, with only a few bumps along the way.

Robbinsville mission a symbol of peace of Christ in mountain community

ROBBINSVILLE — Following the mid-1950s arrival of the Glenmary Home Missioners in western North Carolina, an ecumenical and missionary spirit began to flow from one small mountain town to another.

One such place is Robbinsville, where shortly after the Glenmarys started their ministry, a small Catholic community began to grow.

The priests, based at St. William Church in Murphy, traveled throughout the westernmost areas of North Carolina and, by 1957, established mission status in Robbinsville.

The Catholic community there was comprised of just one family in those early years, with several more living near Fontana Dam to the north. In 1958, Glenmary Father James Wilmes, then-associate pastor at St. William Church in Murphy, began leading Bible classes in Robbinsville and made plans to open a chapel there.

With money sent from the assistant pastor's family, who set up a mission club, the few Catholics in the area began gathering in a small storefront chapel for classes and liturgies.

Catholicism was still largely misunderstood by the majority of the locals in those days, and the Glenmarys did their best to become part of the community and disseminate the truths of the Catholic faith. Part of the Robbinsville chapel was outfitted as a clothing center for the poor, and Catholic Bibles were given to anyone asking for one.

Revival tent meetings and novena services were held in Robbinsville, furthering the Glenmarys' missionary zeal.

By 1966, the building that housed the chapel had become so dilapidated that it had to be destroyed. Masses continued until 1972, when in March of that year a local Baptist church allowed the Catholic mission to celebrate liturgies on Saturday evenings in their church.

Masses were celebrated at the Baptist church for a brief time, and in 1973, a Methodist church began serving as the mission's home. Those Saturday vigil Masses continued for 15 years, until the mission could build a new chapel.

Prince of Peace Mission was established by Glenmary Home Missioners, who brought an ecumenical and missionary spirit to many small mountain communities.

Meanwhile, the Glenmarys continued their ministry at other mission stations in the area. In Robbinsville, acceptance and understanding of the Catholic faith by the local population has been gradual.

In 1987, members of the Legion of Mary, an apostolic organization comprised of lay people, visited Holy Redeemer Church in Andrews — the mother church of the Robbinsville mission — to educate and evangelize members of the community.

There still is much misunderstanding, according to Father Michael Kottar, the present pastor of Holy Redeemer Church in Andrews and Prince of Peace Church.

Legion members visited some 700 area homes, distributing brief summaries of Catholic beliefs for interested citizens and inactive Catholics.

The project received such a positive response that the Legion of Mary returned to Robbinsville the following year, visiting hundreds more homes.

With the Catholic community in Robbinsville still without a church, Father Wilmes returned in 1986 and set out to find property on which to build.

He found a suitable building on a piece of property along Highway 129. In October 1988, Robbinsville had its new Catholic church.

Another building on the property was later adapted for use as a parish hall.

For the last 17 years, Father Wilmes lived in the Robbinsville area. In his last five years, he chose to occupy a small room in the back of the Robbinsville church, living simply with just a microwave for cooking. He slept on a couch, and he showered next door in the parish hall.

The Diocese of Charlotte assumed administration of the mission when Father Kottar arrived in July 2002.

In 2003, a deep mountain snowfall covered the area and Father Wilmes suffered a heart attack removing snow from the church grounds. He died symbolically doing the work of a missionary: helping others find God by shoveling a path to the Catholic church.

The mission church was named Prince of Peace and has served the needs of Robbinsville Catholics ever since. In addition to the Andrews parish, Father Kottar ministers to the 35 year-round families worshipping at Prince of Peace Church, who are joined by dozens more Catholics during the summer months.

Parishioners actively support in church and community services and groups, including ecumenical food projects, visiting the local nursing home, civic clubs and chamber of commerce.

Finding solitude with God

*Hermit explores

HAYESVILLE — "I think I always wanted to be hermit," Brother John Schroeder said. "I've always been a solitary, which is funny because I enjoy company, but I enjoy company on my terms."

In March, Brother Schroeder, 70, was invested with the habit of the Community of Hermits of St. Bruno (CHSB) during Sunday Mass at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church.

Father George Kloster, pastor, performed the "rite of the Habit," blessing Brother Schroeder's white tunic and scapular.

WRAPPED IN FAITH

Mercy Sister Ann Prisco of Erie, Pa., a knitter for more than 30 years, coordinates a ministry in which people gather to knit or crochet prayer shawls, which are given to those with physical, emotional or physical illnesses or to those who are grieving.

Prayer shawl ministry wraps creators, recipients in warmth

ERIE, Pa. (CNS) — A knitter since 1972, Sister Ann Prisco pours love into every prayer shawl she creates.

A Sister of Mercy for 56 years, she is the coordinator of a group at the Erie motherhouse that gathers the first Monday night of the month to knit or crochet prayer shawls.

The shawls are then given to people with physical, emotional or psychological illnesses, or to those who are grieving.

"We feel that the Sisters of Mercy have that compassion and concern for the grieving. It not only blesses them, but us, I'm sure," Sister Prisco said.

About 15 people participate in the group, begun in 2001 and inspired by an article about women doing this work in Connecticut. Sister Prisco got the local group started.

There have been more than 60 shawls given away so far.

"One has gone as far out as Ireland," Sister Prisco explained.

A meeting night has an opening prayer, a review of prayer shawl progress and need for materials, and a report on people visited. Attendees then list recipients and who will deliver the shawls. The names of those who have received shawls are read.

"There's soft reflective music playing. It's quiet time because we're praying as we knit or crochet," Sister Ann Prisco.

A healing prayer card that is blessed goes to the shawl recipient, she said.

As a meeting closes, a leader is chosen to run the next one. Each meeting ends with a prayer and a blessing for both the knitters and the shawls. She said each knitter or crocheter may select her own yarn and pattern.

They are reimbursed for the yarn, but many donate their yarn as well as their time. As for color choices, they usually use a darker shade for a man and lighter shades for a woman or child. Each shawl is then folded in tissue paper and put in a gift bag.

When a shawl is delivered, the scene is moving.

"There are tears of joy and gladness," Sister Prisco said.

And the emotion spreads to the giver, also.

"It chokes us up to deliver it. Such openness. It brings tears, a lump in your throat," Sister Prisco said. "They think you've given them a cure. It's a comfort."

The group has received many thank you notes from recipients. They are placed in a special book and saved.

Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff says he depends on God daily

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said there are times every day when he thinks about his dependence on God.

"My belief that there is a God and that he has a plan for me is a major, calming influence in my life," Pace, a Catholic, told members of the John Carroll Society, a lay Catholic organization based in Washington.

Pace received the group's John Carroll Medal at an annual dinner in Washington April 21.

"I stand before you as someone who is appreciative ... who truly does believe this award is in anticipation of future conduct," Pace said.

The medals are presented annually to Catholics in recognition of their public service and commitment to their faith.

Other 2006 recipients included Archbishop Edwin F. O'Brien, head of the U.S. Archdiocese for the Military Services.

"The remarkable thing about Gen. Pace is that he demonstrates his Catholic faith and how his faith influences his life, both personally and professionally," said Msgr. Peter Vaghi, chaplain of the John Carroll Society.

Pace, the first Marine to serve as the nation's highest ranking military officer, said that when he talks about his faith "it touches at the Italian blood that runs in my heart."

He said his near-death experiences in Vietnam proved that God had a plan for him, and he promised God he would stay in the Marine Corps until God gave him a sign to leave and he promised to serve "until I was no longer promoted."

He frequently remembers that his mother used to tell him as a young boy that "God would never give me more than I can handle."

Remembering those words helps him in his current work, he said, knowing that with God's help "I can do whatever I'm supposed to do."

Pope warns against denying, downplaying Christ's resurrection

Resurrection is 'central fact of Christianity,' says pope

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI warned against trying to negate or minimize Christ's resurrection, saying it was the central event of Christianity.

The pope made the comments at his weekly blessing April 30, speaking to several thousand people from his apartment window above St. Peter's Square.

The pope said the Gospel recounts how Christ appeared repeatedly to his disciples after his death, inviting them to "overcome their amazement" and believe in his resurrection.

"The resurrection of Christ is the central fact of Christianity, the fundamental truth that should be reaffirmed with vigor in every age, because to deny it — as has been attempted in various ways and is still being attempted — or to transform it into a purely spiritual event, is to negate our very faith," he said.

He quoted St. Paul, who wrote that "if Christ has not been raised, then empty is our preaching; (and) empty, too, your faith."

The pope also noted the comforting role of Mary in scriptural accounts following Christ's death. The mother of Jesus was "a mother and teacher" for the apostles during this period, and she continues to perform that role for Christians of every era, he said.

"To Mary we entrust the needs of the church and of the entire world, especially in this moment marked by many shadows," he said.

He noted that the church traditionally dedicates the month of May to Mary. The following day, May 1, the pope visited Rome's largest Marian sanctuary and prayed that Mary would help free the world from immorality, war and terrorism.

Pope says church must be more selective in picking saint candidates

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Catholic Church should be more selective and very rigorous in choosing candidates for sainthood, Pope Benedict XVI said in a message to the Congregation for Saints' Causes.

The pope, who as a cardinal expressed concern over the number of causes being promoted, wrote to the congregation as its members met April 24-26 for a plenary assembly.

They discussed a new instruction for the initial diocesan stages of the sainthood process and were looking at possible changes to the formal criteria for determining martyrdom and for miracles.

Pope Benedict told the congregation that he had put into effect changes that met the "widespread hope" that the difference between beatification and canonization would be underlined and that local churches would be more involved in the entire process.

Modern men and women need true models of holiness, he said, and they must be chosen with care.

First, the pope said, further instructions are needed to help local bishops "safeguard the seriousness of the investigations that take place in the diocesan inquiry" into a candidate's martyrdom or the person's Christian virtues and miracles attributed to his or her intercession.

Second, he said, there must be a real "fame of holiness" and not just a conviction among a small group of people that the person in question was a good Christian.

Although he did not refer specifically to any individual, the pope said that a spontaneous and widespread recognition of sainthood, as occurred in the case of Blessed Mother Teresa of Calcutta, "is a sign from God that indicates to the church those who deserve to be placed upon the candelabra to give 'light to all those in the home.'"

On the question of miracles, Pope Benedict appeared to rule out a change that some theologians had hoped would leave space for consideration of "moral miracles," such as dramatic conversions that occur when a notorious sinner turns his or her life around after coming into contact with the writings of a candidate for sainthood.

The congregation's plenary also included a discussion of the definition of martyrdom.

Pope Benedict said a person could not be declared a martyr without "irrefutable proof" of the victim's willingness to die for the faith and without "moral certainty" that the persecutor's action stemmed "directly or indirectly" from a hatred of the faith.

Youths enjoy a concert during the annual Diocesan Youth Conference in Ridgecrest April 28-30.

Hundreds gather, celebrate at annual youth conference

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

RIDGECREST, N.C. — Hundreds of youths from around the Diocese of Charlotte recently stepped up to the plate for God.

More than 300 youths attended the 29th annual Diocesan Youth Conference, themed "Know, Love, Serve ... Step up to the Plate," held at Lifeway Ridgecrest Conference Center near Black Mountain April 28-30.

The conference was sponsored by the diocesan Office of Youth Ministry in collaboration with the Diocesan Youth Advisory Council. The council is comprised of high school students from each of the diocese's 10 vicariates who serve as youth coordinators between their parishes and the diocese.

"The council planned and implemented the entire weekend, leading two prayer services as well as giving the opening presentation and the announcements all weekend long," said Peg Ruble, assistant director of youth ministry.

"The conference went beautifully. We had great weather, great presenters, great kids and an awesome Holy Spirit-led event," she said.

Keynote speakers were award-winning Christian musician Sarah Hart, founder of the all-women singing group Daughters of God; and Riro Maniscalco, member of Communion and Liberation, an ecclesial movement, who spoke of how his love for Christ is nourished by his faith community.

Augustinian Father James Cassidy, pastor of Our Lady of Lourdes Church in Monroe, also spoke and celebrated Mass.

The youths also attended workshops, enjoyed recreational activities and games, and were entertained at a concert by Hart.

"The food was great, the people were awesome, but the amazing presence of God rocked the loudest," said Kierestan Snyder, 17, a parishioner of Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro.

"It's an amazing experience for everyone to be here and sharing their faith," said Isabel Echeverri, 15, a parishioner of Holy Family Church in Clemmons.

In addition to the mementos and friendships, the youths took away from the conference "the experience of being Catholic ... being learners and teachers, being Jesus and serving others," said Ruble.

COLLEGE STUDENTS SPEND SPRING BREAK IN HURRICANE-RAVAGED MISSISSIPPI

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

OCEAN SPRINGS, Miss. — For their spring break, hundreds of college students from throughout the United States descended on the Gulf Coast region of Louisiana and Mississippi to help with the rebuilding efforts from hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Joining in the efforts were three students from Wake Forest University; Julie Ostergaard, Wake Forest University Catholic campus minister; four Western Carolina University students; Gloria Schweizer, Western Carolina University Catholic campus minister; and one student's father.

"It is always an inspiration to me when college students give up their spring break to volunteer," said Schweizer.

The group stayed at C.O.R.E. Base Camp, a volunteer camp that provides sleeping arrangements, showers and meals.

"We were reminded that we could not accomplish everything, but that anything we could do would be appreciated," said Anna Fedders, a student at Wake Forest University. "We were told that listening to people's stories was just as important as cleaning their homes."

Fedders shared her chance meeting with an elderly victim of the hurricane.

"She spoke of many of God's miracles that came with the storm — of people who had escaped just before their homes had been destroyed, and those who had been rescued against all odds," Fedders said.

"I realized that ... by listening to her story, I had helped her to fulfill her promise to God to spread word of his miracles," she said.

While clearing debris from a parish housekeeper's front yard of debris, Fedders found a photograph of a beaming young boy holding a crucifix.

"I knocked on her door to give her the photo — it was her son's first Communion picture, with bubbled surface and missing parts," she said. "It had weathered the storm and sat in her yard for six months."

"These people were incredibly determined to restore their lives, and even the smallest accomplishments brought them unbelievable joy," said Fedders.

Hermit explores eremitic life in N.C.

"It was a beautiful service," said Brother Schroeder. "I was so touched I was almost crying."

"(Father Kloster) is a very sweet man. I didn't want to do it (the rite) during Mass, but he said, 'No, it's important that the community know what's happening.'"

After the Mass, parishioners had a reception for Brother Schroeder.

"I'm blessed to be in a parish that has really taken to this," he said. "Their support has been outstanding."

Anyone can live alone, Brother Schroeder said, but there's a difference between a recluse and a solitary: A recluse is antisocial, a solitary lives alone for a greater good. A hermit is a solitary whose focus is God.

"He came to me several months ago and said he felt he had this call to the eremitic (hermit) life and had associated himself with a monastery in England," Father Kloster said.

"Our theology is that these calls come from God. There's a lot of discernment. We have to listen to the Holy Spirit as the Spirit works in these situations," Father Kloster said.

The Catechism of the Catholic Church (para. 921) states that hermits "manifest to everyone the interior aspect of the mystery of the Church, that is, personal intimacy with Christ. Hidden from the eyes of men, the life of the hermit is a silent preaching of the Lord, to whom he has surrendered his life simply because he is everything to him."

"Here is a particular call to find in the desert, in the thick of spiritual battle, the glory of the Crucified One."

A plan of life

According to its Web site, the Community of Hermits of St. Bruno is "an international Roman Catholic community of sisters and brothers who live their lives in the spirit of their Father, St. Bruno — the founder of the Carthusian Order."

The prior of St. Hugh's Charterhouse, the Carthusian monastery near Parkminster, England, supports the community's efforts to achieve canonical establishment.

"Even though you're a hermit, you should be under the auspices of the church," Brother Schroeder said. "You have to have a plan of life. You have to have a horarium (prayer schedule) and someone has to see that you're doing it."

His prayer schedule is an average of eight to 10 hours of prayer daily, lectio divina and spiritual reading.

"I feel that if you're going to devote your life to God, you should devote your life to God," Brother Schroeder said.

If he has to miss an hour because of one of his twice-weekly trips to town for Mass or errands, he doubles up on prayer when he gets home.

"I guess it's just a little more backbone," he said of the discipline. "When you make up your mind to do something, you have to do it. Are there times when I've missed (prayer periods)? Yes. Often? No."

Finding solitude with God

Raised Catholic in upstate New York, Brother Schroeder was educated by Jesuits and Christian Brothers. An aunt was a Dominican nun; one of his uncles was a monsignor.

"When I was in the eighth grade, I wanted to be a White Father and go to Africa, but my uncle, the monsignor, wanted me to be a diocesan priest," Brother Schroeder said.

Instead, he earned degrees in engineering technology, secondary education and business. A four-year U.S. Army Special Forces enlistment ended just before the Vietnam War.

He and his former wife raised four children (he has eight grandchildren).

Management positions included 16 years with Bendix Commercial Vehicle Systems Inc., where he directed manufacturing operations.

"I always thought if I got one more promotion I'd be happy, but I wasn't," he said. "One day I woke up and looked in the mirror and didn't like what I saw. I went into the office and resigned."

Then came years on a sailboat, odd jobs and five years with John Michael Talbot's Brothers and Sisters of Charity. While a parishioner at the Cathedral-

Basilica of St. Augustine, Fla., he taught Scripture in the St. Johns County Jail and took medical supplies to Haiti and Cuba.

Brother Schroeder found his way to Hayesville, eventually subscribing to Raven's Bread, a quarterly newsletter for hermits and those interested in eremitic life. He began corresponding with the publisher, who lives in Hot Springs, N.C.

She had been a Poor Clare for 30 years, then spent six years as a hermit in West Virginia.

"I went into this hermit thing several times — getting my feet wet, backing out," Brother Schroeder said. "She helped me over some of the rough spots ... like not being able to get both feet out of the world."

"I didn't think God was listening. She said, 'God always listens. You're the one who doesn't listen,'" he said.

When did he know he had a vocation as a hermit?

"There isn't any single point that you can point to," he said. "There is a drawing down, a deepening need to give up yourself. Each time I would start to draw down, I would get frightened, but it just kept coming back."

The Community of Hermits of St. Bruno was recommended to him, and that he put himself in a place where it would be difficult to be in the world.

Thus, his 37-foot motor home sits on 11 acres up a winding, unpaved mountain road 2,000 feet above Tusquitee Valley. The property owner lives elsewhere and allows Brother Schroeder to stay in return for clearing brush.

Two canine companions: Cici and Bam. No neighbors. A generator recharges the 12-volt batteries that supply his electricity.

In December he suffered a heart attack and drove himself 110 miles to the Veterans Administration hospital in Asheville.

The way to solitude

Brother Schroeder started with nine eremitic months to see if he could live

"I feel that if you're going to devote your life to God, you should devote your life to God."

— Brother Schroeder

such a life.

He contacted the Community of Hermits of St. Bruno and received an application from Sister Rosaline Whipple, the community administrator and formation director in Parkminster, England.

After returning the application, along with an essay about why he thought himself suited for hermit life, he was accepted for a six-month postulancy in March 2005.

Postulant training included three programs, one to be completed every two months: (1) hermitage, prayer life and the horarium; (2) the Desert Fathers (the earliest Christian hermits); (3) the Divine Office, spiritual reading and the habit.

Brother Schroeder has a cell phone, but no phone line or Internet, so his correspondence is postal.

Postulancy ended in October 2005. His habit should have been blessed then, except that he didn't have one.

Hermits who live on their own are self-supporting. The white habit costs $300 and is the same as that worn by the Carthusians. It took three monthly installments out of his social security check to pay for it.

Having already shown Father Kloster his correspondence with Sister Whipple and evidence that he is a community member, his habit was blessed in March.

Brother John expects to finish his novitiate (the next step after postulancy) this October. He'll have completed six more programs: union with God; two on monastic vows; silence; lectio divina; and prayer.

Between prayer and study periods he clears brush from the land and keeps his 18-year-old pickup truck running. White is impractical for work, so he wears jeans until his blue chambray work habit arrives.

Several times a year, he visits his spiritual director, Trappist Father Gerard Gross, at Our Lady of the Holy Spirit Monastery in Conyers, Ga.

At the end of the novitiate, Brother Schroeder will make his temporary vows of poverty, stability (to the place where he lives) and conversion of manners, which includes chastity and obedience. Three years after that, he will make his permanent vows.

"I feel so much more comfortable with God," he said. "I think one of the tragedies of our life is that we think we can hide things from God. We are almost never as honest with God as he is with us."

"You really have to give up pride to acknowledge all the things you need to. When you get rid of the debris, you can be filled with the Holy Spirit," he said.

CARY — Stewardship is a way of life at St. Pius X Church in Greensboro.

The parish's decades of successful stewardship efforts were highlighted during the fifth Regional Stewardship Day Conference, held in Cary April 29.

More than 300 people from 82 parishes across five dioceses attended the conference, sponsored by the dioceses of Charlotte, Raleigh, Charleston and Savannah and the Archdiocese of Atlanta.

The keynote speaker was Dan Conway, president of RSI Catholic Services Group. Conway has more than 20 years of experience helping Catholic organizations in stewardship education and development.

The conference also featured six breakout sessions on topics designed to enhance stewardship efforts. Pat Spivey and Tracy Welliver, pastoral associates at St. Pius X Church, and Patti Dunning, stewardship committee chairperson, presented a "Parish Profile of Success."

They detailed the decades of stewardship efforts at the parish, which currently has active adult and youth stewardship teams.

"We talked about what we've done over the past few years, where we are today and where we're going," said Dunning.

The stewardship committee has worked to incorporate the sense of stewardship into all aspects of the parish's ministries and outreach programs, said Dunning.

"We also get new parishioners involved with ministries for which they have the time and talent, to help them get to know people and be involved," she said.

"We teach that stewardship is more than money — it's time and talent," said

Dunning. "That's our big success — we've been focusing on it and it's been paying off in the ways it's supposed to."

Stewardship is based on an individual's need to give back out of gratitude, not on the church's need to receive, according to Jim Kelley, the Diocese of Charlotte's director of development, which includes diocesan and parish stewardship.

"Stewardship is based on the premise that all that we have and all that we are comes from God and, as a way to thank him for all his blessings, we are called to return a portion of the time, talent and treasure allotted to us," said Kelley.

Stewardship has been a high priority for the Diocese of Charlotte since 1988, said Kelley.

The development office has worked with more than two-thirds of the 92 parishes in the Diocese of Charlotte to help them organize or improve their stewardship efforts.

"The U.S. bishops' 1992 pastoral letter, 'Stewardship: A Disciple's Response,' reinforced our commitment to work toward educating and assisting parishes and individuals in adopting this way of life," he said.

"Stewardship really is to live as Jesus and be Jesus to other people," said Dunning. "If you teach parishioners that, it helps them to live more peaceful, faith-centered lives."

A presence in prisons

Deacon recognized for work with inmates

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Deacon Andy Cilone, a permanent deacon in the Diocese of Charlotte, has received the Volunteer of the Year award from Marion Correctional Center. The award was presented to Deacon Cilone at the volunteer banquet at the Marion facility in April.

This is not the first time Deacon Cilone, permanent deacon at Immaculate Conception Church in Forest City, has been recognized for his ministerial work in North Carolina prisons. He received the Volunteer of the Year award at Rutherford Correctional Center in 1995.

Deacon Cilone has been involved in prison ministry since 1990, when he began his ministry at Shelby Correctional Center. He then started a ministry at Rutherford Correctional Center in Spindale.

Following his retirement as plant manager of a plastics company four years ago, he began to extend his ministry to the maximum- and minimum-security prisons in Marion.

Deacon Cilone was first introduced to prison ministry by the late Deacon John Gallen of Marion. He spends between five and 10 hours each week visiting correctional facilities, leading Bible studies, conducting Communion services and showing movies based on the Bible.

"The Catholic presence in the prisons is being sought out by administrators and chaplains, because there are inmates who need our presence and inmates who would like to know more about the faith," Deacon Cilone said.

The positive changes he has seen take place in some of the prisoners he has worked with have been rewarding, he said.

"Many of them go out into the community and give witness of their conversions to church and civil groups," he said. "It is inspiring to hear about their journeys, where they have been and where they are now, and their new hopes for the future."

Two years ago, the permanent deacons of the Diocese of Charlotte took over responsibility for prison ministry. The new diaconate candidates, who will be ordained in June, have been educated in prison ministry.

"The work that is done by volunteers in the prison system is greatly appreciated by the State of North Carolina," said Deacon Cilone. "They realize the work that is done with inmates is priceless and the prison system would be struggling without the use of all the volunteers who are active in helping inmates spiritually to rebuild their lives and to 'right themselves with God.'"

STEWARDSHIP

Ensuring a bright future

Priests include foundation in estate plans

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Most people probably think of stewardship in terms of time, talent and treasure: How much time can I spend at the soup kitchen this week? Does the newsletter committee need a graphic designer? Can I really afford to tithe 10 percent of my income?

Msgr. William Pharr, a retired priest of the Diocese of Charlotte, thinks of stewardship from a "senior perspective," with a focus on past, present and future.

"Most of us reflect on our past opportunities with a mixture of regret and satisfaction," said Msgr. Pharr.

"We discern the present with current possibilities and limitations. Our hope for the future is that we can still make a difference as we assume a new role in the communion of saints," he said.

"Although intercessory prayer should be our primary expression of stewardship, we may still share the fruits of time and talent through treasure when we have 'moved on,'" Msgr. Pharr said.

Mgr. Pharr has ensured that the work of the Diocese of Charlotte will continue for many years after he has "moved on." He and a dozen other diocesan priests have designated the Foundation for the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte as a recipient of their assets in their estate plans.

"These priests have given us, as laypeople, an example to follow," said Jim Kelley, director of the diocesan office of development.

"They love the church and want to remember the church in their estates, and we can do the same," he said.

In the last few years, five deceased priests of the diocese — Fathers Vincent Erb, Ramon Berg and Aloysius D'Silva, and Msgs. Richard Allen and Arthur Duncan — have left part of their estates to the church.

The church is an important part of many families, Kelley said. The development office asks laypeople to consider the church as another child in their families, providing for it financially as they would for their children.

"Through ongoing stewardship, my prayer is that many others will experience these same blessings."

— Msgr. William Pharr

The income may be used in accordance with the wishes of the donor organization or individual. Once an endowment is established, anyone may contribute to the fund.

"I have been pleased to designate the foundation (as a benefactor) as my personal way of continuing to give after I am 'gone,'" said Msgr. Pharr. "This is a means of saying thanks to the Lord for his gifts of the Catholic faith and my vocation to the priesthood."

"Through ongoing stewardship, my prayer is that many others will experience these same blessings," said Msgr. Pharr.

Foundation facts and figures

The diocesan foundation was incorporated in 1994 to provide endowments for the Diocese of Charlotte and its parishes, agencies and organizations.

An endowment is a permanent fund in which the principal is never touched. The income may be used in accordance with the wishes of the donor organization or individual. Once an endowment is established, anyone may add to the fund.

Over the past 11 years, more than $2.5 million has been distributed by the foundation to parishes, schools and agencies.

Judas kisses Christ in the Garden of Gethsemane as Jesus is handed over to soldiers in this detail from a contemporary Bible illumination. The National Geographic Society April 6 released the first modern translation of an ancient gnostic text that describes conversations between Jesus and Judas Iscariot.

Catholic leaders decry gospel of Judas so that he could fulfill his mission.

But during his April 13 homily at the Holy Thursday Mass of the Lord's Supper, Pope Benedict said Judas is the clearest example Christians have of someone who refuses God's saving love.

For Judas, the pope said, "only power and success are real; love does not count."

"And he is greedy: Money is more important than communion with Jesus, more important than God and his love. He also becomes a liar, a double-crosser who breaks with the truth," Pope Benedict said.

Purposefully ignoring the truth, he said, Judas "hardens, becoming incapable of conversion ... and throws away his destroyed life."

Unworthy gospel

The National Geographic Society

A brief explanation of gnosticism

WASHINGTON (CNS) — An understanding of gnosticism is key to making sense of the newly unveiled gospel of Judas, a gnostic writing put on display April 6 at the National Geographic Society in Washington.

Early Christians used the term to describe various sects that arose in the second century which exalted arcane knowledge, mixing Christian belief with pagan speculation and theories.

"Gnosis" is the Greek word for knowledge.

Repudiated as heretics, gnostics claimed that salvation could be obtained only through the knowledge and acceptance of certain divinely revealed mysteries that they alone possessed.

Until the 20th century, most of what was known about gnosticism came from the anti-gnostic writings of Christian theologians of the second and third centuries.

That has changed since 1945, when an ancient library of about 50 gnostic works in Coptic, including the so-called Gospel of Thomas, was discovered in a cemetery near the modern Egyptian village of Nag Hammadi.

"did a disservice to Christian people and has exploited this old manuscript for its own purposes," said Santa Fe Archbishop Michael J. Sheehan.

"In the early church there were many writings such as the gospel of Judas which were rejected as unworthy to be included in the Bible," Archbishop Sheehan wrote in the May issue of his archdiocesan newspaper.

"We believe that the early church fathers had the guidance of the Holy Spirit in determining which writings were truly authentic and inspired by God and which writings were not," he said. "Obviously the gospel of Judas did not 'make the cut.'"

Jesuit Father O'Collins, who has convoked a series of ecumenical studies of the historical Jesus, said the gospel of Judas, like the gospels of Mary Magdalene and Philip, "does not merit the name 'gospel.'"

"A 'gospel' is a literary genre — established by Matthew, Mark, Luke and John — focusing on the life, death and resurrection of Jesus," said Father O'Collins, a longtime professor of Christology at Rome's Pontifical Gregorian University.

While including events supposedly related to the life of Jesus, the gospel of Judas and the others really are texts "attempting to bolster the importance" of the personalities they are named after, not of Jesus, the priest said.

"They are not summaries of the good news," he said.

The texts come from the gnostic tradition, a religious-philosophical current popular in the second, third and fourth centuries. The gnostics claimed to have secret knowledge unavailable to the vast majority of people and focused so strongly on the spiritual and intellectual that they despised material creation, including the human body.

In the year 180, St. Irenaeus condemned the gnostics, mentioning particularly a gospel of Judas.

Father O'Collins said the most important thing about the text released in early April is that "it shows just how right Irenaeus was in saying the gnostics were against mainstream Christianity and Judaism, they were against our God."

"To give Judas greater credit," the Jesuit said, the gnostics "portray Jesus giving him secret knowledge. It was a nice try," but there is no evidence to support the claim.

"It was junk then and it is junk now," he said.

"The Bible clearly contradicts the heretical teaching" of that text, said Archbishop Sheehan.

He noted that Mark's Gospel "clearly describes Judas Iscariot as an unworthy disciple who betrayed Christ."

Father O'Collins, who between 1996 and 2003 convoked a series of ecumenical, interdisciplinary summits for scholars on the historical Jesus, said it was "ridiculous" for anyone to claim publication of the gospel of Judas will challenge mainstream Christianity.

Fighting the fads

A day after the pope's April 13 homily, his preacher also weighed in against the recent wave of "pseudohistorical literature" gaining popularity as well as the soon-to-be-released film, "The Da Vinci Code."

In his April 14 homily during the Good Friday liturgy of the Lord's Passion, Capuchin Father Raniero Cantalamessa said that millions of people today were being "crassly manipulated by the media," which is more interested in touting the newest fad or insight rather than the truth and, as a consequence, turning a pretty penny for it.

"There is much talk about Judas' betrayal without realizing that it is being repeated" today, he said during his homily given before the pope and hundreds of people in St. Peter's Basilica.

"Christ is being sold again," he said, but this time "to publishers and booksellers" for billions of dollars.

People seem to be always itching for something new, and there are those who take advantage of that by carrying out or promoting "the clever rewriting of ancient legends," he said.

The fantasies and speculation will only "flare up with the imminent release of a certain film," the Capuchin friar said, in reference to the movie "The Da Vinci Code," based on the novel by Dan Brown.

The preacher of the papal household said he felt it was his duty to address the current swirl of controversy surrounding the many interpretations of the life and death of Jesus because "we cannot allow the silence of believers to be mistaken for embarrassment" nor allow the media to manipulate the truth about Christ's life, his death on the cross and his resurrection.

programs providing services for all stages of life, from adoption to marriage preparation to elder ministry.

Three programs enjoying success in the diocese are Host Homes, New Horizons for Children and Families, and grief counseling.

A helping hand for families

After raising five children of her own, Margie Cooper took custody of her great-granddaughter Quenisha 11 years ago. Two years ago, she took in another granddaughter, Alexi.

Like most seniors, Cooper lives on a fixed income, and sometimes has trouble navigating the complicated channels of the Department of Social Services and other agencies.

CSS in the Diocese of Charlotte, in partnership with Smart Start of Mecklenburg County, developed New Horizons, a program in support of grandparents and "kinship families" parenting children younger than five years old.

New Horizons is the only program in Mecklenburg County that provides comprehensive services including professional mental health intervention, parenting education and case management to benefit families in which children are being raised by other relatives.

In April, New Horizons began offering a series of cooking classes to teach caretakers how to prepare nutritious, economical meals. About 13 families have attended each of the weekly classes, which are followed by support group sessions.

Skills for a new life

At 12 years old, Bradley Smith had a fierce temper. So fierce, in fact, that he stabbed another child during a fight.

His future looked bleak until the judge ordered Bradley to receive counseling at Host Homes in Winston-Salem.

Host Homes, a program of CSS, is committed to providing a variety of services to young people and their families, including counseling, foster care, mentoring, a 24-hour hotline and Project Safe Place.

Some time after Bradley completed his counseling, he was accosted in his neighborhood by two older boys who wanted his shoes. Instead of attacking the boys, he maintained his self-control.

He walked away shoeless, but he walked away. Bradley's mother is sure her son would have died had he challenged the boys.

"Because of Host Homes, I have my son again," she said.

Moving on after loss

When John Richardson was only 36 years old, his wife, Rosanne, died of breast cancer at age 42.

John Richardson speaks with Debra Braese, director of the Western Regional Office for Catholic Social Services. Richardson joined a CSS-run grief support group after his wife died at age 42.

To help deal with all of his feelings — grief, anger, hurt — he joined a support group for widows and widowers. The group was led by Sister Marie Frechette, a Missionary Servant of the Most Blessed Trinity, then-regional director of Western Regional Office of CSS.

"Most of the people in the group were twice my age, but we were all going through the same thing," Richardson said.

"The support group kept me from feeling like I was the only one going through this," he said. "It helped me come to terms with Roseanne's death."

Opus Dei forms new institute, issues video on members

NEW YORK (CNS) — Opus Dei will take a hard rap when "The Da Vinci Code" premieres May 19, if the movie at all resembles the best-selling book of the same name by novelist Dan Brown, which portrays Opus Dei as a secretive cult within the church plotting to take over the church.

But U.S. leaders of Opus Dei — a Catholic organization with more than 87,000 members worldwide who seek to make their faith infuse all aspects of life, including their jobs — are using the occasion as a teachable moment to spread the word of what they are really about.

A month in advance of the movie's release, Opus Dei's U.S. branch announced the formation of the St. Josemaria Institute and the release of a free DVD with interviews of several U.S. members who tell how belonging to Opus Dei has affected their lives.

The institute, named after Opus Dei's founder, St. Josemaria Escriva de Balaguer, is at the organization's U.S. headquarters in New York.

Charles Thornton, the institute's director of development, told Catholic News Service that the best way to order the DVD is on the institute's new Web site, www.stjosemaria.org.

He said most of the content of the DVD is also available in a series of separate video clips on the Web site.

The institute's commentary on the new DVD, titled "Passionately Loving the World," describes Opus Dei members as "real people with real lives."

"They work hard, love their families, celebrate successes and endure failures. Through joys and sorrows, they try to grow closer to God without ever leaving the ordinary circumstances of their daily lives," the Web site says.

There are about 3,000 Opus Dei members in the United States.

Opus Dei is Latin for "God's work." Most members are laypeople who continue their secular jobs or careers but seek to bring a strong Christian spirituality into all aspects of their lives.

Some Opus Dei members commit themselves to lifelong celibacy and some are ordained priests.

In "The Da Vinci Code" one of the chief characters is an Opus Dei monk — although Opus Dei has no monks — who goes around murdering people in an effort to uncover the secret of the Holy Grail.

The book portrays all of Christianity as a vast, historic conspiracy to suppress people's knowledge of the "sacred feminine."

Deadline June 9 for Christophers' video contest for college students

NEW YORK (CNS) — Entries are due by June 9 for the Christophers' 19th annual video contest for college students, which awards more than $6,000 in cash prizes.

The competition challenges students to interpret the theme "One Person Can Make a Difference" in a short film of five minutes or less. Past winners have used a variety of styles and genres, including drama, comedy, documentary, news format, music video and animation.

Dennis W. Heaney, president of the Christophers, said the contest "is our positive way to encourage the idealism and enthusiasm of the talented young people who participate."

"No matter how technology changes, it remains true that each of us can use our talent in a positive and creative way to help change the world," he added.

This year for the first time, DVD entries will be accepted, as well as standard, full-sized NTSC-format (analog) VHS tapes.

Partaking in church life connects us to Jesus

BY DANY LUBY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

It never fails.

He has shaved his preparation time for a class or meeting too close. He rushes madly into his office at the last minute to print a document he needs, only to find his computer utterly unresponsive. He moves the mouse wildly, taps the keyboard manically — nothing works.

And so he finds himself, panicky and muttering darkly, plunged into the forbidding, dust-bunny intensive darkness beneath his desk. Experience has taught him that somewhere in the snaking, snarling welter of cords, wires and cables running between computer and desktop a connection has come loose.

Until he finds which one and reconnects it, he can pound the keys and jiggle the mouse all he wants, but the computer will still be useless.

Sunday's Gospel lifts up Jesus' image of the vine and the branches, reminding us that, apart from a solid connection to Christ, we cannot do the work we are called to do.

Like a disconnected computer, even our most determined actions will remain fruitless, dead.

How do we "remain in him," stay connected to the vine that is Christ? How do we sustain the energy and life that communion with Jesus offers?

We do it by giving priority to active participation in the life of the church, the community of his disciples. That means partaking — actively, consciously, intentionally — in the community's life of prayer and worship, especially through the sacramental life and pre-eminently the Mass.

It means listening to Christ in the Scriptures, proclaimed at liturgy, but also read and reflected upon at home. It means letting our consciences be shaped according to the model of Jesus.

It means bearing fruit, giving our faith flesh and blood and bones, through the daily exercise of love in family life and work, in leisure and civic involvement.

Questions:

Where are my connections to Christ most likely to come unplugged? What are some of the visible fruits of my being in communion with him?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"Whoever remains in me and I in him will bear much fruit" (John 15:5).

End-of-world flicks should be 'Left Behind'

Preachy scripts, shaky theology characterize three films

BY DAVID DiCERTO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — Three movies based on the hugely popular apocalyptic "Left Behind" books by evangelical authors Tim LaHaye and Jerry Jenkins have been gathered in a three-disc boxed set.

Though the production value of fundamentalist-flavored films increases along with their respective budgets, all three are handicapped by preachy, convoluted scripts riddled with clichés, corny dialogue and acting that is serviceable at best.

All three contain bonus features ranging from "making-of" documentaries and deleted scenes to music videos inspired by the series. Though some may enjoy the films as action thrillers with a Christian twist, Catholics should be aware that they contain ideas about the end times that are incongruent with Catholic eschatology (the branch of theology dealing with the end of the world).

All the films are rated A-III — adults — for mostly action violence, and all but the second installment, which was not rated, received a PG-13 rating — parents strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13 — from the Motion Picture Association of America.

In "Left Behind: The Movie" (2000), a handful of survivors — including TV reporter Buck Williams (Kirk Cameron), a born-again pilot (Brad Johnson), his teenage daughter (Janaya Stephens) and a Protestant minister (Clarence Gilyard) — try to make sense out of the mysterious mass disappearance of people worldwide, leading them to conclude that an apocalyptic prophecy is unfolding.

Tribulation Force" (2002), continues the efforts of Williams and his band of believers — caught in the anarchy of the approaching apocalypse — to expose a charismatic U.N. official (Gordon Currie) as the Antichrist and forestall his shadowy designs on world domination.

The sequel shows little improvement over the first film's awkward writing and underdeveloped characters.

The third time is not the charm with "Left Behind: World at War" (2005), which finds the Christian ranks decimated by biological weapons, while Williams tries to avert global conflict by convincing the U.S. president (Lou Gossett Jr.) that the architect of the new world "peace" is actually planning an attack on the United States that will trigger Armageddon.

The film's beefier budget can buy bigger explosions and an Oscar winner in Gossett, but not a better script.

All three films hinge on a literalist interpretation of certain Scripture passages and are informed by a pessimistic brand of Protestantism known as "premillennial dispensationalism," which took root among certain fundamentalist Christians in the early 19th century.

Central among its tenets is "the rapture," here meaning a sudden, unexpected taking up to heaven of those faithful to Christ, in advance of his second coming and presaging a seven-year period of tribulation for those "left behind."

While Catholic teaching accepts a rapture event at Christ's return in glory, the church rejects the notion of it occurring prior to the second coming as suggested by the films.

DiCerto is on the staff of the Office for Film & Broadcasting of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Family-friendly drama is a 'Hoot'

Logan Lerman (left) and Brie Larson star in "Hoot," an amiable, family-friendly drama about an eighth-grader (Lerman) who moves with his parents to small-town Florida. There he gets caught up in the crusade of an enigmatic boy (Cody Linley) and his stepsister (Larson) to save a colony of burrowing owls whose habitat is threatened by a real-estate developer hoping to bulldoze the endangered birds' nesting zone to make way for a pancake franchise.

The film, directed by Wil Shriner, is based on Carl Hiaasen's award-winning children's book of the same name.

The three young actors are bright and buoyant, and Hiaasen's tale imparts a warm and breezy message about friendship, respect for nature and taking a stand for what's right. Though the children's vandalism and occasional disregard for authority may ruffle some feathers, parents will find the amiable movie's noncynical tone refreshing. However, the film suffers from an overall weak script and a slow-starting plot, and the saucer-eyed critters get very little screen time.

Some schoolyard bullying and a few mildly crass expressions. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-I — general patronage.

The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested. Some material may not be suitable for children.

Students representing Greece show off their display during Multicultural Week at Our Lady of the Assumption School in Charlotte April 3-7. The event, coordinated by the school's PTO, highlighted more than 25 countries, from which the students, parents and teachers come. The halls, gymnasium and outdoors were filled with food, art, games, crafts and colorful presentations of cultures from continents around the world.

"The depth of research, abundant creativity and wealth of treasures shared by the school's families transformed the building into a cultural museum worthy of the highest praise," said Assistant Principal Allana-Rae Ramkissoon.

The multicultural theme was infused into the students' lessons leading up to the week's activities. For example, students learned origami and weaving, how to make sushi and write their names in Chinese. They learned a variety of cultural songs and games.

During the multicultural festival April 7, Linda Cherry, Catholic schools superintendent; Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and chancellor of the diocese; and Bernie Moorman, board president of Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools, were on hand to judge the hallway presentations.

During the festival, students learned how to use chopsticks (from Asia), hair braiding (from Africa), pasta making (from Europe) and how to potato sack race (from North America).

"Students were able to accumulate stamps in their personalized passports and shop for duty-free items, much to their delight," said Ramkissoon.

Poll: Americans more pro-life

respondents to a recent survey said they were very familiar or somewhat familiar with Roe v. Wade, only 29 percent were able to select the most accurate description of the decision from among four options, said Karen Smith of the polling company at a Washington press conference.

Most respondents — a total of 50 percent — chose an incorrect description, saying Roe made abortion legal only in the first trimester (18 percent), only in limited circumstances (17 percent) or only in the first and second trimester (15 percent).

Another 15 percent said they did not know, while 1 percent each said the correct description of Roe was "other" or "all of the above," 3 percent said "none of the above" and 2 percent refused to answer.

When asked to choose their position on abortion from among six choices, 54 percent said abortions should not be allowed or should be permitted only in cases of rape or incest or to save the mother's life — all of which the poll described as "traditional pro-life statements."

A total of 41 percent chose a position supporting legal abortion, saying abortion should be legal up to three months into the pregnancy (21 percent), up to six months (8 percent) or at any time for any reason (12 percent).

The rest said they didn't know or refused to answer.

Among the groups more likely to identify with one of the three pro-life positions described in the poll were 18- to 34-year-olds, those with household incomes under $30,000, high school graduates and those who identified themselves as Republicans, Smith said.

The margin of error for the national poll, conducted by telephone April 13-14 among 1,000 adult Americans, was plus or minus 3.1 percent.

"It is encouraging to know that people between the ages of 18 and 34 are identifying with the pro-life side," said Maggi Nadol, Respect Life director in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"Other generations have a lot to learn from them. They have grown-up with the use of ultrasound machines that clearly show that abortion does not take the life of a 'blob of tissue.' Abortion takes the life of an unborn baby girl or boy," said Nadol.

Marjorie Dannenfelser, director of the Susan B. Anthony List, which works for the election of pro-life women candidates and the passage of pro-life legislation, said the recent poll and other earlier surveys show that there is "a growing pro-life trend, especially among women."

"We've come a long way since the Freedom of Choice Act," she said, referring to legislation first introduced in 1993 that would have overturned all restrictions on abortion and mandated government financing of abortions.

"We're in a very different place right now," Dannenfelser said. "The pro-life trend is almost impossible to deny."

Authors and political commentators joined Smith in a panel discussion, moderated by Dannenfelser, on why America is trending more toward the pro-life position and how that trend might be accelerated.

Those who support keeping abortion legal are carrying out "an ongoing disinformation campaign" that aims to "keep the issue in the courts; beyond the reach of the nation's pro-life sentiments," said Kate O'Beirne, Washington editor for National Review and the author of "Women Who Make the World Worse."

She called abortion "a 'women's issue' that doesn't have the support of most women."

Kristen Day, national director of Democrats for Life, said that by supporting abortion the Democratic Party has not been faithful to its "historic principle ... of fighting for the little guy."

Although pro-life Democrats often "didn't get support from the party or the pro-life community" in the past, "that's changing now," Day said. "There's a growing realization (among politicians) that the public would like to see fewer abortions."

Ramesh Ponnuru, a senior editor with National Review and author of "The Party of Death," credited the rise in pro-life sentiment in the United States to incremental progress on such issues as partial-birth abortion and parental notification and to the increased use of ultrasound machines.

The poll and press conference were organized on behalf of the Real Women's Voices coalition, which was sponsoring a lobbying day April 26 for about 120 pro-life women from around the country.

Another 200 women had pledged to contact their senators about pro-life issues from their homes on that day.

Contributing to this story was Editor Kevin E. Murray.

Moved to tears on Holy Thursday

Conversion leads to community of faith

The late Whittaker Chambers, a celebrated man of letters, was perhaps the 20th century's most effective anti-Communist. Although he is acclaimed as a formidable intellectual with uncanny powers of persuasion, Chambers was hardly immune to sentiment.

In fact, he rejected the long-held belief that "weeping in men is unmanly." On the contrary, Chambers wrote:

"I have found most men in whom there was a depth of experience, or capacity for compassion, singularly apt to tears. How can it be otherwise? One looks and sees: and it would be a kind of impotence to be incapable of, or to grudge, the comment of tears, even while you struggle against it."

I recalled, and was comforted by, Chambers' lines as I participated in Holy Thursday Mass at St. Pius X Church in Greensboro. Msgr. Anthony Marcaccio, pastor, delivered an informative and entertaining homily (as always), at the conclusion of which he was overcome with emotion.

Seated all around me were my RCIA classmates, of whom I have become quite fond. Stealing a glance at them, I was relieved to see that their eyes, like mine, welled and sparkled.

Scores of parishioners — many of them men — unabashedly dabbed their eyes and wiped their cheeks.

This was a profoundly moving Mass, for several reasons. Since early July, my classmates, our sponsors, the RCIA team and I had explored and reveled in the mysteries of the Catholic faith.

Here, in the midst of Holy Week, we were nearing the pinnacle of our spiritual journey: two days later, during the Easter Vigil, we would be baptized and confirmed.

The ceremony and pageantry of Holy Thursday — an ethereal, spine-tingling performance by the parish choir; a lingering, fragrant haze of incense; Msgr. Marcaccio's homily; the near-tangible spirit of reverence that permeated the proceedings — brought home to us the sense of awe and wonder that characterizes St. Pius X Church, and Catholicism itself.

Many of our rites — welcoming,

Guest Column

CHARLES DAVENPORT JR.
GUEST COLUMNIST

acceptance, sending to the bishop, election and call to continuing conversion — were now behind us. (Amber Register and I — the only catechumens in the class — were also the subjects of three scrutinies.)

We were taught the significance of each rite, and capably guided through them by our sponsors and team members Sue Brusnahan, Tracy Welliver, Donna Butterfield and Mike Epps.

Sue, the matriarch of our little platoon, conducts meetings with a gentle but resolute hand; Tracy wows us with an encyclopedic knowledge of Catholic theology, passionately delivered.

And of course, to my godmother, Karen Anderson, I am eternally grateful. A "cradle Catholic," Karen took me under her wing and, with a contagious sense of piety, taught me how to fly on my own.

As the congregation departed St. Pius X Church in silence Holy Thursday, I realized that, in an authentic community, words are often unnecessary. According to Webster's, a "community" is "a united body of individuals" and "people with common interests living in a particular area."

"Community" is a term tossed about carelessly, often used to describe a collection of people with merely superficial commonalities, such as skin color or sexual orientation. Individuals cast into such "communities" often share little or nothing in common.

Conversely, my RCIA classmates and I have joined a community in the true sense of the word. The warmth and sincerity with which St. Pius X Church has encouraged and welcomed us is worthy of the comment of tears, and this neophyte no longer struggles against it.

Pope says Jesus stays with his disciples through church's tradition

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Through the living tradition of the church, Christ remains with his disciples until the end of time, teaching, guiding and comforting them, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"Tradition is not a collection of things or words — a box of dead things — but tradition is the living river of life that flows from Christ to us," the pope said May 3 at his weekly general audience.

The pope said his current series of audience talks is aimed at helping people understand "what the church is."

A key to understanding, he said, is to recognize how Christ entrusted the Gospel message to his apostles, who handed it on to others throughout history.

The earliest Christian communities, he said, were gathered together by the apostles, who were the first to know Jesus Christ and who were sent by him to spread his message of salvation.

The communities "knew they could count on the guidance of the Twelve, as well as on ... those who little by little succeeded them in the ministry of the word and in the service of communion," he said.

The apostles' successors formed new communities and appointed their own successors, who would spread the Gospel even further, the pope said.

The message they handed on was not their own experience, but what was given to them through the church's living tradition, he said.

While the face-to-face experience of the apostles' relationship with Jesus was "unique and unrepeatable," he said, Jesus promised to remain with his disciples until the end of time and does so through the power of the Holy Spirit.

"Tradition, then, is the story of the Holy Spirit who acts in the history of the church through the mediation of the apostles and their successors in faithful continuity," the pope said.

Through tradition and apostolic succession, he said, "it is Christ himself who reaches those called to faith. The distance of centuries is overcome and the risen Lord offers himself alive and working for us in today's church and today's world."

"This is our joy: that through the living river of tradition, Christ is not 2,000 years away from us, but is truly with us always," Pope Benedict said.

Happy 80th, 'Papa'

Memories are to be treasured, shared

Reverence for ancestors is an admirable thread in Chinese culture.

It was wonderful to see that thread running through an 80th birthday celebration for retired neurosurgeon Paul Lin, who was born in China and left at age 21 when the communists took control.

Lin came to Philadelphia for his neurosurgical residency and subsequent career. He married an Italian-American nurse and raised a family of six.

Lin's friends and family gathered on a recent Sunday for a mid-day, full-course meal in one of Philadelphia's Chinese restaurants.

Memories were recalled for the grandchildren as children produced memories of their own by reading personalized tributes to "Papa."

A central theme that ran through their admiring words was an expression of gratitude for Papa's quiet presence to and with them. He was there for their recitals, performances and games.

"I still enjoy sitting on the couch and reading with Papa, with or without conversation," said one. "I've always admired and respected my grandfather's intellectual gifts and his appreciation for silence."

One granddaughter said, "Papa reminds us how in China one does not wither away as the years pile up; rather, one gains respect, honor and knowledge."

Several of the youngsters expressed gratitude for his persistence in putting vocabulary-builders in their hands in attractive tapes, books and word-game formats:

"Papa has always wanted all the young kids to succeed in school. He always asks how our grades are."

And another child said: "I broke a board with my elbow at karate. Papa knew that I liked Chinese characters, so he took one of the boards and painted 'Merry Christmas' on it for me. We hung the board on a wall in my bedroom."

"Thank you, Papa. That board will always be very special to me."

There were more memories of the fishing pier on the New Jersey shore, trips to the penny arcade, boardwalk breakfasts, first-ever swings with a golf club.

There was a "contract" awarded a would-be filmmaker to make a documentary for his grandparents' 50th wedding anniversary based on interviews and old-photo montages.

"Now he calls me, 'Mr. Spielberg,'" says this proud grandson of a perfect Papa!

Judging Pope Benedict's first year

Spiritual conduct should be considered first

The first year of Pope Benedict XVI's reign is receiving mixed reviews by the press.

Some hoped the new pope would place his emphasis on the defense of orthodoxy and use a heavy hand against those who disagree with church policies.

There was anticipation that he would be very strict with theologians, bar all homosexuals from the seminary, block the new feminism, slow down the lay leadership movement and perhaps restore the Tridentine Mass.

Others were hoping he would consolidate Rome's bureaucracy and dismantle the "old guard," vigorously support the spirit of the Vatican Council II, do away with priestly celibacy and return to the style of thinking that characterized him during his early days as a theology professor.

So far, Pope Benedict has not met any of these expectations. In fact, his first encyclical was a refreshing treatise on love that was highly praised.

To the surprise of many he even writes about the pros and cons of eros!

Compared with Pope John Paul II, the new pope has kept a low profile. Perhaps this is due to his age or his personal preference, but he travels little.

The Human Side

Though he is the center of attention, he tends to shy away from it.

A person of stature, like the pope, is constantly under the microscope. His every move and utterance are analyzed and commented upon. This is normal, but it often tends to miss what is most important.

Pope Benedict is not only responsible for the Catholic Church as an institution, he also is responsible for its spirituality. To carry out the latter responsibility, he must first be responsible for his own spirituality.

As of now, little has been written on this. If someone were to write on the pope's spirituality, what would the analysis look like?

First, what exactly attracted this pope to the priesthood, to serving God through this particular vocation rather than in marriage? Did his vocation result from an instantaneous inspiration by God, a catastrophic event, an inspiring person or author, or a liturgical event?

Who are his favorite saints, and why one saint more than another? Who is he reading at the moment? We know that the pope loves Scripture, but what exactly in it most inspires him and why?

Some might say that these are pious questions about matters to be kept private. I beg to differ.

Too often journalists and the public only want to talk about the pope as if he were a politician, statesman or the CEO of a big business corporation. Even when people write of him as a theologian, it is as though theology were a sterile science unrelated to spirituality.

When popes are canonized saints, it isn't primarily because of their political skills on the world stage or theological theses they developed. Rather, it is because of who they were spiritually — their spiritual conduct in the midst of church politics and theological debate.

This is where an analysis of Pope Benedict XVI's first year should begin.

Gen-Xers and divorce

Study shows harmful effects on children

Gen-Xers who grew up in the divorce explosion of the '70s and '80s still feel the wounds of their parents' split, argues Elizabeth Marquardt in her book "Between Two Worlds: The Inner Lives of Children of Divorce."

Marquardt chronicles her own experience with dividing time and energy between her mom and dad as a child and adolescent. Research she conducted with sociologist Norval Glenn of the University of Texas at Austin concluded that:

1. There's no such thing as a good divorce, say grown children of divorce.

2. Because of time spent alone, children of divorce tend to have some emotional distance between themselves and their parents.

3. Children of divorce grow up between the two distinct worlds of their parents, who usually differ in values and priorities. This causes quite a bit of confusion.

4. Internalizing the conflict of these two worlds, children of divorce say they feel as though they had to grow up prematurely.

They felt a need to act differently around their parents and to keep secrets in order to preserve the peace of the family.

Before now, most research on divorce was done by people who didn't experience it themselves. In 2000, Judith Wallerstein published "The Unexpected Legacy of Divorce," arguing that divorce surely harms children.

This book was criticized by some because the survey sample was so small.

Conversely, in 2002, E. Mavis Hetherington wrote "For Better or For Worse," in which she argued that divorce doesn't necessarily leave children with lasting damage.

Marquardt's book, told from the perspective of a child of divorce, deals with the more subtle influences of divorce.

Although she acknowledges that sometimes divorce is necessary, as in cases of domestic violence, drug abuse or alcoholism, she believes all divorce is tragic because it uproots the basic foundation needed for children to thrive.

As a child of a divorce, I know this lack of foundation contributes to bouts of insecurity and depression. I need an excessive amount of reassurance and feedback, especially when I venture into something new.

And without a good role model, my husband — also raised in a divorced home — and I wing it a lot of the time. We try harder to communicate, knowing how easily couples drift apart.

That is the purpose of Marquardt's book: to urge couples to try harder in order to give their children the gift of one home and one family.

'The Da Vinci Code': Blessing in disguise?

Catholic social teaching can overcome falsehoods

The film version of the popular novel "The Da Vinci Code," scheduled for U.S. release May 19, presents seriously distorted information about Jesus and the Catholic Church: that Jesus never said he was God; that Jesus was married to Mary Magdalene; that she became his successor; and that the Catholic Church conspired to keep these "facts" from the world.

Woo! Wait a minute! How can such nonsense be taken seriously?

Nonetheless, it appears that many believe "The Da Vinci Code" portrays solid history. Unfortunately, such belief probably will lead many people farther away from the real Jesus and the truth taught by the church.

But, maybe not.

Actually, "The Da Vinci Code" presents a teachable moment. For instance, the U.S. bishops' Catholic Communication Campaign has developed an informative Web site (www.jesusdecoded.com) to help readers understand historical facts surrounding Jesus and the early church.

"The Da Vinci Code" may be a blessing in disguise. One hopes it will challenge us to take up a serious, ongoing study of faith.

One reason "The Da Vinci Code" became so popular is that many Christians do not have a truly satisfying, adult understanding of Jesus and the church. Such an understanding takes time, prayer, study and action.

It doesn't take a degree in theology, but it does take effort — ongoing, committed, lifelong effort.

A weak knowledge of Catholicism is no match for the many powerful economic, political and social neopagan forces in our world. A committed, mature grasp of faith is required here.

And nowhere else is that more lacking than in the area known as Catholic social teaching.

Often called the church's best kept secret, Catholic social teaching is blessed with more than 100 years of outstanding documents on social justice and peace authored by popes, Vatican Council II, world synods of bishops and the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Sadly, these documents attract more dust than readers.

Catholic social teaching is a highly developed set of principles and reflections designed to guide us in applying the Gospel's liberating message to the social, economic and political problems facing modern humanity.

Its central themes are:

—The protection of all human life and the promotion of human dignity.

—The call to participate in family and community life.

—The promotion of human rights and responsibilities.

—The preferential option for the poor and vulnerable.

—The safeguarding of workers' dignity and rights.

—The building of global solidarity and the common good.

Making a Difference

TONY
MAGLIANO
CNS COLUMNIST

—The care for God's creation.

—The universal destination of goods.

—The call to become peacemakers.

Among the most important documents of Catholic social teaching are Vatican Council II's "Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World" and Pope John Paul II's encyclicals "On Social Concerns" and "The Gospel of Life."

The Vatican's new "Compendium of the Social Doctrine of the Church" is the official summary of the entire body of Catholic social teaching. An excellent concise collection titled "Our Best Kept Secret" is available from the Washington-based Center of Concern.

Only the real Jesus can fully satisfy the longings of the human heart and mind.

"The Da Vinci Code" and other imposters of the truth are no match for believers who have a strong relationship with Christ, who well understand the Gospel and teachings of his church, and who boldly proclaim them in word and deed!

President Bush visits a New Orleans home, praises Catholic Charities volunteers

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW ORLEANS — President George W. Bush praised the work of Catholic Charities volunteers in helping to rebuild New Orleans during an April 27 visit to a Ninth Ward home ravaged by Hurricane Katrina and the floods that followed.

He also called for another 2,500 volunteers "to come down to New Orleans to help people get back on their feet" through Operation Helping Hands, the Catholic Charities volunteer project that has already gutted 311 damaged homes to prepare them for rebuilding.

Another 776 homes remain on the project's waiting list.

At the home of Ethel Williams, a 72-year-old widow, the president said, "The amazing thing that's happened in her home is that there are people across the country who are helping to rebuild it."

"Catholic Charities, in this case, has provided the volunteers to help Ms. Williams reclaim her life," Bush said.

"So I'd like to first start by thanking the volunteers who are here in the home. I want to thank them for setting such a good example," he said.

The 15-member volunteer team that worked on Williams' home came from Alabama, Michigan, North Carolina, Vermont and Washington, D.C.

Williams lost nearly everything in Hurricane Katrina and now lives temporarily with her daughter, Wanda.

"If you're interested in helping the victims of Katrina, if you're interested in helping them get back on their feet, come down here and volunteer," Bush said.

"A good place to start is in Catholic Charities. You can get right there on the Web page (www.catholiccharities-no.org); they'll find work for you. They'll give you a chance to contribute something to your country," he said.

President George W. Bush laughs with resident Ethel Williams at her damaged home during an April 27 visit to New Orleans. During his tour of the area, the president praised the work of Catholic Charities volunteers in helping rebuild homes in the Ninth Ward that were ravaged by Hurricane Katrina and the floods that followed.

Orleans launched Operation Helping Hands late last year, 2,817 people from across the country have participated.

Bush was joined in his visit to Williams' home by Jim Kelly and Gordon Wadge, CEO and president, respectively, of Catholic Charities of New Orleans; Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco; New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin; and other officials.

"We need the hearts and hands of the nation in this journey to rebuild," said Wadge in a statement. "Anyone who enters a home like Mrs. Williams' and sees, smells and touches the devastation will come away with a greater sense of the suffering and the challenge."

"We are committed to doing all that we can to allow people to come home and begin their lives again," said Kelly.

During his visit to New Orleans, Bush also presented the President's Volunteer Service Award to Tris Coffin Jr., a volunteer with Second Harvest Food Bank, a program of the archdiocesan Catholic Charities.

Coffin, 87, has been a volunteer for nearly 22 years at the food bank, which annually distributes millions of pounds of food to needy families in New Orleans and the surrounding area.

The President's Volunteer Service Award is given by the President's Council on Service and Civic Participation to individuals, families and groups who have demonstrated outstanding volunteer service and civic participation.

Demographic, poll data show complexities of immigration issues

BY PATRICIA ZAPOR
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Amid the enthusiastic rallies and dueling politicians' rhetoric about immigration of the last few weeks, recent demographic analyses and opinion polls put the debate into numerical perspective.

Among the conclusions drawn from the data are that the nation's illegal immigrants include many families in complex situations, and that the opinions of Americans on the subject don't line up easily into neat rows.

By the numbers

Some of the demographic information may surprise people who think the illegal immigrant population consists largely of single young men.

About 36 percent, or 2.3 million of the 6.3 million "unauthorized families" that are headed by an illegal immigrant are single men with no children; another 12 percent, or 740,000, are single women with no children.

About 540,000 families, or about 9 percent, are couples without kids.

According to a Pew Hispanic Center analysis of census data, the other 41 percent or so break down into an assortment of "mixed status" families where the parents aren't here legally.

Pew estimates the total number of illegal immigrants in the country at between 11 million and 12 million. Those 6.3 million "unauthorized families" are made up of a total of 13.9 million people, who include illegal immigrant adults and citizen or legal resident children and spouses.

Those "mixed status" categories include 1.5 million families where all the children

FROM CRASH TO COMMUNION

Christina Trice, 7, receives her first Communion from Father Chris LaBarge as Joan Muschner, principal of Immaculate Conception Sunday School, assists her during the celebration at Immaculate Conception Church in Marydel, Md., April 30. Eleven days earlier, Christina was critically injured in a car accident in nearby Dover, Del.

Injuries don't stop accident victim from receiving first Communion

MARYDEL, Md. (CNS) — Christina Trice processed into Immaculate Conception Church in Marydel April 30, her hands piously folded and a look of determination on her face.

Like the other girls receiving their first Communion, 7-year-old Christina wore a white dress, veil and shoes. But she also sported white satin wheel covers on her wheelchair.

Her presence was a testament to the prayers of loved ones, the care of her doctors and nurses, and her own willpower.

Eleven days earlier, Christina was critically injured in a car accident in nearby Dover, Del. She was knocked unconscious and suffered a concussion, fractured pelvis, lacerated kidney and spleen, and punctured lungs, according to her mother, Barbara Trice, who was driving the family car when the accident occurred.

Christina's right ear was almost severed, and she was bleeding profusely.

The immediate concern was not whether Christina would make her first Communion, but whether she would survive.

"We're lucky to be here," Barbara Trice said. "I thank God for her being here."

Father Chris LaBarge, pastor, cited Christina's recovery in his homily.

"One of the things we are witnessing today is the power of prayer," he said. "A week ago, we didn't think Christina would be here."

He called on Christina "to tell people how much a difference prayer has made in your life. Prayer is powerful."

Father LaBarge noted that many people in Marydel and beyond had prayed for her recovery.

The Saturday after the accident, Christina "asked, 'Am I going to be able to receive first holy Communion?'" Barbara Trice said. "At that point I didn't have an answer for her."

But, "You can't hold this child down. She's got a very strong will," she said.

Christina returned home from the hospital April 28. The doctors, nurses and staff "worked really hard to make sure that when we left there Friday, she was good to go," said Trice, who was not seriously injured in the accident.

Christina's first Communion classmates helped the girl's spirits, making her cards and signing a quilt, which was later signed by her doctors and nurses.

Christina must stay off her feet for six to eight weeks so her pelvis can heal.

Trice marvels at how Christina survived the accident. Christina had sat in the front seat of the car that day rather than the back. Had Christina been in the rear passenger-side seat where she normally sits, Trice said, she would have been killed; that part of her car bore the brunt of the impact.

"I think the angels were holding on to her," Trice said. "Somebody had to be looking after us."

National black Catholic leaders pledge to help with Katrina recovery

NEW ORLEANS (CNS) — A contingent of bishops, religious and laity representing the National Black Catholic Congress promised to use their influence and resources to help restore the lives and property of those still suffering from the effects of Hurricane Katrina.

Bishop John H. Ricard of Pensacola-Tallahassee, Fla., and Auxiliary Bishop Joseph N. Perry of Chicago spoke to the student body at MAX High School in mid-April, telling them they came to New Orleans to see firsthand the devastation, listen to their storm stories and take back recommendations on how to help with the recovery.

Bishop Ricard is president and Bishop Perry is vice president of the board of trustees of the National Black Catholic Congress. Representatives of Catholic services and organizations from 15 cities joined the bishops in their visit to the region.

"These African-American Catholic leaders, priests, sisters, deacons and laymen are very concerned about what happened to you," Bishop Ricard said. "We're looking for ways to extend our hands in a way of providing you some help."

Three Catholic high schools suffered heavy damage from flooding, while another was virtually spared. One of the damaged schools is not scheduled to reopen.

"The overwhelming majority of our children lost everything," Father Ricard said. "It was the African-American neighborhoods that were hit the hardest. The faculties at these three schools also lost a lot."

Father Ricard said one displaced student is living in a home with three other families. He told them how each family occupied one bedroom.

"A lot of our kids live in trailers ... they may be living in trailers for two or three years," he said.

While the hurricane was terrible, "The rainbow is coming, and we're going to help you rebuild," Bishop Perry told the students.

Pope says missionary societies help Catholics know God's love

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The pontifical missionary societies help every Catholic in every part of the world let others know of God's love and his promise of salvation, Pope Benedict XVI said.

The Society for the Propagation of the Faith, the Holy Childhood Association and the other societies always have focused on communicating "the love of God revealed in his plan of salvation," the pope said.

Pope Benedict met May 8 with 114 national directors of the pontifical missionary societies who were holding their general assembly.

While the societies' financial support may be directed at different segments of the church in mission territories, such as children or seminarians, they all are involved in promoting awareness of each Catholic's missionary obligation and in helping local churches grow and mature.

"All of this has given rise among the Christian people to a reawakening of faith and love, connected to a great missionary enthusiasm," the pope said.

The work the national directors do in their own countries, he said, helps Catholics understand that missionary involvement — through prayer, financial support or working in the missions — is an essential part of a Christian's life.

In addition, he said, the fact that Catholics around the world support the pontifical missionary societies is a sign of the catholicity of the church.

Pope ordains 15 priests, warns against clerical careerism

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI said the priesthood should be understood as a commitment to service and not an opportunity for career-climbing.

The pope made the comments shortly before ordaining 15 priests during a lengthy liturgy in St. Peter's Basilica May 7. Twelve of the new priests came from Italy, with one each from Honduras, Israel and Poland.

The Mass highlighted the annual celebration of the World Day of Prayer for Vocations. In his sermon, the pope said the priest as "good shepherd" must be ready to sacrifice himself, know his flock and serve unity.

He prefaced his remarks with a warning about "careerism, the temptation to reach 'the top,' to acquire for oneself a position through the church" and to help oneself instead of helping others.

"This is the image of someone who uses the priesthood to make himself important, to become a personality, the image of one who aims at self-acclaim and not the humble service of Jesus Christ," Pope Benedict said.

Instead, he said, a priest should have an attitude of total self-giving and realize that following a vocational call may be in contrast with one's desire for self-realization and esteem.

The pope said a pastor's willingness to sacrifice himself for his faithful is not something that happens only in martyrdom, but day by day, in being there for others even at the cost of abandoning his own goals.

To serve his flock, he said, a priest must know them well — which means going to talk to them and being open to their questions and needs.

"The pastor cannot be satisfied with knowing names and dates. His knowledge must always be knowledge with the heart," he said.

In working for unity, the pope said, the priest needs to look beyond the horizons of his immediate community and be aware that Christianity has a universal mission aimed at all people.

"The mission of Jesus involves all humanity, and therefore the church has a responsibility to help all humanity recognize God — the God who, for all of us, was made man in Jesus Christ, suffered, died and rose from the dead," he said.

The pope said the church can never withdraw into the confines of its own structure; it has a duty to bring the Gospel to all people.

He said the priest's mission was irreplaceable in the church. Even if some regions currently show a shortage of clergy, he said, the church can be certain that God will continue to call young men to the priesthood.

Cross-bearing crab?

Many Catholics in Goa, India, believe an uncommon class of local crab, seen April 18 with a cross mark on its shell, is a descendant from a crab that St. Francis Xavier blessed in 1546. Some Jesuit records say that in February 1546, while voyaging in what today is eastern Indonesia, the Basque missionary was caught in a storm. In an attempt to calm the storm, he took his crucifix and dipped it into the sea, but it slipped from his grasp and fell into the water. The next morning, as he paced on the seashore of Seram Island, he saw that a crab approaching him was holding his cross. He knelt down, retrieved the cross and blessed the crab.

Appreciating angels

Volunteers honored at annual banquet

BELMONT — Holy Angels recently paid special tribute to those who give of their time and talent.

The 2006 Volunteer Awards were presented during the 16th annual volunteer appreciation awards banquet held on the Sisters of Mercy campus in Belmont April 27. The banquet, celebrated during National Volunteer Appreciation Week, saluted the more than 100 people who serve Holy Angels through its Volunteer and Volunteer programs.

"Each volunteer at Holy Angels helps bring miracles to life through generous service, each time he or she walks through the door," said Regina Moody, Holy Angels president and CEO.

"Our residents look forward to seeing our volunteers. Their eyes light up when they hear the voices of these very special people," said Moody.

Founded in 1956 by the Sisters of Mercy, Holy Angels is a nonprofit corporation that provides residential services and programs for children and adults with mental retardation and physical disabilities, some of whom are medically fragile.

Moody said Holy Angels could not offer its specialized services without the help of its volunteers.

Melissa Todd, a resident of Rock Hill, S.C., and a volunteer for more than four years, received the Dennis McClain Volunteer of the Year award, named for a longtime Holy Angels volunteer.

Jenny Rice, a nursing volunteer and a resident of Charlotte, received the Ed Sabatini Advocacy Award, which recognizes those who serve as advocates for Holy Angels.

Kaye McGarry, a Charlotte resident, received the Angel of Friendship award, which honors the one-on-one personal time and commitment of volunteers that results in a special friendship extending beyond regular volunteer service.

Jeanine Dibble, Margaret Ross, Michael Howren and volunteer Jonathan Kane received the Kevin Patrick Crosby Touched by an Angel Award, which honors volunteers who offer an "angelic touch" to their volunteer work.

Dibble, of Belmont, assists residents with art projects; Ross, of Dallas, volunteers at Holy Angels' Cherubs Café in Belmont; Howren, of Gastonia, assists Holy Angels' maintenance department; and Kane, of Belmont, volunteers with Holy Angels' Great Adventures program.

Kara Hamm, 15, of Cherryville, received the Volunteer of the Year award. She has been a volunteer for four years.

Knights of Columbus Council 770 received the Volunteer Group of the Year award for their numerous fundraisers for and outreach to Holy Angels residents and staff.

Fran and Paul Breitbach accept awards for their years of service to Catholic Social Services' Piedmont Triad Office during the third annual Partners in Hope fundraising event in Winston-Salem May 3.

Annual event raises awareness, funds for CSS office

WINSTON-SALEM — Catholic Social Services' Piedmont Triad Office recently celebrated its third annual Partners in Hope fundraising event, at which two longtime volunteers were honored.

The event, with Bishop Peter J. Jugis as the keynote speaker, was held at the Millennium Center in Winston-Salem May 2, during Catholic Social Services Awareness Week.

"Catholic Social Services has served the Piedmont Triad for more than 20 years," said David Harold, Piedmont Triad Office's director.

"While we look forward to Partners in Hope as a celebration of the work we do, the event is also an opportunity to gain support and awareness for the people we serve."

Partners in Hope featured a dinner and silent auction. Proceeds support programs and services including adoption, pregnancy support, counseling, youth programs and immigration services.

During the event, Paul and Fran Breitbach were recognized for their years of service and support.

"They simply live the Gospel every day," said Jack McAleer, a supporter of Catholic Social Services.

"From the first day I met Paul and Fran, I have witnessed their commitments to making our community a better place through their family, their work and through volunteering to make a difference in many great organizations and charitable events," he said.

"Together, they have been an inspiration for so many to grow in their faith," said McAleer.

Fourth-graders from St. Gabriel School in Charlotte entertain residents of Beverly Healthcare Nursing Home April 24.

Sharing songs and smiles

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — It was a day of song and fun for both children and seniors.

Fourth-graders from St. Gabriel School in Charlotte entertained the residents of Beverly Healthcare Nursing Home April 24. The students sang several classic songs for the residents, including "Amazing Grace," "She'll be comin' 'round the mountain" and "Take me out to the ballgame."

The fourth-graders have been interacting with residents of the home since September, singing Christmas carols, sending Valentine's Day cards and crosses.

Betsy DesNoyer, fourth-grade teacher at the school, said the ongoing outreach is a way to teach the children how to live the beatitudes and Catholic social teaching, particularly regarding life and dignity of life issues.

The cranes were made in conjunction with and were on display during the school's PTO-sponsored International Fair March 7-8.

Each grade represented a different country, including Japan, Egypt, Czech Republic, Germany and Ecuador. Displays showcased artifacts and students dressed in costumes of their various heritages.

Many students helped fold the paper cranes, on which some students wrote prayers. They will be sent to Hiroshima and join thousands of other paper cranes to be used for Peace Day in August 2006.

Exemplifying Christ's love

Youth groups earn pastoral care awards

RIDGECREST — Two youth groups have earned special honors this year.

The youth council at St. James the Greater Church in Concord and the Life Teen youth program at St. Mark Church in Huntersville both were awarded the 2006 Bishop William G. Curlin Pastoral Care Award.

The awards were presented during the annual Diocesan Youth Conference, held at Lifeway Ridgecrest Conference Center near Black Mountain April 28-30.

The award recognizes individuals, groups and/or parishes in the Diocese of Charlotte who exemplify the principles of Christ's love in the ministry of pastoral care.

St. Mark Church's Life Teen program, under the direction of youth minister Debra Lemmon, was recognized for assisting two Hmong refugee families who settled in Charlotte last fall.

Working with Catholic Social Services' Refugee Resettlement Office, the youths spent more than 250 hours planning and executing their project to prepare the families' homes and collect furnishings, clothing and donations.

St. James the Greater Church's youth council won for a number of efforts in the parish and beyond throughout the year.

The youth council, under the direction of Karen Sutton, served as facilitators for the parish's confirmation classes and weekend retreats. They held monthly fundraisers and planned all parish youth events, including Vacation Bible School and Lenten dinners.

The council also performed a number of community service projects and participated in and assisted with diocesan events.

While the Bishop Curlin Award originated in the diocesan youth ministry office, it is not limited to youth ministry, said Paul Kotlowski, director of diocesan youth ministry.

"Each year we invite parishes to nominate individuals who are deserving of the award," he said. "The hope is that potential applicants might come from any part of the church, not just the youth ministry population."

FROM THE COVER

Mary Magdalene an important, enigmatic saint firsthand witness to his crucifixion and burial and the first person to witness his resurrection and proclaim it to the apostles.

That is what the Gospels say about her.

Was she also the unnamed repentant sinner (often thought to be a prostitute) in Luke's Gospel, who anointed Jesus' feet and washed them with her tears? Or the Mary who was the sister of Martha and Lazarus of Bethany?

In the West, Christian teaching and preaching have made those identifications for centuries. But modern scholars say these were three distinct women, not one.

Eastern Christianity has consistently

'Da Vinci Code' author Dan Brown's version of Mary Magdalene is "two legendary steps away from" the real person found in Scripture.

— Father Raymond F. Collins regarded the three as distinct individuals.

Was she the wife of Jesus? Did she bear his child? Were she and Jesus ancestors of the Merovingian dynasty of early French kings?

Even ancient heretical sects and fantasy-laden medieval Christian legends that exalted Mary Magdalene did not make those claims, though Dan Brown's best-selling novel "The Da Vinci Code" does.

When the book comes out as a movie May 19, it will almost certainly draw new attention to Mary Magdalene, one of the most prominent women in the New Testament but an enigmatic figure about whom nothing is known apart from the references found in the Gospels.

A 'teachable moment'

Father Raymond F. Collins, a New Testament scholar at The Catholic University of America in Washington said in an interview that the Dan Brown version of Mary Magdalene is "two legendary steps away from" the real person found in Scripture.

But in interviews he and Sister of St. Joseph Elizabeth Johnson, a theologian at Fordham University in New York, concurred that the widely popular curiosity about Mary Magdalene generated by Dan Brown's tale has created a "teachable moment."

Father Collins, who wrote the "Mary Magdalene" entry in the six-volume Anchor Bible Dictionary, said the first legends about Mary Magdalene come in some of the apocryphal gnostic gospels of the second and third centuries.

There in addition to her role as the first witness to Jesus' resurrection, she is treated as receiving other special revelations from the risen Jesus. But even in the gnostic gospels she is not called Jesus' wife.

One gnostic text, the gospel of Philip, portrays her as Jesus' closest companion but not his wife.

St. Mary Magdalene is depicted in a sketch by artist Leonardo da Vinci. According to the Gospels, Mary Magdalene was a leading disciple of Jesus and used her resources to support him and the apostles.

Sister Johnson has written extensively on the place of women's experience and female imagery in Christian theology. She said the legends developed in the gnostic gospels are interesting not because they portray Christ's life and times accurately, but because they offer insight into struggles in the early church.

The legends about Mary Magdalene show struggles over the leadership role of women in the early church, she said.

Fictional ideas

Father Collins said novelist Brown goes well beyond such early legends by imagining the disciple from Magdala to be Jesus' wife and the mother of his child.

In the novel, Jesus and Mary Magdalene were ancestors of the Merovingian dynasty that ruled from about 500 to 751 in what is now France, and secret survivors of the royal line continue to the present day to guard (much like the gnostics of the second and third centuries) arcane secret knowledge about Jesus that the official church rejects and seeks to suppress.

Sister Johnson said those early gnostic texts — 13 of which were only uncovered in 1945 when a farmer found them buried in a large jar near Nag Hammadi, Egypt — show some groups in early Christianity "wanting to promote women as bearers of knowledge, as wisdom figures, as those whom Christ trusted" with special revelations.

She noted that Mary Magdalene is the first witness to the Resurrection in all four canonical Gospels, and because of her role in announcing the good news to the rest, St. Augustine referred to her as "apostola apostolorum," the apostle to the apostles.

Another strand of legend behind Brown's novel is the fact that according to medieval pious legends that circulated in France — which relied on identifying Mary Magdalene as being the same person as Mary of Bethany — Mary Magdalene and Lazarus were cast out of Palestine and set adrift in an oarless boat that landed in southern France.

They then became among the first to preach the faith there.

Father Collins said that legend, along with the one in Eastern Christianity that has Mary Magdalene accompanying John and Jesus' mother to Ephesus, is simply not credible.

Summing up the real Mary Magdalene with what she called the "w's," Sister Johnson said, "Let's get this straight: She was not Jesus' wife ... neither a wife nor a whore, but a witness."

Reconfiguring the Curia

Pope temporarily merges four Vatican councils under two presidents

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — At the start of what may be reform of the Roman Curia, Pope Benedict XVI merged the leadership of four of the Vatican's councils under two presidents.

The Vatican announced in March that French Cardinal Paul Poupard, head of the Pontifical Council for Culture, also would serve as the interim president of the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue and that Italian Cardinal Renato Martino, head of the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace, temporarily would head the Pontifical Council for Migrants and Travelers.

The Vatican announced that the pope accepted the retirement of the head of the migrants' council, Japanese Cardinal Stephen Fumio Hamao, who turned 76 March 9.

To fill the vacancy, the pope united "for the time being" the presidency of the office with that of justice and peace.

Cardinal Poupard's assignment as president of the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue filled a post made vacant after the pope Feb. 15 named its former head, Archbishop Michael Fitzgerald, to be the new ambassador to Egypt and the Arab League.

The pope decided "in order to favor a more intense dialogue between people of culture and members of various religions," to unite "for the time being, the presidency of the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue with that of the Pontifical Council for Culture," the Vatican said in a written statement.

Cardinal Poupard said he was surprised by his appointment, especially since he is 75, the age when bishops must submit their resignations.

But "I obeyed and thanked the Holy Father for his benevolence and trust," the cardinal told Vatican Radio March 11.

The cardinal said the pope sees an "intrinsic link between the intercultural and interreligious dimensions." He recalled a speech the pope made during a meeting with Muslims Aug. 20 in Cologne, Germany, when he told the president of the Turkish Muslim Union that "interreligious and intercultural dialogue is a vital necessity."

The pope alone has the authority to make changes in the Roman Curia, the church's central administrative offices; he can name a new person to head an office, create a new office or merge existing offices.

Rumors had circulated for months that Pope Benedict would implement changes to trim the Curia, which, when he was Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, he often described as being overly bureaucratic.

As then-Cardinal Ratzinger, a top curial official, he once said there should be "an unlimited examination of conscience at all levels of the church" to see what structures should be reformed so that "the authentic face of the church shows through once again."

During a Sept. 1, 1990, gathering with members of the Catholic lay group, Communion and Liberation, he said, "This examination of conscience is to be extended to the Curia. How many agencies are really necessary?"

Then head of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, he said constant reform was needed by the church and its institutions in order to remove the "superfluous scaffolding" that obscures its divine mission.

The changes announced March 11 suggested any broad reform would be taken in a step-by-step, see-how-it-goes approach; the Vatican's wording that the new appointments were made "for the time being" also indicated that the joint presidencies may be temporary.

Pope John Paul II established the Pontifical Council for Culture in 1982 and, in 1993, he assigned to the council the tasks previously covered by the council for dialogue with nonbelievers.

The move to merge the interreligious dialogue council, an office created in 1964 by Pope Paul VI, with the office for culture reflects Pope Benedict's view that religions and cultures should be seen together.

In his 2004 book, "Truth and Tolerance," the then-Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger said, "Only in modern Europe has a concept of culture been developed that portrays it as a sphere separate from religion or even in opposition to it."

"In all known historical cultures, religion is an essential element of culture, is indeed its determinative center; it is religion that determines the scale of values and, thereby, the inner cohesion and hierarchy of all these cultures."

Culture, he said, is an attempt to understand the world and human existence within the world, so it naturally includes people's perception of the relationship between human beings and the divine.

Therefore, he said, the only way for cultures to dialogue with each other is to dialogue about truths concerning the person, "within which the truth about God and about reality as a whole is always involved."

"Faith itself is cultural," he wrote. "It does not exist in a naked state, as sheer religion. Simply by telling man who he is and how he should go about being human, faith is creating culture and is culture."

Pope Paul created the council for migrants and travelers in 1970 to study and provide pastoral care to people on the move.

Some of the issues the council had been dealing with recently, such as the problem of human trafficking, should carry over easily into the work of the justice and peace council, an office also created by Pope Paul in 1967.

Archbishop Agostino Marchetto, secretary of the Pontifical Council for Migrants and Travelers, said he had not been informed about any future plans for the council, only that the pope has decided that "for the time being" Cardinal Martino will serve as its president.

"We are here to do the will of God through the guidance of our pope," he told Catholic News Service March 13.

The archbishop said pairing his office with the council for justice and peace makes sense if one considers that injustice and war often force people to flee their homes.

However, he said, "our pontifical council from the beginning has focused specifically on providing pastoral care in the field of human mobility in general, so the connection with justice and peace is less immediate than it may appear."

In addition to providing pastoral care and advocacy for refugees and migrants, the council also coordinates pastoral programs for circus workers, fishers and other seafarers, foreign students, Gypsies, pilgrims and tourists, he said.

IMMIGRATION REFORM

Calling for reform

SISTERS OF MERCY HIT THE HILL TO LOBBY ON IMMIGRATION

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The presidents of 25 regional communities of the Sisters of Mercy, including North Carolina, and representatives of several national Catholic agencies met on Capitol Hill May 4 for a day of lobbying for immigration reform legislation.

According to a press release from the Sisters of Mercy, the lobbying group delivered letters to senators calling for "humane reform" of the U.S. immigration system "to respect the rights of all persons while responding to values of family unity and community life."

The sisters — including Mercy Sister Paulette Williams, president of the Sisters of Mercy regional community of North Carolina in Belmont — were joined by representatives of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops; Network, a national social justice lobbying group; the Catholic Alliance for the Common Good; and the Catholic Legal Immigration Network.

Their lobbying efforts came as the Senate works to craft an immigration reform bill that addresses a wide range of concerns, from cracking down on illegal border crossing to debating whether to offer people already in the country illegally a chance to regularize their status.

A bill passed by the House in December addresses enforcement almost exclusively and has been widely criticized by Catholic organizations as unnecessarily harsh.

The women religious and other church representatives were pushing for legislation that includes a path to legalization, a guest worker program and dramatic changes in how applications for legal immigration are handled, among other provisions.

Senate efforts to pass a comprehensive bill in April broke down

"What possible public interest is served by deporting children who ... have or are getting a high school diploma or GED?"

— Mercy Sister Gaye Moorhead and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., has said he hopes to get a bill passed by Memorial Day.

Sister Mary Waskowiak, president of the Institute of the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas, urged senators to "use your influence and your vote to change economic and trade policies that force people to leave their countries to seek the basic needs for survival."

Other sisters described their experiences working with immigrants.

Sister Gaye Moorhead, president of the Sisters of Mercy regional community in Rochester, N.Y., talked about representing immigrants in El Paso, Texas, as an attorney.

One, Enrique, was an orphan who was brought to the United States by his aunt at the age of 8 after his mother's death, she said.

The boy was deported to Mexico two days after graduating from high school.

"What possible public interest is served by deporting children who have come here before the age of 16, not on their own volition, but with their parents; who have lived here at least five years, are of good moral character, and have or are getting a high school diploma or GED?" she asked.

known as the DREAM Act — would allow students in similar circumstances to become legal U.S. residents and enable them to seek college educations at in-state tuition rates.

Many states now disqualify illegal immigrants from in-state tuition rates, no matter how they came to be in the

IMMIGRATION REFORM

Demographic, poll date show complexities of immigration issues are U.S. citizens, but at least one parent is in the country illegally; 630,000 families where all the children are also here without legal papers; and 460,000 families in which some minor children are U.S. citizens and others are not.

Among Mexicans, who make up about half the illegal immigrant population, 48 percent are married or have a common-law spouse; more than two-thirds of that percentage live with their spouses in this country.

The Pew report noted that about one-third of illegal Mexican immigrants with families have left all their children in Mexico.

Pew also concluded that those 1.5 million children — who, like their parents, are here illegally — are vastly outnumbered by more than 3 million children who are U.S. citizens with parents who lack the proper paperwork.

To be sure, there is a large population of unattached men, according to Pew, particularly among those who have arrived since 2000. Slightly more than half — 53 percent of the 4.4 million people who arrived between 2000 and 2005 — were unmarried, compared to about 45 percent of those who came to the United States before 2000.

The study was based on census data through 2005.

Polling the people

As Congress struggles to pass an immigration bill, what has been more widely reported than such demographic information are opinion polls about the problems with immigration and how they can best be fixed.

A poll of 800 likely voters nationwide conducted March 20-22 by the Tarrance

Group and Lake Research Partners for the National Immigration Forum and the American Immigration Lawyers Association found that 75 percent favored an immigration proposal that included a plan to admit more temporary workers.

The plan would allow people already in the country to register and legalize their status without giving them priority over legal immigrants, would emphasize reuniting families and would penalize workers and employers who violate laws.

That combination of provisions mirrors the key elements supported by a range of organizations including the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, Catholic Charities USA, major unions including the Service Employees International Union and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

A poll by Time magazine of 1,004 adults conducted March 29-30 showed similar support for specific components of that plan.

It found that 78 percent support allowing illegal immigrants to legalize their status and eventually seek U.S. citizenship if they learn English, have jobs and pay taxes.

Many immigrants already pay taxes, said Franciscan Sister Andrea Inkrott, director of Hispanic ministry for the Diocese of Charlotte. Additionally, anyone who buys merchandise or owns property has paid taxes.

A Gallup/USA Today poll conducted April 7-9 of 1,004 adults found 63 percent support allowing illegal immigrants to stay in the country under certain circumstances, while another 17 percent said they should be able to stay for a limited time.

At the same time, all three polls found people strongly believe the U.S. government is not doing enough to stop illegal immigration and they want better enforcement at the border.

In the Time poll, 82 percent said the government doesn't do enough to control illegal immigration. The Gallup poll had 81 percent agreeing that "illegal immigration to the United States is out of control."

The Tarrance Group found 90 percent agreed with the statement "the immigration system is broken and needs to be fixed."

"This is all connected with the fact that there are not economic opportunities sufficient to support their families in their home countries," said Sister Inkrott. "People will continue to immigrate until the conditions at home improve."

Prevention and deportation

Opinions about how to prevent illegal immigration were somewhat less cohesive.

In Gallup's opinion poll, 84 percent said instituting tough penalties for companies that employ illegal immigrants would be somewhat or very effective. Time's survey found 71 percent favored enforcing penalties against employers.

The notion of building a wall along the Mexican border has been fairly roundly rejected by most people in the polls. A version of legislation passed by the House in December calls for building a wall along 700 miles of the 2,000 mile border.

Gallup found 48 percent think a wall would be at least somewhat effective. In the Time poll, 56 percent said they'd favor building a security fence.

Time found 47 percent support deporting all illegal immigrants. The Tarrance poll found that 79 percent think deporting all illegal immigrants currently in the country is unrealistic.

Gallup's poll found 18 percent said all illegal immigrants should be deported.

"It is my hope and prayer that all involved will work for legislation that will implement an immigration policy that will protect our national security interests, ensure the common good, and maintain respect for the law as well as respect the human rights of those who come to our country as refugees from political and economic hardship in their home countries," wrote Bishop Peter J. Jugis in a March 25 letter in support of immigration reform.

Does Hollywood get religion right?

Critics' reactions vary to studio offerings

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Does Hollywood get religion right when it makes movies? The answers are almost as diverse as the cinematic fare coming to mall multiplexes.

"Some people do their homework and get it right; other people exploit it," said Paulist Father Frank Desiderio, head of Paulist Productions and overseer of the Humanitas Prize.

"If you mean the studios, then no they don't," said Barbara Nicolosi, who runs the Act One screenwriting program for Christians who aspire to a Hollywood career.

"Studios are not in the habit of hiring people of faith to either write, direct or be in any creative capacity for projects that involve religion," she said.

"In the old days, Hollywood would bend over backward not to offend," said Harry Forbes, director of the U.S. bishops' Office for Film & Broadcasting; Forbes defined "old days" as "from the dawn of sound through the '60s."

While that era may have been inaccurate by portraying "an overly idealized view of religious types," he added, "that is preferable to a disparaging view of religion, as you often get today."

Interviews with Forbes, Nicolosi and Father Desiderio were prompted by the impending release of "The Da Vinci Code," a movie based on the best-selling novel of the same name by Dan Brown, a work criticized for its treatment of Catholic figures and institutions.

"Hollywood knew there was money to be made from striking that grand religious chord" in films such as "The Robe," "Ben-Hur," "The Ten Commandments," and Bing Crosby's "Father O'Malley" movies, "Going My Way" and "The Bells of St. Mary's," Forbes noted.

A modern example of a positive portrayal of faith, Forbes said, is "Ladder 49," a 2004 film about firefighters and the bonds they share.

It had "a fairly extraordinary, for this day and age, portrayal of a Catholic societal subculture, where everyone in that film — all blue-collar working-class firemen — were clearly Catholic. Throughout the film many of the rituals, from baptisms to weddings ... were very nicely dramatized," he said.

Father Desiderio said Barbara Hall, the Catholic woman who created "Joan of Arcadia" for CBS, was "the best recent example of someone who got it right."

He also pointed to James Cromwell's guest appearance on NBC's "ER" as a chronically ill bishop and Rita Moreno's nun-social worker on the old HBO series "Oz" as examples where Hollywood got it right.

But he said there are also significant failures, including the recent NBC drama "The Book of Daniel," in which the Episcopal clergyman of the title has an Italian Catholic priest as a friend.

"He needs a favor and he goes to the Catholic priest, and the Catholic priest goes to the Mob and gets the favor — which I found offensive, as an Italian Catholic priest," Father Desiderio said.

Nicolosi said ABC missed "the entire theological heart of the Moses story" in its recent miniseries "The Ten Commandments" with its cursory treatment of the first Passover.

"The people who make this movie, they don't believe this stuff and they don't get the most important stuff," she said.

Even the film blockbuster "The Chronicles of Narnia: The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe," which was "very good for what it was," Nicolosi said, "didn't pack the punch it could have" because the screenwriters "didn't get Aslan," a lion character viewed by readers of C.S. Lewis' novel as a Christ figure.

"We choose not to prejudge it before it comes out," Forbes said of "The Da Vinci Code." "Anyone is within their rights to get into high dudgeon about the book," he added, for its treatment of theology "couched as fact."

"The movie's going to come and go," Father Desiderio said. "I've got my opinions on Dan Brown's agenda, but there are so many people who've written anti-Dan Brown books they don't need me (commenting on it)."

Freedom is opting for God's goodness, truth

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

In my household, there are a variety of culinary tastes. I happen to like almost everything.

My youngest won't eat meat but loves cabbage. The others eat meat but wouldn't touch cabbage with a 10-foot pole. My oldest could live on bananas, chicken fingers and salad — and everyone but me has a persistent aversion to eggs, tomatoes and cheese.

The only family meal in which everyone gets to choose what they like is in a cafeteria or one of those super buffets.

In a way, a buffet is symptomatic of contemporary culture. Disposable income and a global economy have made avid consumers of a certain portion of the world's population.

Exercising the freedom to choose what one will eat, wear, watch and even whom to marry is a hallmark and an expectation for many.

The expectation of options often has been applied to "religious preferences" as well. A dizzying array of religions, sects and movements has ensured that people can choose whom, when and how they worship — or they can opt out of religious belief altogether.

Even Christians fall prey to the "pick and choose" mentality and often view their discipleship as strictly voluntary, performed on their own terms.

Today's Gospel is in complete contrast to that notion.

Jesus tells his disciples (that includes us) that ultimately he is the one doing the choosing. While baptism into Christ results from a choice that you or your parents made, it is a choice made possible and guided by the Holy Spirit for a purpose — to "bear fruit" that remains throughout the shifting seasons of economic cycles, cultural revolutions and personal taste.

St. Augustine, St. Thomas Aquinas and others in the Christian tradition taught that freedom is not the license to pursue one's personal preferences. Rather, the true liberty of the sons and daughters of God consists of opting freely for God's goodness and truth even if it is at odds with other attractive possibilities on the "menus" of our lives.

In the Easter season, the Gospel invites us not to a cafeteria but to a banquet where all are welcome to fellowship with their host, the risen Christ, and where all bring the living fruits of his love to the table.

Let the feasting begin!

Questions:

How do you exercise personal preference in your religious life? Has the pursuit of your preferences ever prevented you from "bearing the fruit" of God's love?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"It was not you who chose me, but I who chose you and appointed you to go and bear fruit that will remain" (John 15:16).

'Poseidon' remake makes minimal waves

Jacinda Barrett, Jimmy Bennett and Josh Lucas star in "Poseidon," a reasonably effective but inferior remake of 1972's luxury-liner disaster film, as a tidal wave capsizes the vessel.

The plot involves a sparring father (Kurt Russell) and daughter (Emmy Rossum), her boyfriend (Mike Vogel), a professional gambler (Lucas), a single mother (Barrett) and child, and a Latina stowaway (Mia Maestro) as they attempt to flee through the bottom of the boat.

The character setup is dispatched within minutes and once disaster strikes, director Wolfgang Petersen keeps the action going, with above-average special effects and decent performances.

A few instances of profanity and crass expressions, intense but not gruesome disaster violence, brief veiled sexual exchange, gambling and a suicide attempt.

The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

Pope completes first lap in China-Vatican relations last fall, when the Vatican's approval of three Chinese bishops led to talk of a "breakthrough," movement appeared to stall on the tracks.

The pope invited four Chinese bishops to the Synod of Bishops in October, in what seemed a promising sign. But they were not allowed to come, and four chairs sat empty in the synod hall.

Then in February, the pope named new cardinals, among them Cardinal Joseph Zen Ze-kun of Hong Kong, a sometimes sharp critic of the government. That prompted rumblings from Chinese authorities.

In March, the Vatican's top foreign affairs official, Archbishop Giovanni Lajolo, sent a positive signal when he told the Chinese press that the "time is ripe" for improvement in Vatican-China relations.

The nosedive came in late April and early May, when two Chinese bishops were ordained without papal approval. The Vatican reaction was unusually tough, calling the step a violation of religious freedom and an obstacle to improved relations.

Over the last year, hopes for Vatican-China normalization have speeded up, slowed down and looped the loop. In a sense, that's nothing new.

"For 50 years we've seen things swing from good to bad many times. This latest episode was a little surprising, because we had been able to approve four bishops over the last year without a problem," said one Vatican official, who asked not to be named.

Divisive issues

The appointment of bishops has long been the most divisive issue between China and the Vatican.

For many years, the government-approved Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association has elected its own bishops

"If it's a new way of doing things, then we'll go backward 50 years."

— a Vatican source

with government approval. Then last year, the bishop nominees were submitted for the pope's approval.

The last jointly approved bishop's appointment came in early April — which made the subsequent illegitimate ordinations all the more mysterious to the Vatican.

According to Italian Father Giancarlo Politi, a member of the Pontifical Institute for Foreign Missions and a longtime China watcher, several elements may have come into play.

First, the authorities may have wanted to send a clear message of displeasure over the recent raising of Cardinal Zen's profile.

Second, he said, Chinese Catholics need bishops. With more than 40 sees currently unfilled and others headed by very elderly prelates, the church's leaders there may feel they cannot afford to wait for papal approval on every candidate.

A third element, Father Politi said, was that whenever Vatican-China relations move significantly forward — as they appeared to do last year — a backtracking seems to occur.

"The main problem in China is still very basic: It hasn't yet decided to pass from a revolutionary regime to a more democratic one," he said.

"This impacts the church, of course, especially in the nomination of bishops, which is the crucial thing," he said.

A hard line

A Hong Kong daily quoted Cardinal Zen as saying after the first ordination April 30 that dialogue between China and the Vatican "cannot continue."

But despite the strong tone of its statement, the Vatican did not declare a rupture in communication. On the contrary, it invited Chinese authorities to "honest and constructive dialogue" to find solutions acceptable to both sides.

And although the Vatican made reference to the canonical penalty of excommunication for those ordaining and those being ordained in such cases, it deliberately left an ambiguity by suggesting that political coercion was involved. That would mean canonical penalties would not apply.

The reference to excommunication was seen by some as a tougher line taken by Pope Benedict regarding China. But in fact, the Vatican made a similar statement the day before an illegitimate ordination in China in 2000 — another year marked by a steep downturn in China-Vatican relations.

The Vatican took a hard line in its most recent statement in part because it fears this could be the start of a series of unapproved ordinations, the Vatican source said.

"We need to wait and see whether these were two isolated cases, to send some kind of message, or if it's the beginning of a new style of doing things. If it's a new way of doing things, then we'll go backward 50 years," he said.

Middle school band resonates at festival

CHARLOTTE — Two bands from Holy Trinity Catholic Middle School in Charlotte recently garnered top honors.

The concert band, consisting of seventh- and eighth-graders, and the jazz band took home plaques and trophies from the Heritage Music Festival held in Myrtle Beach, S.C., April 6-9.

The bands, the only ones representing a middle school among several high school bands, were awarded most outstanding band and the sweepstakes trophy for highest cumulative score at the event.

The awards mark the second time in three years that the bands, under band director Alan Kaufman, received top awards at national band festivals.

Weatherman Larry Sprinkle congratulates students of St. Mark School in Huntersville at an April 21 rally celebrating their raising more than $35,000 in the third annual School Walk for Diabetes April 7, benefiting the American Diabetes Association.

Last year's total of $27,000 placed St. Mark School at number three nationally and, for the second year, the school maintained its status of number one in the southeast.

The school has raised more than $78,000 in three years. Both Sprinkle and Dianne Roth, executive director of the Charlotte American Diabetes Association office, were on hand to applaud the students' achievements.

The walk program offers participating schools a percentage of the funds raised to be redeemed for physical education equipment. St. Mark School will share its funds with a Catholic school in Louisiana to help replenish equipment lost in Hurricane Katrina.

There are currently two students with Type 1 diabetes at St. Mark School.

"The lessons of this service-oriented project are many and meaningful," said Marie Kenyon, the mother of one of the students. "The entire school learns about diabetes risk factors, the importance of physical fitness, and healthy food and lifestyle choices."

'The Da Vinci Code' — a bomb about to go off

FLIMSY FILM IS HARDLY WORTH BOYCOTTING OR ATTENTION

Sometimes you can tell by the pre-release hype that a movie is going to be a bomb.

The clamor around the upcoming "The DaVinci Code" tells me that this flick is going to fall somewhere between "Police Academy 7: Mission to Moscow" and "Waterworld."

What, you haven't seen those duds? Congratulate yourself.

Much of the publicity around "The Da Vinci Code" film is built on the always-irresistible storyline of David and Goliath, with the filmmakers as David and guess-whose church as Goliath.

Take "The DaVinci Code" story that appeared in the secular media during the first week of May.

I attended a Rome conference for Catholic Church communications personnel April 28 where a Vatican official made a reference to the upcoming release of the movie.

The speech by Archbishop Angelo Amato, secretary of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, was about communicating church teaching in a media-dominated world. He made several interesting points about how the Catholic press should not take on the agenda of the secular news media. Amen to that.

Then, in what sounded like an off-hand remark, he suggested that those in the room — about 300 people — should boycott "The DaVinci Code." When pressed during a question-and-answer session, he said he would not call for all Catholics to boycott the film. I thought that was the end of it.

But the archbishop is secretary in the same congregation once run by Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, now Pope Benedict XVI. And so even though Archbishop Amato wasn't speaking for the church, his position entitled the news media to look at it differently. The media has reported stories that gave the impression that the Catholic Church's power could prevent a historically inaccurate piece of fiction from reaching the public.

In short order, the story hit the international wires with headlines like, "Vatican calls for 'Da Vinci Code' boycott," a triumph of headline over reality. The next day, when I checked e-mail in my Rome hotel, a North Carolina reporter wanted to know the Diocese of Charlotte's position on the "boycott."

It took me a while to realize this reporter's inquiry was based on an event that I had witnessed and had written off as no big deal. I used to be a reporter and I know a story when I hear one, and this one just didn't strike me as having much depth.

Catholics & the Media

DAVID HAINS
GUEST COLUMNIST

No one in this diocese is suggesting that Catholics boycott the movie. Bishop Peter J. Jugis summed up the attitude toward the movie in a recent statement:

"'The DaVinci Code' is a work of fiction. The book's author and the movie's producers have no claim to a factual basis for the story. All who read the book or view the movie should understand that they are not experiencing any eternal or divine truth, and that what they are seeing is the creation of one man's imagination.

"Answers to questions that arise from viewing the movie or reading the book can be found by reading sacred Scripture or the teachings of the Catholic Church," said Bishop Jugis.

A boycott would, of course, give reporters a story for another day, the movie would receive free publicity and more tickets would be sold. Ca-ching! But a boycott would say also that our faith in Jesus Christ and his church is somehow threatened by the whimsy of a writer with no apparent ability as a scholar.

In the past few months we have seen deadly demonstrations of protest by Muslim fundamentalists over the publication of a political cartoon. "The Da Vinci Code" depiction of Jesus hiding an illicit relationship with Mary Magdalene is insulting, but in the 22nd chapter of Mark's Gospel we see a proper response.

In it, Jesus is insulted, mocked and abused on Good Friday. He responds with silence. For the "hype masters" in Hollywood and the news media, we Catholics should do the same.

And remember, Tom Hanks may have won an Academy Award for "Forrest Gump," but he also was the star of the megadud "The Bonfires of the Vanities."

Church unity through the bishops transmits apostolic faith, says pope

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Communion with the church of Rome, specifically through the apostolic succession of bishops, is "the sign, criterion and guarantee of the uninterrupted transmission" of the faith of the apostles, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Continuing his series of audience talks about the church May 10, Pope Benedict said that in order to ensure fidelity to Christ and his word through time a Christian community needs an individual who witnesses to the message "that was entrusted to him, not invented by him."

The first individuals to fulfill the function of witness and guardian were the Twelve Apostles, who in turn chose other men to succeed them in witnessing to the truth of Christ and in guiding the Christian community, the pope said.

Although the membership, role and structure of the college of bishops "evolved progressively," the Greek word "episcopos," or bishop, already was used in reference to the second generation of the apostles' successors, the pope said.

The term refers to "one who has a view from above or who watches, watches with his heart."

Apostolic succession is not simply a matter of believing what the apostles believed, he said. The call and appointment of individual bishops must be traceable back to the apostles.

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

Very early in Christian history, he said, the successors of the apostles identified communion with St. Peter and his successors, the bishops of Rome, as a key sign of the authenticity of their succession and their role within the church.

"Apostolic succession — verified on the basis of communion with the church of Rome — is, therefore, the criterion for the permanence of the individual churches in the tradition of apostolic faith," he said.

Just as Christ called the Twelve Apostles, the pope said, he has called their successors, the bishops of the church today.

The Holy Spirit makes Jesus, the good shepherd, present in the church through those he has called to lead, Pope Benedict said.

"In the words of the apostles and their successors, it is he who speaks to us; through their hands, it is he who acts in the sacraments; in their gaze, it is his gaze that surrounds us and makes us feel loved, welcomed in the heart of God," the pope said.

God delights in you

Lord's love for us is eternal, infinite

The continuing message of this post-Easter season is clear for those who have faith:

"God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son so that everyone who believes in him ... may have eternal life" (Jn 3:16). The key to this passage is found in the word "love."

When you love someone, you do not merely love in theory, you actually take delight in loving that person. One of the most obvious characteristics of love is that the lover desires to be with the loved one, "My soul longs for you O God" (Ps 42:2).

Did you ever stop to think that God longs for you personally?

Pope Benedict XVI, in his new encyclical "God Is Love," had this to say: "I want my first encyclical to speak of the love which God lavishes upon us."

He explained that God actually woos us. He lures us so that we will leave behind everything that is counterproductive to our union with him. He wants us to abide in him: "God is love, and he who abides in love abides in God" (1 Jn 4:16).

The pope continued, "Authentic self-discovery, and indeed the discovery of God, is a journey, an ongoing exodus out of the closed, inward-looking self."

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOIR
CNS COLUMNIST

He referred to the mysterious words of Jesus: "Whoever seeks to gain his life will lose it, but whoever loses his life will preserve it" (Lk 17:33).

We know that Jesus, in his love for us, followed the path of the cross and the resurrection. Just as the grain of wheat falls to the ground and dies in order for new life to begin, so did Jesus give up his life that we might awaken to a new life of love.

He wants us to share this love with others.

First, God desires union with you. He knows you yearn for him; in fact he put that yearning in you. But as difficult as it might be for you to imagine, he has a corresponding desire to be with you. He longs for you to come to him.

Therefore, cast away any doubts you may have, and put on the indomitable will to believe in God's personal love for you. His love for you is eternal and infinite despite your unworthiness.

God sent his prophets to prepare you for the amazing revelation of his love. Zephaniah was a prophet who lived around 650 B.C. He denounced the worship of false gods and idols.

In his day the people worshiped the stars, the moon and the sun, all of which are inanimate objects incapable of love. He condemned this pagan practice, upholding the glory of the one, true God, proclaiming the pure monotheism taught by Moses, the God of love.

To those who embraced this personal God, Zephaniah promised the fullness of joy. He ended his book with a hymn of joy, which is sung jubilantly by the faithful remnant.

The passage I like best in Zephaniah is found in Chapter 3:17. It speaks poetically about God's love:

"God will exult with joy over you. ... He will renew you by his love. He will dance with shouts of joy for you, as on a day of festival" (Jerusalem Bible).

Energy crisis or crisis of imagination?

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

As I sat in gridlock, at least 100 cars and buses were around me with their engines idling. It had taken me approximately an hour to drive from the U.S. Capitol to the White House, a distance of one mile.

I wondered how many barrels of gasoline are wasted daily in similar circumstances.

Addressing the nation, President Bush said we need to depend less on oil. He should have been more imaginative and said that we need to be more visionary in conserving energy.

Among the automobiles in gridlock that day were hybrid Toyotas that shut off when standing still. Thus, gas is saved, pollution is minimized.

Perhaps skyrocketing gasoline prices will wake us up to the energy we waste. Relying on catastrophic events, however, is not the way to solve our energy problems.

A new movement that encourages us to use our imaginations to the maximum is needed. Creative thinking, not crises, is our best weapon for achieving conservation.

The simple, creative insight to have hybrid cars that shut down when traffic isn't moving now saves us countless barrels of oil each year. The brilliant insight that energy could be generated from the use of their brakes to power their electrical motors enables hybrids to get 50-plus miles per gallon of gas.

Automobiles aren't the only consumers of oil. Our energy consumption ranges from heating and cooling our homes to producing everyday goods. Ironically, the wide range of energy uses affords us a wide range of possibilities for imaginatively conserving it.

Take, for example, energy-efficient homes that employ enterprising solar systems capable of heating and cooling year around. Other homes are constructed of innovative insulating materials that are extremely efficient.

More efficient automobiles and homes are just a few examples of ways to reduce our dependency on oil. They are the result of the use of imagination — the No. 1 secret to success.

If we are to win the battle of energy efficiency, another major principle must come into play. The unleashing of imagination must begin in pre-school. At a very young age, children must be encouraged to develop an eye for imaginative conservation in situations of every kind.

Our times require imagination. The more we and our children stretch our imaginative capacities now, the more secure the future of our energy resources will be.

The great model for prisoners: 'The convict Christ'

We must take seriously conditions Jesus gave us

I have a heartwarming story to tell of a man, Michael Donofrio, who was once a prisoner and is now a friend, like a son.

Just before Easter I was set to work with Dominican Sister Ave Clark in her Heart-to-Heart Ministry at a church in Queens, N.Y. Sister Clark is someone who knows pain. She made headline news two years ago when she was hit by a runaway train in Queens.

We were bringing people together to speak of God's wondrous mercy. I asked Sister Clark if I could invite Michael, a devout Catholic who has lived a true story of redemption, to work with us. This beautiful Christ-formed nun said she would welcome him.

I met Michael some eight years ago when he was incarcerated at Green Haven Correctional Center and then later met him again when he was transferred to Fishkill, both New York state prisons where I had been doing "prison ministry work," begun after my son and daughter-in-law were murdered.

Their deaths had taught me to embrace God's love, mercy and forgiveness so that I would never become vengeful.

Going to prisons was the best place to learn if I was being truly honest in putting my trust in God.

The Bottom Line

ANTOINETTE BOSCO
CNS COLUMNIST

In both prisons, Michael spoke to me of his love of the Lord, which he really had found after meeting two remarkable Christ-like priests — Msgr. Ed Donovan at Green Haven and, at Fishkill, Father Donald Licata (who died this March 3), who guided Michael into accepting his punishment for his crime and asking God's forgiveness.

After serving 13 years, Michael was able to return to his "big Italian family" and two teenage daughters in the summer of 2005.

Michael and I became "pen pals," and in letters he strengthened me to continue the anti-violence, anti-death penalty work I do in the name of Christ Jesus.

Michael spoke to us at Sister Clark's retreat, and his words will be remembered:

"You know, life is funny, and it took me to come to prison to appreciate life," he said. "I was a bad guy at one time, and now I love where I'm going in life. I love the little things in life — to see a smile on someone's face, to look in someone's eyes and know that life can be wonderful if you walk in God's footsteps."

The same week that Michael, Sister Clark and I worked together, I had received a copy of "The Convict Christ" by Jens Soering. So providential!

Serving a life sentence, Soering has written a powerful book that puts a spotlight on the inhumane, punishment-focused criminal justice system in the United States, while telling his story of personal redemption, having found the compassion, humanity and love of Jesus.

From his prison cell, relating to the "convict Christ" who was on death row and was executed, he has looked for truth about crime and punishment in a place few people go: the Gospels.

So has Michael, and many other men and women prisoners and former prisoners I have worked with. Their search for faith in the Lord underscores why we must respect them.

To do this, we must unhardened our hearts and take seriously the conditions Jesus gave us for making this his Father's world: compassion, mercy, forgiveness and love.

Pope says Swiss Guard is still an invaluable asset after 500 years

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Half a millennium since it was founded by Pope Julius II, the Swiss Guard, whose members pledge to risk their lives for the safety of the pope, is still an invaluable asset to the Vatican, Pope Benedict XVI said as he blessed a contingent of former guards who took part in a 439-mile trek from Switzerland to Rome.

After walking for nearly a month, some 70 former guardsmen arrived in St. Peter's Square May 4 to receive the pope's blessing and pay tribute to the first 150 Swiss soldiers who came to Rome at the request of Pope Julius.

Pope Benedict praised the guards, saying their re-enactment of the arrival of the first Swiss Guards 500 years ago was "a beautiful initiative."

He said their march from Bellinzona, Switzerland, to St. Peter's Square "recalls the courage of the 150 Swiss citizens who, with valiant generosity, defended unto death the sovereign pontiff, writing an important page in the history of the church with their sacrifice."

The pope was referring to the guards who died saving Pope Clement VII's life during the sack of Rome May 6, 1527. On this anniversary each year, the Vatican swears in new guards to help remind them of the seriousness of their commitment.

Pope Benedict gave thanks to God for all the hard work and "good carried out by your predecessors and for the priceless contribution the papal Swiss Guard continues to offer the Holy See today."

Pope Benedict also presided over a special Mass May 6 in St. Peter's Basilica to mark the Guard's anniversary. In his homily, he said every pope after Pope Julius has always reaffirmed the need to maintain the special soldiers.

To be a member of the Swiss Guard "means to adhere to Christ and the church without reservations, ready to give (one's) life for this," he said.

While offering the current soldiers and veterans a "well-deserved and cordial thanks," Pope Benedict also invited them to look to the future "with courage and faithfulness."

Later that same day in St. Peter's Square, 33 new recruits for the Swiss Guard were sworn in during a ceremony attended by their families as well as former guards and Vatican officials.

One by one, each new recruit took an oath to "faithfully, loyally and honorably" serve the pope with all his strength and to sacrifice his life, if necessary, to defend the pontiff.

To help honor the world's oldest army, the pikemen and musketeers of the Honorable Artillery Company of London and the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Massachusetts — respectively, the second- and third-oldest military corps in the world — took part in the event.

They, along with a historic corps from Madrid, Spain, and another from the Swiss canton of Fribourg, marched across St. Peter's Square; many of them were wearing historic uniforms and bearing antique weaponry or playing the fife and drums.

Local city officials took part in May 4 celebrations that re-enacted the arrival of the first contingent of Swiss soldiers in Rome.

Two groups of former guards — one regiment dressed in their ceremonial uniforms, and the other in hiking gear with matching red and white sport shirts — entered Rome's ancient city walls.

A squadron of current Swiss Guard members then led the former guards through Rome's downtown streets to St. Peter's Square to receive their papal blessing and be reunited with family members.

Seven days of Swiss Guard jubilee celebrations in Rome included several concerts and fireworks.

Medical and scientific progress becomes a threat to humanity when people think they can fill in for God and tamper with creation, specifically human life, Pope Benedict XVI said.

The human embryo "must always originate from an act of love" between a man and a woman and "already be treated as a person," he said in a May 13 address to members of the Pontifical Council for the Family.

GROWING WITH A PURPOSE

Somali Bantu Musa Matan (left) is one of the refugee elders who is taking an active leadership role with the garden.

Community garden gives older refugees a 'place to call their own'

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (CNS) — On a sunny morning, refugees of all ages from Somalia, Cuba, Liberia and Sudan gathered in front of the Holy Name Church Life Center in Nashville to plant a garden.

While digging up the earth to plant vegetables, herbs and flowers, the refugees were also establishing a welcoming place of respite and purpose for their often-isolated community.

Many of the refugees "don't feel like they have a place to go outside of their home. They don't know where they belong," said Laurie Soileau, resources developer for Catholic Charities' Refugee and Immigration Services in Nashville.

Most newly arrived refugees live in apartment complexes with little or no access to a yard or land and have limited access to transportation.

The garden is an outlet that allows the refugees to "have some control over their environment, a place to call their own," Soileau said.

Catholic Charities of Tennessee resettles approximately 250 refugees each year. The refugees, who flee their home countries to escape political or religious persecution, come primarily from African and Latin American nations.

The garden is especially important for the older refugee population, who are among the most isolated, Soileau said.

"A lot of times, the older people are kind of forgotten," she said.

Much more funding and resources, such as English classes, are available to the younger refugee population who are seen to have the most potential for education and employment.

While the refugee elders may be close to retirement age, they still have the desire to work and be part of the community, Soileau said, but they don't have the language skills.

Since she joined Catholic Charities last December, Soileau has engaged the older population in a variety of activities such as yoga, painting and the gardening that "gives them a creative outlet not tied to language," she said.

A certified instructor in English as a second language, Soileau also incorporates English lessons into the seniors' weekly meetings.

While the newly planted garden is for all refugees, Soileau wants the older refugees to take a strong leadership role with it. Among other duties, they will attend monthly maintenance days and have the final say on harvesting and distributing the produce.

Musa Matan, a Somali Bantu elder who was resettled in Nashville through Catholic Charities three years ago, is eager to take an active role with the garden, including daily watering.

"He really likes to get his hands dirty and have a purpose," said Kerry Marks, program coordinator with Catholic Charities Refugee and Immigration Services.

The garden is also an opportunity for refugee elders such as Edigno Moreno, who was a farmer in his home country of Cuba, to lend their expertise to a project.

"It's nice to have crops like in my home country," he said.

While most crops integral to the refugees' diets are available commercially in local grocery and specialty stores, it is important to them to be able to grow their food themselves.

Just solutions can defeat terrorism, archbishop tells U.N. assembly

UNITED NATIONS (CNS) — Just solutions to political, social and economic problems frustrating young immigrants worldwide "can rob terrorists of the oxygen of hatred" and thwart efforts to "recruit the impressionable," the Vatican's representative to the United Nations said May 11.

Archbishop Celestino Migliore, the permanent representative of the Holy See to the international body, spoke before the General Assembly during its informal consultations on a counterterrorism strategy.

"The political, social and economic exclusion of immigrant communities stokes the frustration of young people and has led to breakdowns in order in some places; but the demand for a just solution to these questions remains a legitimate one," the archbishop said.

"By resolving such questions swiftly and justly, nations can rob terrorists of the oxygen of hatred and of grievances, real or imagined, by which they attempt to legitimize their evil deeds and recruit the impressionable," he added.

Archbishop Migliore also encouraged U.N. efforts to address bioterrorism and arms buildup and to "incorporate a cultural and religious component in its global strategy."

The Vatican nuncio called bioterrorism "a grave but seriously underaddressed threat" and said "the cost of doing nothing could far outstrip the cost of a major initiative now to strengthen public health systems' capacity to cope with such a terrible eventuality."

On weapons, he said, "it must be the common goal of states to secure, and wherever possible eliminate, nuclear, biological, chemical or radiological weapons and implement effective domestic and export controls on dual-use materials related to weapons of mass destruction."

Archbishop Migliore also spoke May 11 before the U.N. Economic and Social Council's Commission on Sustainable Development, saying that recent progress appears modest "when placed beside a sobering global picture."

Pope, in meeting with Venezuela's president, expresses concern

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI expressed his concern over the nature of reforms under way in Venezuela, specifically concerning abortion, religious instruction in public schools and the independence of Catholic media outlets.

During a May 11 private audience in the Vatican with Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, the pope underlined some of the Vatican's concerns during a closed-door encounter and in a letter he handed the president at the end of their talk.

One issue was the importance of "the protection of life from its beginning," said a statement by papal spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls.

While the country's educational reforms include giving wider access to public education, especially to the poor by building more schools and eliminating entrance fees, the pope said he was worried about moves to eliminate religious instruction from the curriculum.

The statement said the pope "underlined the need for independence for Catholic mass media" and that he reaffirmed "the Holy See's freedom to nominate bishops."

Chavez told the pope that he would take into account the Holy Father's concerns and assured him of his intention to "overcome tensions concerning people's legitimate rights," the Vatican statement said.

Venezuelan bishops and Chavez have been at odds almost since Chavez came to office in 1999.

Church officials have accused the government of trying to restrict democracy, and they supported the 2002 military-led coup against the president. Chavez has denounced church leaders as being elitist.

Human rights organizations and U.S. officials also have criticized Chavez.

At the end of the meeting, the pope gave the Venezuelan president a signed copy of his recent encyclical, "Deus Caritas Est" ("God Is Love").

Loving marriage between man, woman can benefit society, pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Only total, self-giving love based on marriage between a man and woman can form a solid enough foundation for building communities and can benefit all of society, said Pope Benedict XVI.

There is a "special urgency" today to avoid confusing marriage with "other types of union based on a weak love," he said in an address to participants attending an international congress on the family.

"Only the rock of total and indissoluble love between a man and a woman is capable of being the base for the building of a society that can be a home for all people," he said.

In a May 11 audience in the Vatican, the pope met with families and other participants attending an international congress celebrating the 25th anniversary of the founding of the John Paul II Institute for Studies on Marriage and the Family.

The May 11-13 congress was titled "Loving Human Love: The Heritage of John Paul II on Marriage and the Family." Pope John Paul founded the institute in 1981, the same year he created the Pontifical Council for the Family.

Pope Benedict said his predecessor saw the need to continue studies and promote church teaching on marriage, life and the family in order to tackle "the difficult moments that followed the publication of that prophetic and always timely encyclical" by Pope Paul VI, "Humanae Vitae."

Pope Benedict said in his encyclical, "Deus Caritas Est" ("God is Love"), that he sought to illustrate how God is showing his people the way to love others.

The image of there being one, monotheistic God "corresponds to monogamous marriage," he said.

"Marriage based on an exclusive and definitive love" for another person mirrors God's relationship with his people and vice versa: "The way of loving God becomes the measure of human love," the pope said, quoting from his encyclical.

Marriage represents the union of life and love and becomes an "authentic good for society."

Authentic love between a man and a woman in marriage becomes "a light that guides one's life to fullness, generating a society that humankind can live in," he said in his address.

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI accepted the resignation of Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick May 16 and named Bishop Donald W. Wuerl of Pittsburgh to succeed him as archbishop of Washington.

The pope also accepted the resignation of Bishop Joseph L. Imesch of Joliet, Ill., and appointed Bishop J. Peter Sartain of Little Rock, Ark., as his successor.

The changes were announced in Washington by Archbishop Pietro Sambi, apostolic nuncio to the United States.

Cardinal McCarrick, 75, has headed the Archdiocese of Washington since 2001 and previously served as archbishop of Newark and bishop of Metuchen, N.J., and as an auxiliary bishop in the New York Archdiocese.

Archbishop Wuerl, 65, has been bishop of Pittsburgh since 1988 and is known for his syndicated television program, "The Teaching of Christ," and his best-selling adult catechism of the same name.

Father Scherer, who blessed the center, was a close friend and neighbor of the late Father Tully; Orr is seen holding a photograph of Father Tully, for whom she helped care.

Approximately 25 people attended the dedication of the center, which will be used by parishioners and others for Bible study and research.

Upon his death at age 88 in June 2005, Father Tully left funds to be used toward the Bible reference center in the parish library. The first purchase for the center was the New Interpreter's Bible volumes 1-12, which includes text, commentary and reflections for each book of the Bible.

It is supplemented by reference materials including The New Jerome Biblical Commentary and The Interlinear Bible: Hebrew/Greek/English Bible.

Ordained in April 1944, Father Tully came to Greensboro from the Diocese of Brooklyn, and often celebrated Mass at St. Paul the Apostle Church. Those gathered at the center's dedication shared memories of Father Tully's sense of humor and devotion to the Eucharist.

How the world eats

Basilica parishioners experience 'hunger banquet'

ASHEVILLE — A row of tables set with white linen tablecloths and napkins, china dishes, a floral centerpiece, and a lone diner enjoying a full-course meal.

Other diners eating small portions of meat and vegetables from paper plates with plastic silverware. The majority of the diners in the room eating a humble serving of rice and a small cup of water.

Such was the "hunger banquet" at the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville May 5.

The service project of the parish's confirmation class, following guidelines set by Catholic Relief Services (CRS), the U.S. bishops' international relief agency, was to represent how inhabitants of the various countries of the world eat on a daily basis.

The dinner was "to raise our awareness of global hunger," said Rita Livezey, a member of the parish's social justice commission and CRS in Asheville.

Dinner participants drew color-coated slips that determined which countries they represented. Sharon Stosich, who enjoyed the full-course meal, had drawn a level 1 ticket, representing 10 percent of the world's population in industrialized nations, such as the United States and England.

The level 2 diners, representing about 30 percent of the world's population, enjoyed the meat and vegetables. They represented people in countries such as Russia, Poland and the Ukraine.

Most of the participants were level 3, and ate the rice and water. They represented 60 percent of the world's countries, including Bolivia, China, El Salvador, Ghana, Haiti, Peru, India, Vietnam and Thailand.

Members of the confirmation class, who served as the diner's wait staff, said they learned a lot from the service project.

"It made me realize how segregated the world is between rich and poor," said Nicole Kent.

The confirmation class donated $500 to CRS in Asheville.

parishes, three university campuses and five diocesan Catholic schools attended an overview presentation of the "Why Catholic? Journey through the Catechism" program for adults at St. Matthew Church in Charlotte May 15.

The presentation was repeated at the Catholic Conference Center in Hickory May 16.

"Why Catholic? is a reasonable plan to expand what is already happening in your parish, without a lot of extra time or cost," said Msgr. Tom Kleissler, president of RENEW International.

RENEW International is a Roman Catholic organization that fosters spiritual renewal, evangelization and the transformation of the world through parish-based small Christian communities.

RENEW International's ministries include RENEW, Campus RENEW, Why Catholic?, Theology on Tap and Healing the Body of Christ.

Nineteen archdioceses and dioceses in the U.S. currently participate in the Why Catholic? program.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis is recommending the implementation of Why Catholic? in all parishes of the Diocese of Charlotte.

Why Catholic? is based on the four pillars of the Catholic Church:

1. The profession of faith — what Catholics believe
2. The celebration of the Christian mystery — the sacraments
3. Life in Christ — walking with God
4. Christian prayer — deepening the experience of God

A significant shift

Why Catholic? seeks to address the trends of the past several decades occurring in Catholic families.

"In past generations, Catholics were 'marinated' in Catholicism," said Sister of Providence Terri Rickard, institute organizer at RENEW International. "Even if they didn't practice the Catholic faith anymore, they couldn't shake their Catholicism."

Today, only one in every 10 children who are baptized receives first Communion, Sister Rickard said. Also, many adults in their 20s and 30s don't know church teachings like their parents and grandparents.

In response to these problems, the U.S. bishops promulgated "Go and Make Disciples" (1992), "Catechism of the Catholic Church" (1994), "Our Hearts Were Burning Within Us: A Pastoral Plan for Adult Faith Formation in the United States" (1999) and "National Directory of Catechesis" (2005).

Why Catholic? fosters the goals of "Our Hearts Were Burning Within Us," the bishops' pastoral plan for adult faith formation. The Why Catholic? process is comprehensive, containing a full range of elements in both English and Spanish. It includes orientation, small community leader formation, retreat experiences, an invitation video and family-oriented bulletin inserts.

Renewal of faith

"Our faith cannot be simply transmitted by teaching," said Cris Villapando, director of diocesan faith formation programs. "It has to be internalized to survive and 'owned' to bring about conversion in the lives of people."

Such internalization works best within small Christian communities.

The prime purpose of faith formation is first to awaken people's faith and second is to teach the faith, said Sister Rickard. Why Catholic? provides training in evangelization and faith formation for adults of all ages and education levels in small group settings.

"(People) will be able to say, 'This is why I'm Catholic,' and share or explain those reasons to others," she said.

Why Catholic? is designed to meet in six-week sessions, twice a year, for four years. Each year an aspect of Catholic life is explored in small communities.

Why Catholic? offers parishes another way of serving the Catholics in their community, not just those who regularly attend Mass. It was developed for use by any size parish, even those with small budgets, Sister Rickard said.

"On numerous occasions in parish work, I have encountered adults who feel inadequately prepared to defend or discuss their faith," said Father John Putnam, judicial vicar and pastor of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury.

"It is easy to lament the situation, but Why Catholic? actually provides a means to begin addressing the problem," he continued. "Anything that we pastors can do to assist our people to embrace their faith more completely is certainly worth exploring."

Fifth-graders enjoy ballroom dance at Asheville Catholic

ASHEVILLE — The beat of Latin music recently filled Asheville Catholic School's gymnasium.

Andrew Weatherly's fifth-grade class practiced the mambo during a weeklong Latin dance residency in March. The course was based on a 10-week ballroom dance program utilized in more than 60 public schools in New York City and featured in the documentary film, "Mad Hot Ballroom."

Under the direction of Cuban native Nelson Reyes, an instructor with the Asheville Contemporary Dance Theatre, the fifth-graders studied the mambo, building confidence, stamina and skill.

"I thought it would be really boring, but it was fast and exciting and not boring at all," said student Patrick Wilson.

Many of his classmates agreed, although some admitted that learning the steps was not easy.

"Going through the tunnel was my favorite part," said Megan Cavanini, referring to a step when the students formed a human tunnel and went through it in pairs.

"I had expected it to be fun, and it

The residency culminated with the students demonstrating their new mambo techniques March 31. Physical education teacher Bonnie Vess assisted with the dance techniques, while Spanish teacher Ester Slater worked with students on Cuban poetry for the demonstration.

Susan Ford, Catholic schoolteacher, dies

HUNTERSVILLE — Susan Ford, a fourth-grade teacher at St. Mark School in Huntersville, died May 10.

A memorial Mass was celebrated at St. Mark Church May 15. Interment was at Mount Zion Cemetery in Cornelius.

Ford is survived by husband Mike, marketing director for Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools; children Matthew, Todd and Victoria; and grandson Andrew.

For Ford, teaching was not a career but a ministry.

Over the past 13 years, she dedicated her love and energy to Catholic schools.

"She was the most dedicated teacher. Her goal was that every student learned; she was determined to make that happen, and she didn't compromise to anybody," said Deborah Butler, principal of St. Mark School.

"She was a teacher who inspired and had the ability to make every child feel special," she said.

the memorial stone in St. Peter's Square would remind visitors of that "dramatic event" that left his predecessor near death.

The white stone was laid into the pavement where Pope John Paul was riding in his open jeep May 13, 1981, when Turkish assailant Mehmet Ali Agca shot him in the hand and lower abdomen.

The memorial recalled the date of the shooting in Roman numerals.

A similar marker was placed inside the Vatican at the entrance to the Vatican's health center, where the pope received initial medical care before being rushed to a Rome hospital.

Prophetic message

A statue of Our Lady of Fatima is carried in procession from Castel Sant'Angelo in Rome to St. Peter's Square at the Vatican May 13. Thousands of pilgrims marked the anniversary of the first apparition of the Virgin Mary to three children at Fatima, Portugal, in 1917 and also the 25th anniversary of the May 13, 1981, assassination attempt on Pope John Paul II's life.

Portugal for the occasion and brought by helicopter to the pilgrimage assembly site. Pilgrims then carried it in procession to the square.

The shooting took place on the feast of Our Lady of Fatima, and Pope John Paul always credited Mary with saving his life.

Pope Benedict recalled the late pope's special devotion to Mary in a midday talk May 14. Addressing thousands of people from his apartment window above St. Peter's Square, he said Pope John Paul had always felt that Mary's "maternal hand" had miraculously saved him from death.

The late pope's entire pontificate was marked by the Marian apparitions to three children in Fatima, Portugal, in 1917, and by what Mary foretold in her messages to the young visionaries, Pope Benedict said.

"The message she gave them, in continuity with the message of Lourdes, was a strong call to prayer and conversion," the pope said.

"That is a truly prophetic message, considering that the 20th century was afflicted by unprecedented destruction caused by wars and totalitarian regimes, as well as by extensive persecution against the church," he said.

The pope prayed that Mary would continue to watch over the church and all humanity, especially families, mothers and children.

Fatima's legacy

Carmelite Sister Lucia dos Santos, the last of the three Fatima visionaries, died Feb. 13, 2005, in her cloistered convent in Coimbra, Portugal, at the age of 97.

She was later buried alongside her two cousins, Blessed Francisco and Jacinta Marto, at the Shrine of Our Lady of Fatima in Portugal. More than 100,000 people gathered at the shrine to pray and witness the burial.

On May 13, 1917 — when Lucia was 10 years old, Francisco was 9 and Jacinta was 7 — the children claimed to have seen the Blessed Virgin Mary at Fatima, near their home.

The apparitions continued once a month until October 1917 and later were declared worthy of belief by the Catholic Church.

In 2000 Pope John Paul beatified Sister Lucia's cousins, who died as children.

In 1984, he had the bullet fragment that was removed from his body placed in the crown of the Marian statue at the Fatima shrine.

Pro-life officials see signs of hope in latest polls on abortion

BY NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — For the first time since the Harris Poll began measuring support for the 1973 U.S. Supreme Court decision that removed most state restrictions on abortion, fewer than half of all Americans said they favor Roe v. Wade.

Even though the Harris question erroneously stated that Roe v. Wade legalized abortion only in the first three months of pregnancy, only 49 percent said they supported the law and 47 percent said they opposed it.

With a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points, the responses were almost equal.

In earlier years, support for Roe v. Wade in the Harris surveys had ranged from 52 percent to 65 percent.

Roe and its companion decision, Doe v. Bolton, legalized abortion virtually on demand through all nine months of pregnancy.

Shifting opinions

Deirdre McQuade, director of planning and information in the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities, said the Harris Poll released May 4 concurs with other recent surveys in showing that "public opinion has moved progressively away from supporting unqualified access to abortion."

"This is a real sign of hope for both women and their unborn children," she said in a statement.

Maggi Nadol, Catholic Social Service's Respect Life director in the Diocese of Charlotte, agreed.

"This is a hopeful sign that Americans are realizing we can and should be able to offer women something better than abortion," said Nadol.

"Those experiencing an unplanned pregnancy or facing hardship during pregnancy are in need of compassion, understanding and assistance. Abortion is not the answer," she said.

McQuade noted that an April survey by the polling company found that 54 percent of respondents support abortion only in cases of rape, incest or to save the life of the mother and another 21 percent backed it only in the first three months of pregnancy.

Those opinions are "a far cry from the abortion license established by Roe v. Wade, which allows abortion for virtually any reason throughout the nine months of pregnancy," she said.

"We expect that Americans will continue to trend pro-life as they learn more about abortion and its impact on women, men and society," she said.

A Zogby poll in March also found majority support for abortion regulations such as informed consent laws and parental notification laws for women under 18, McQuade noted.

The Harris Poll, conducted by telephone April 4-10 among 1,016 adult Americans, also asked whether respondents expected Roe v. Wade to be overturned by the Supreme Court and whether laws should make it easier or more difficult to get an abortion.

About one-third (32 percent) said they thought the decision would be overturned, while 63 percent said it would remain unchanged and 5 percent said they were not sure or refused to answer.

Forty percent of the respondents said they backed laws making it more difficult to get an abortion, 15 percent said it should be made easier to get an abortion, 40 percent said there should be no change and the rest said they were not sure.

Asked specifically about a South Dakota law that would ban all abortions, except to save the woman's life, if Roe were overturned, 44 percent said they supported the law and 52 percent said they opposed it. The rest were not sure or declined to answer.

Criticizing contraception

In a separate statement May 3, McQuade disputed the claim that widespread access to contraception lowers abortion rates, as stated in "Abortion in Women's Lives," a recent report by the Guttmacher Institute.

"Guttmacher's own data show there is no correlation between the two," she said. "States ranking highest for access to contraceptive services, including California and New York, also rank highest in abortion rates."

"Others that Guttmacher considers weak in contraceptive services, such as Kansas and the Dakotas, have among the lowest abortion rates in the country," she said.

Sharon Camp, president and CEO of the New York-based Guttmacher Institute, said the report showed that "wealthier women have quick, convenient access to contraceptives and safe, early abortions, while poor women are less able to prevent pregnancies through contraceptive and are then forced to jump over a series of obstacles in order to obtain an abortion."

But McQuade said states that had reduced their abortion rates did so in part "by choosing not to subsidize abortion, and ensuring informed consent for women and parental involvement for minors seeking abortions — policies which the Guttmacher report demands be rescinded."

Contributing to this story was Editor Kevin E. Murray.

Making 'people for life'

Black Catholic life group pledges to raise abortion awareness in June

NEW YORK (CNS) — For the fourth year in a row, the National Black Catholic Apostolate for Life has designated June as "abortion and all acts of violence awareness month."

The theme for the 2006 observance is "Jesus the Giver of Life — Make Us a People for Life," said Franciscan Father Jim Goode, president of the New York-based apostolate.

"We will witness the sacredness of life in all our churches, institutions, national black Catholic conferences, summer family reunions, festivals, church trips and neighborhood gatherings," Father Goode said in a statement.

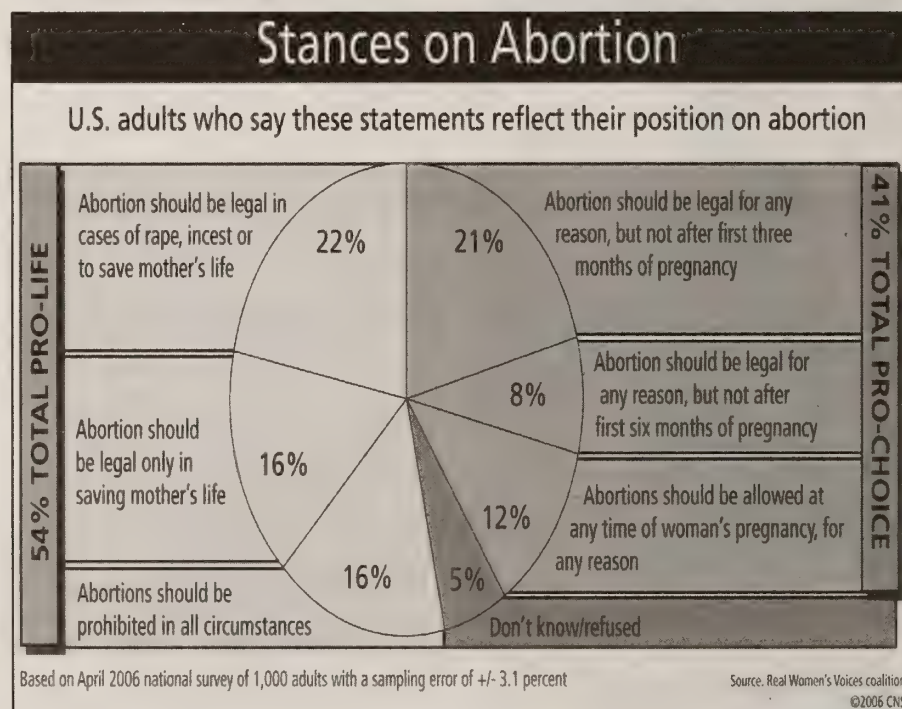

"Wherever our people will assemble during the month of June and throughout the summer months," a representative of the National Black Catholic Apostolate for Life "will be there praying, proclaiming and mobilizing African-Americans to choose life and help others choose life," he added.

Father Goode said June was chosen because it is the month of the Sacred Heart, as well as the month in which the feast day of St. Charles Lwanga and the Ugandan martyrs falls.

The apostolate's board of consultants "has fully embraced this pro-life awareness project," the organization said in a news release.

"Our mission as black Catholics for life during this awareness campaign is to go from heart to heart, soul to soul, life to life, and invite our African-American sisters and brothers to join us in choosing life," said Redemptorist Father Glenn Parker of Richmond, Va., a board member.

Beverly A. Carroll, executive director of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for African-American Catholics and a founding board member, said the success of the 2005 campaign "has given us renewed enthusiasm."

Science that tampers with human life threatens humanity, pope warns bioethics "becomes a threat when man loses sense of his limits and, basically, claims to supersede God the creator," Pope Benedict said.

Council members met May 11-13 at the Vatican to discuss the achievements, challenges, and current and future projects of the department founded 25 years ago by Pope John Paul II.

Two major themes under discussion at the council's plenary assembly were the sanctity of life and marriage.

Family and faith

Procreation outside the loving act between a man and woman bonded in marriage not only ignores God's plan for creation, it degrades the human body and turns it into "merchandise, a plain thing," Pope Benedict said.

He praised unmarried men and women, especially young people who were "rediscovering the value of chastity, which appears more and more as a sure guarantee of authentic love."

The pope then urged married Christian couples to be open to life and show "with courageous coherence that procreation is the fruit of love."

He said sometimes it seemed that families are afraid of "life, paternity and maternity."

"It is necessary to give them back

"It is necessary to give them back confidence so that they can continue to fulfill their noble mission of procreation in love."

confidence so that they can continue to fulfill their noble mission of procreation in love," he said.

More couples having more children would help "stimulate politicians and lawmakers to safeguard the rights of the family," he said.

The family is under threat by laws trying to give civil unions, which reject the obligations of marriage, the same rights as married couples, he said.

Some governments are trying to come up with a new definition of marriage by legalizing homosexual unions and allowing gay couples to adopt children, he added.

He urged families to stay united and overcome the difficulties that often lead to separation and divorce, which can have negative effects on children.

Patience, sacrifice and understanding as well as prayer and receiving the Eucharist can help couples "remain faithful to their vocation," he said.

Changing society

Archbishop Elden F. Curtiss of Omaha, Neb., who attended the council's plenary assembly, said the family based on marriage between a man and a woman is "fundamental to society," not just the church.

He told Catholic News Service May 12 that the "secular culture tends to look at everything from the point of view of personal rights and personal disposition, and somebody has to say 'Well, what about the common good ... what happens when you undermine marriage?'"

Another assembly participant, Supreme Knight Carl Anderson of the Knights of Columbus, noted that, as some states start to limit a woman's access to abortion, social programs and services that support women and their pregnancies need to be set up or bolstered.

He told CNS that this is reflected in the pope's encyclical, "God Is Love" ("Deus Caritas Est"), in that even if the United States is able to restrict or overturn Roe v. Wade "you still need room for charity."

"How does one look at the whole question of pregnancy in a post-Roe culture" and help women with unplanned pregnancies? he asked.

Church officials criticize Colombian court ruling legalizing abortion

BOGOTA, Colombia (CNS) — Catholic Church officials have criticized a Colombian Constitutional Court decision legalizing abortion in three circumstances.

The court ruled May 11 that abortion was legal in cases of rape or serious congenital malformation or when the pregnancy threatens the woman's life or health. Until the ruling, Colombia, Chile and El Salvador were the only American nations that prohibited abortion in all circumstances.

Colombian Cardinal Alfonso Lopez Trujillo, head of the Pontifical Council for the Family at the Vatican, called the ruling "a very sad piece of news."

Church officials in Colombia said all those who promote abortion, including the five high court members who voted in favor of the legalization, would be excommunicated.

Two of the high court's members responded by asking the church to respect the decision and reminded church leaders that Catholicism ceased to be Colombia's official religion in 1991.

The newspaper El Tiempo reported that Archbishop Juan Sarasti Jaramillo of Cali called the decision "terrifying" and "a license for mothers to kill their own children."

The church had campaigned against legalizing abortion, holding rallies and collecting millions of signatures before the court decision.

Polls have consistently shown that most Colombians, about 80 percent of whom are Catholic, support legal abortion in cases of rape, when the fetus has serious malformations and when the pregnancy threatens the woman's life.

A survey conducted after the decision confirmed this, with more than 60 percent of respondents in favor of the decision.

However, surveys also have shown that most Colombians oppose legalizing abortion in all cases.

A clandestine abortion industry has flourished in Colombia, and an estimated 300,000 to 400,000 women have abortions annually. Abortion rights advocates have said that botched abortions are a principal cause of maternal mortality.

Studies about content in video games intended for young users has prompted a Catholic congressman to call on the video-game industry to improve its ratings systems.

Video game industry asked to improve ratings system on games

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Multiple studies have been conducted about content in video games related to violence, sexual themes and profanity that goes unlabeled on the games' packaging, even for games intended for the youngest users.

The latest such study has prompted a Catholic congressman, Rep. Joe Baca, D-Calif., to call on the video-game industry to improve its ratings systems and give parents "clear, accurate information that they can understand" so they know what video games are appropriate for their children.

Meanwhile, a video game on making peace won a prize during a huge video-game exposition in Los Angeles.

Results of a new study released by the Harvard School of Public Health's Kids Risk Project found that 81 percent of video games rated "M" for mature contained sex, profanity, violence or other objectionable content not labeled on the game box.

"Parents and physicians should recognize that popular M-rated video games contain a wide range of unlabeled content and may expose children and adolescents to messages that may negatively influence their perceptions, attitudes and behaviors," the study concluded.

A previous study of games rated "T" for teens found nearly half of the games in a random sample contained unlabeled content and those rated "E" for everyone also had a considerable amount of violent content.

Baca, a leading critic of the video-game industry for its marketing of violent and sexually explicit material to children, decried the study's findings at an April 28 press conference in Washington.

"Violent and sexually explicit video games are not merely a modern form of entertainment; they have profoundly harmful impacts on children who use them," said Baca.

"Because the consequences are so serious, we must make sure parents have accurate information about video games," he said.

Baca and Rep. Tom Osborne, R-Neb., both of whom co-chair the Congressional Sex and Violence in the Media Caucus, wrote a letter with Rep. Frank Wolf, R-Va., to the Entertainment Software Review Board, the video-game industry's self-governing body, asking the board to meet with caucus members and fix the rating system.

Baca is a founder of the caucus.

Elizabeth Carll, chair of the American Psychological Association's interactive media committee, said at the press conference, "Video games may increase learning more than films and TV because the player is an active participant who identifies with a violent character, the violent acts can be repeated many times, and the violent behavior is often rewarded with the winner being the person who kills and destroys the most."

In Los Angeles, in a contest organized by the University of Southern California's Center on Public Diplomacy, a cross-cultural game about the Israel-Palestine conflict called "Peacemaker," and designed by graduate students from Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh, won an award May 8.

It was presented at the Electronic Entertainment Expo in Los Angeles, the annual trade show for the $30 billion industry.

According to the Reuters news agency, the contest challenged designers to modify popular games or create one of their own to include messages of global peace and friendship.

In "Peacemaker" players are Israelis and Palestinians who negotiate dangerous situations.

Other finalists included "Exchanging Cultures," in which diplomats explore new countries, and "Hydro Hijinks," a quiz game about international water issues and conflicts over water rights.

We are to obey, not tempt, God

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Since most folks' experience of the supernatural comes primarily in the context of daily life and seldom is talked about, these verses in Mark are often troublesome to people. The Gospel is confirmed in signs and wonders.

How can that be in our sophisticated and secularized modern age?

While I understand people being taken aback by stories associated with cults that handle snakes or do other outlandish things to "prove" the validity of the Gospel commands, such cultic interpretations of the text here are not bound up with the original intent.

Handling poisonous snakes in religious ceremonies is more analogous to taking Satan up on his dare and jumping from the rooftop because God has promised to protect his chosen ones.

Though it doesn't have to happen this way when the good news of God's redemptive love is proclaimed, it sometimes does.

In 1982, my wife and I visited Catholic charismatic communities in El Paso, Texas, and Juarez, Mexico, for a story I was writing for New Covenant magazine.

We were told how, a few years before, an El Paso prayer group, led by Jesuit Father Rick Thomas, had decided to take quite literally the Gospel command to give a dinner for those who were not their friends, family and acquaintances, but the poor.

Together, several of them set out on Christmas Day for the dump at Juarez where two warring communities of the poorest of the poor scavenged for discarded metal scraps and bottles to resell to recyclers. Stories of their shared meal tell of the beginnings of a community proclaiming the Gospel to the poor and dispossessed of these two borderland communities.

One participant later recounted watching as a ham failed to grow smaller as slice after slice was pared off for the gathering poor of the dump community.

The two warring factions came together to share in the feast and sing simple Christmas carols. Thereafter they began to learn to work together, eventually taking over the recycling business themselves, cutting out the middle man and increasing the return on their labor in a miracle of both peacemaking and economics.

And why did all of this happen? Not as the result of tempting God, but of obeying him with the signs and wonders following the proclamation.

A NOVEL FOR 'BRAINGLESS PEOPLE'

Head of Opus Dei says 'The Da Vinci Code' exploited his organization

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ROME — The head of Opus Dei said "The Da Vinci Code" had exploited his organization and launched "grotesque" accusations against the Catholic Church.

Bishop Javier Echevarria Rodriguez said the novel's author, Dan Brown, had joined a long line of critics who attack Opus Dei in order to make points against the faith.

"That imaginative man made a profit on us — and not only in dollars — like so many others who attack us. Following the teachings of our father, we pray with the same fervor for those who praise us and those who defame us," Bishop Echevarria said.

The bishop made the comments in an interview published by the Italian newspaper Corriere della Sera May 12, a week before the May 19 worldwide release of the film based on Brown's novel.

In the novel, Opus Dei, a personal prelature, is portrayed as a power-hungry and sinister organization whose members are willing to murder in order to obtain ancient secrets about the church.

Bishop Echevarria said he had not read the book, but had only paged through it.

"I don't have time to waste on little novels for brainless people," he said.

He said the book should not be rejected for what it says about Opus Dei, which he said are "the usual things that make us laugh."

"What saddens me are the grotesque fantasies about Our Lord and our holy mother church. They can say what they want about (Opus Dei), but they shouldn't curse the faith," he said.

The bishop said he thought Brown and other critics of Opus Dei took aim at Opus Dei because of "our attachment to the pope, our fidelity to the church and our rigor for the orthodoxy of the faith."

"They attack us in order to attack these realities," he said.

In the novel, a great deal of attention is paid to Opus Dei's U.S. headquarters in New York City. Bishop Echevarria said the building, reported to cost $47 million, simply reflects the vocation of Opus Dei's 85,000 lay members — to be a spiritual force in the real world.

"Our vocation is to call everyone to sanctify themselves through work. We couldn't avoid being present in the professional capital of the world, New York," he said.

A dull decoding

'Da Vinci Code' draws laughs from journalists at press screening

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

CANNES, France — Toward the end of the movie "The Da Vinci Code," the main character, Robert Langdon, tells his sleuthing partner, Sophie Neveu: "You are the last living descendent of Jesus Christ."

That line, meant to be the dramatic apex of the film, drew laughs from many of the approximately 900 journalists who viewed the film's first press screening May 16 at the Cannes Film Festival.

The derisive laughter, along with widely critical comments from reporters afterward, summed up the Cannes press reaction to the much-heralded launch of the movie. When the credits ran, silence and a few whistles drove home the response.

The movie sticks to most of the book's controversial religious elements, while softening some of the edges.

Directed by Ron Howard and starring Tom Hanks, it faithfully depicts the novel's story of intrepid American "symbolist" Langdon, who follows a coded trail leading to a supposedly age-old secret: that Christ was not necessarily divine, that he was married to Mary Magdalene and that their descendants survive today.

The church is the bad guy in this conspiracy-theory version of Christianity, and is depicted as suppressing all evidence of Jesus' alleged marriage.

But one striking difference about the movie is that it lacks anything resembling the famous "fact" page that prefaced the novel, in which author Dan Brown claimed that "all descriptions of artwork, architecture, documents, and secret rituals in this novel are accurate."

The film doesn't make any claim to accuracy of any kind — artistic, historical, religious or biblical.

Brown's preface also made a point of saying the Priory of Sion, the novel's organizational keeper of the secret, was real — even though it was unmasked as a fraud years ago.

The film keeps the Priory of Sion as the protagonist of the mystery, but — unlike the book — has Langdon protest at one point that the priory was a known hoax.

Colombia Pictures noted that while Brown "contends" the Priory of Sion was real, the documents he cited were proven to be forgeries.

All this tends to underline that the movie is a work of fiction, and to deflate some of the historical assertions that irritated critics of the book.

While the movie's portrayal of the Catholic Church is distinctly unflattering, its treatment of the Catholic organization Opus Dei is particularly negative.

The novel placed Opus Dei in the middle of the church's nefarious efforts to keep secret the "truth" about Christ, and had a cruel Opus Dei member commit several murders in the process.

In the book, Opus Dei's fictional leader, Bishop Manuel Aringarosa, is a somewhat unwitting figure in the machinations. In the film, however, the bishop operates with Machiavellian ruthlessness.

The sicko murderer, Silas, is a caricature not only of Opus Dei but of religious sentiment in general. A typical sequence: he crosses himself and says, "God, give me strength"; he pitilessly murders a nun; he prays over her body; he crosses himself; he whips himself bloody as he stands naked in his room; he crosses himself; he phones his superior for further instructions.

Unlike the book, the movie keeps its distance from the Vatican. Instead, unidentified prelates in a sinister "Council of Shadows" pull strings in order to cover up the secret life of Jesus. Their secret meeting room is outfitted with a billiard table.

The film retains several of the claims considered outrageous by many Catholic critics: that the Bible as we know it was collated by the "pagan" emperor Constantine; that alternative gospels recounting the real life of Jesus were suppressed; and that church ritual borrows heavily from pagan mystery religions.

But the film puts these and other claims into the mouth of Leigh Teabing, the story's true villain, and at several points has the hero, Langdon, skeptically questioning these assertions.

That too is a change from the book, and adds a veneer of even-handedness to the story.

The movie's historical flashbacks illustrating these supposedly dark chapters of church history were so overdone that they provoked catcalls during the first Cannes screening. The pandemonium-in-vestments version of the Council of Nicea may especially amuse church historians.

Early reviews from the Cannes screening gave the movie decidedly low marks. Its biggest sin, according to many critics, was that it was dull.

The movie was to be formally presented at the festival May 17 and was to open in theaters worldwide two days later.

personnel because there has not been an adequate public discussion about its implications, especially for the treatment of migrants."

In his first such nationwide address on a domestic policy matter, Bush gave his most explicit support to date for a program that would provide a way for most of the estimated 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants in the country to legalize their status.

He proposed requiring them to pay a fine and back taxes, learn English and hold a job for an undefined set number of years to be allowed to stay in the country.

Much of the president's speech focused on border enforcement.

He said up to 6,000 members of the National Guard would be sent to the border states of California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas, where they would assist the Border Patrol in jobs such as intelligence analysis, installation of fences and barriers, building roads and providing training.

In his statement, issued in Washington prior to Bush's address, Bishop Barnes reiterated the U.S. bishops' position that "the real solution to the immigration crisis lies in a comprehensive approach to the problem.

"This approach must include a long-term strategy to address the root causes of flight, such as combating poverty in sending countries," he said.

"It also must include comprehensive reform of our nation's immigration laws which features an opportunity to earn citizenship for the undocumented in our country and the creation of legal avenues for migration for migrants to work and join families in a safe, orderly, and humane manner," the bishop said.

"We are hopeful that the president also will commit himself to these elements as part of a comprehensive immigration reform bill," he added.

The bishop said immigration is an issue of "urgent national priority." He

Work is divine activity

People should be fairly paid for fair work

During the debate about immigration, the argument is frequently made that immigrants do work no one else wants.

Picking tomatoes, processing chickens, cleaning motel rooms and tarring roofs typify the jobs that many immigrants do. Classified as low skill, these jobs usually pay low wages and are considered relatively unattractive work.

Ordinary Americans do the same kinds of work, but on a different scale. Most families clean their own toilets, mow their lawns, prepare food, repair their homes and occasionally do a variety of unpleasant tasks around the house. Work, per se, is not dignified or undignified, but rather work derives its nobility from how it is structured and compensated.

From a scriptural perspective, work is divine activity.

God worked: "Since on the seventh day God was finished with the work he had been doing, he rested ..." (Genesis 2:2).

Jesus refers to redemption as work: "The works that the Father gave me to accomplish ... testify on my behalf that the Father has sent me" (John 5:36).

Yet, if work becomes structured oppressively, it dehumanizes and calls for relief: "I have witnessed the affliction of my people in Egypt and have heard their cry of complaint against their slave drivers ... therefore I have come down to rescue them" (Exodus 3:7 & 8).

God's work is creating and redeeming, and we are invited to participate in that work — to the extent we use our creativity and talents, we help create society and contribute to the common good; to the extent we promote teamwork and community, we redeem co-workers from selfishness and isolation.

For people of faith, the challenge remains to structure work so it helps workers become more human and reflects more closely divine activity.

For many low-income workers, however, the work environment reflects more the oppression of ancient Egypt than the milk and honey of the Promised Land. Low-wage workers — immigrants, single mothers and members of minorities — face daily challenges to self-esteem, and with meager pay. Jobs are "dumbed down" to minimize training costs, and hours are pared from full time to save benefit costs.

Barbara Ehrenreich reflected in her book, "Nickel and Dimed," on her experience doing six low-wage jobs. One of her conclusions deals with maintaining self-respect when management has the right to search your purse for pilfered goods, to demand drug testing for job interviews and to restrict free speech on the job.

She cites the AFL-CIO, the principal U.S. labor federation, estimates that 10,000 workers each year are fired for participating in union-organizing drives.

Yet, most Americans are fair-minded. Ehrenreich cites a poll conducted in 2000 by Jobs for the Future, an employment research firm, that found 94 percent of Americans agree: "People who work full-time should be able to earn enough to keep their families out of poverty."

While economists have several strategies to address the plight of the working poor, raising the minimum wage offers a logical first step. Because 1997 was the last time the federal minimum wage was raised, 17 states plus Washington, D.C.; Santa Fe; and San Francisco have raised their own minimum wages above the federal $5.15 per hour.

Studies about the two raises of the federal minimum wage during the 1990s show: 1) wages of the lowest wage workers rose; 2) systematic job loss did not occur; 3) a slight reduction in poverty took place; and 4) through a "spillover effect" the workers earning slightly above minimum also benefited.

People of faith affirm the dignity of workers and oppose reducing them to a mere commodity. After all, as writer Wendell Berry asks, "What are people for?"

Pope says Catholics must trust in God's plans for the world

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Like St. Peter, Catholics must have the courage and humility to trust that Jesus is leading his church and that God has his own plans for transforming the world, Pope Benedict XVI said.

At his May 17 general audience, with some 45,000 people gathered in St. Peter's Square, the pope focused his remarks on the personality of the "prince of the apostles."

Speaking without a text at the end of his prepared remarks, the pope said, "It seems to be that the various conversions of Peter — his whole being — are a great consolation and lesson for us."

Like St. Peter, he said, "we desire God and we, too, want to be generous, but we also expect God to be strong in the world and transform the world immediately according to our own ideas and the needs we see."

However, the pope said, "God chooses a different path: God chooses the path of transforming hearts in suffering and humility."

In his main text, Pope Benedict said the Gospels make clear that St. Peter was slow to understand that Jesus' role as Messiah was not to use power to bring social or political change.

And when Jesus told the disciples that he would suffer and die to redeem humanity, the pope said, St. Peter "was scandalized and protested."

"This is the great alternative that we, too, must keep learning: to give priority to one's own expectations, pushing Jesus away, or to accept Jesus in the truth of his mission and set aside expectations that are too human," he said.

Pope Benedict said, "Peter says to us: 'You think you have the recipe for the transformation of Christianity, but it is the Lord who knows the way.'"

St. Peter's lesson for Christians of all time, the pope said, is that they always must trust Jesus because he is the way, the truth and the life.

At the end of the audience, Pope Benedict greeted Archbishop Tadeusz Kondrusiewicz of Moscow with a big smile and warm embrace. The archbishop brought 150 pilgrims from Moscow to visit the Vatican and Rome.

The pilgrims, forming the largest group to date organized by the Catholic Church in Russia, brought Pope Benedict an 18th-century Russian icon and handmade liturgical vestments.

Disguised blessings

I agree with Tony Magliano's column ("The Da Vinci Code": Blessing in disguise?" May 5). "The Da Vinci Code" and the gospel of Judas ("Catholic leaders decry gospel of Judas," May 5) offer teaching moments for the Catholic Church.

I recently returned from a pilgrimage to southern France. In Provence, I visited the cave of La Sainte Baume, where, legend has it, Mary Magdalene spent the last 25 or so years of her life as a hermit.

An old monk said, "Mary Magdalene may have been here and Mary Magdalene may not have been here. But Mary Magdalene is here."

So I sat silently in that dim, damp cave in the presence of that holy woman who was God's apostle and a symbol for the bride of Christ — the community of the faithful.

That Jesus is a bridegroom is stated in the New Testament (in the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John), so Jesus must have a bride — without a doubt, that bride is the people of God.

Seek out, embrace and affirm the truth.

The 'tragic triangle'

We can help stop the perpetrators of abortion

Violence done against human beings involvesthree types of people: the Perpetrator, the Victim and the Observer. This is known as the "tragic triangle."

In child abuse, the child is the victim, the abuser is the perpetrator and those who come to know of the abuse as it is going on are the observers. Abortion also is a tragic triangle. The abortionist, in collusion with the parent(s), is the perpetrator, the child is the victim and the observers are all the rest of us.

Many may conclude that the perpetrator is the most guilty of the three. Yet in most tragic triangles, the observers carry the greatest guilt. They are more detached from the tragedy and usually have more objectivity to assess the evil and the opportunities for stopping it.

Psychiatrist Philip Ney points out, "The Observers in tragic triangles have a greater responsibility, primarily because they can be more objective, but also because they often gain by allowing the tragedy to start and to continue" (The Centurions' Pathway, p.25).

Regarding abortion, he further notes, "The Observers are just as guilty, [and their] self-justification is more deeply entrenched and their rationalization more difficult to undo. 'I personally don't approve, but clean, clinical terminations are much better than back street abortions'" (p.44).

One of the key responsibilities of the observer in the abortion tragic triangle is to reach out to the abortionist.

Ney, who has worked with many abortionists to lead them out of the abortion industry, comments, "The abortionist in one way or another is often appealing to the observers. 'Surely somehow, some way you could stop this. If you really persisted you could have stopped me from doing abortions. I may have resisted you, but I would have listened. At least, I think I could have been influenced'" (p.25).

Testimony of former abortionists confirms this. Former abortion clinic operator Carol Everett relates the story of a preacher who came to visit her at her clinic:

"Through a long period of discussions, he told me that God had asked him to come into this situation for 30 days, and that there was indeed someone in there that the Lord wanted out. And we left in 27 days" (Testimony at Meet the Abortion Providers Conference, Chicago).

Former abortionist Tony Levatino had a patient who witnessed to him regularly before he stopped doing abortions. He relates, "I can tell you that if enough women come to you and say, 'I think you are a great doctor. We have gotten along very well, but I can't go to you anymore because you perform abortions,' this can have a real effect.

"As I said, to most of the average gynecologists in their offices, abortion is not a big part of their business. If they see another part of their business going out the door because of it, it will make it cost them more than it's worth" (Testimony at Meet the Abortion Providers Conference, Chicago).

Observers have the power to stop the perpetrators.

GOD'S LOVE CONTINUES TO INSPIRE ALL TO ENHANCE WORLD

As I was flying back to Chicago to attend my seminary high school reunion, I wondered how many of my classmates I would recognize after 50 years. And when I walked in, I couldn't call to mind the name of the first classmate I met.

Suddenly I found myself practicing an old trick — focusing on high school classmates while at the same time taking a sneak look at their name tags.

As would be expected, we had changed. Time had reconfigured our faces, hairlines and hair color, and waistlines. But once we began to converse it was as if these changes suddenly disappeared; we became our youthful selves again.

A lively spirit and the joy of being reunited suddenly coursed through the room.

At first we shared our life's journeys. From there the conversation switched to recalling enjoyable times we shared and, most of all, the hilarious professors who taught us.

This anniversary was more than a walk down memory lane. It exuded a spirit of gratitude, thankfulness that God in some mysterious way brought us together during our most formative years.

More than studies and formation, we were celebrating each other: the time when we forged friendships and supported each other during good and not-so-good moments.

It was a celebration of bonding. We studied hard together, played hard together, and together we often laughed our way out of trying situations.

As I listened to the journeys taken by classmates who didn't go forward in the seminary, I found that most recounted good deeds they had done of which they were proud.

Often those deeds translated into works of mercy.

It struck me that we had been marked by God, a mark that is indelible.

A love of God had driven us to aspire to spread that love and make the world a better place. Once that spirit enters people's lives, it never stops inspiring them, whether it prompts them to become priests or to aspire to another walk of life.

When a good person leaves the seminary, many see this as a loss. But if we conducted a study of ex-seminarians, we would find that the spirit of God that first inspired them is very much at work — that in so very many cases these men still carry out the dream of spreading God's life.

Taking Memorial Day more seriously

Soldiers in battle deserve more than flag-waving, speeches

What is the purpose of Memorial Day? Is it to pay tribute to those who lost their lives in past and present wars? Is it to remember their selfless sacrifice? Of course, yes.

But young men and women ordered into battle by the president and Congress deserve more than flag-waving and political speeches. We owe them our willingness to reflect deeply on the real reasons they were — and continue to be — put in harm's way.

Most government leaders are quick to say their lives were put on the line to protect us, to promote democracy and to preserve our way of life.

But what they don't say is that the lust for power and greed, arrogance, nationalism, the military industrial complex, lack of imagination and ineptitude are the real reasons young people are sent to kill and be killed.

From elementary school through adulthood, it is drummed into our heads that military strength brings peace. No! Military strength does not bring peace.

Possessing a mighty military presents us with a mighty temptation to use it. The two Iraq wars and Afghanistan are the latest examples.

And even though the Cold War never became a hot war, nuclear deterrence always put us 20 minutes away from mutually assured destruction — and it still does.

Facing the truth is difficult and painful. It means that wives, husbands, mothers, fathers must come to grips with the fact that their loved ones may die in vain.

But that need not be the case. Their deaths will have had saving merit if we grow to the point of saying to those in power, as Pope Paul VI said at the United Nations:

"No more war. Never again war! Peace! It is peace, which must guide the destinies of peoples. ... If you wish to be brothers, lay down your weapons. ... The hour has struck indeed for our conversion. ... We must get used to thinking of man in a new way."

There is only one death in war that would be good: the death of war itself. But sadly, war is alive and well.

Most Americans — most Catholics included — have no intention of demanding that our leaders pursue a policy of global disarmament.

Making a Difference

TONY MAGLIANO
CNS COLUMNIST

More than 20 years ago the Maryknoll Fathers produced a film titled "gods of metal." It drove home the point that society worships its weapons — its gods of metal.

Today that worship is more costly than ever. The proposed 2007 U.S. federal budget allocates $73 billion for research and development related to new weaponry and $84 billion for the purchase of existing weapons and related items.

Turning from worship of military might to worship of the one true God — the God of peace — will require us to heed the teachings of Paul VI and become brothers and sisters to all people.

As we begin to grasp the hands of Iraqis, Afghans, Iranians, North Koreans and people of all nations and creeds, we will be inspired to lay down our weapons.

But all of this demands a change of heart. There is too much at stake for us to remain in denial. Paul VI's prophetic words are even more urgent today:

"The hour has struck indeed for our conversion. ... We must get used to thinking of man in a new way."

And we must get used to thinking of Memorial Day in a new way too.

Family bonds

Need for family drives Get on the Bus program in California

BY NANCY HARTNAGEL
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The need for family is what's driving Get on the Bus, a program that enables children to visit their mothers in California state prisons.

For some prisoners, "to be separated from their families is very painful," said Mercy Sister Carmel Crimmins, coordinator of the program for the Diocese of San Bernardino, where she is director of social and community services.

Staying connected to families is important for prisoners, she said, "because no visits, no calls militates against a good transition back into the community, the society."

Sister Louise Bond, Catholic chaplain at the California Institution for Women in Corona, said that through Get on the Bus many women are seeing "their children for the first time since they were incarcerated."

One prisoner last year "hadn't seen her daughter in 16 years," said Sister Bond, a member of the Sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary.

The two religious talked about Get on the Bus — which takes place close to Mother's Day and this year was held May 12 — in e-mail and phone interviews with Catholic News Service.

Sister Crimmins said it was "the plight of families" that got the San Bernardino Diocese involved in the program five years ago.

The Corona facility, which holds more than 2,000 inmates, is the only state prison for women in the diocese.

"However, many women from San Bernardino are incarcerated in Chowchilla, six and one-half hours' journey from here," she said. "These are the women we try to help by bringing their children to see them."

In Chowchilla, Valley State Prison and the Central California Women's Facility house more than 7,400 women, with 75 percent of them mothers, according to a Get on the Bus press release.

The program is sponsored by the Sisters of St. Joseph Ministerial Services with support from local volunteers, donors, faith communities and nonprofit organizations.

Heaven Hall enjoys a swing with her mother, Yolanda, at the California Institute for Women in Chino, Calif., May 12. Heaven was visiting her mother during Get on the Bus, a program scheduled annually in anticipation of Mother's Day that enables children to visit their mothers in California state prisons.

This year, 31 buses from cities around the state took more than 600 children, along with their guardians — many of them the children's grandmothers — and volunteers, to visit their mothers in five state prisons.

Poverty and distance, with many of the prisons located far from urban centers, prevent more frequent visits, the nuns said.

Four of those buses originated in the San Bernardino Diocese. One from Perris and two from San Bernardino made the long round trip to the Chowchilla prisons, while one starting in Redlands went to the Corona prison and the California Rehabilitation Center in Norco.

The program in the diocese has doubled in five years, Sister Crimmins noted. The number of women visited has grown from 20 to 40, the number of children and guardians from 35 to 70, and the number of volunteers helping on the buses and with lunch at the prisons from 15 to 30.

This year the cost of the diocese's participation was about $16,000, all "covered by donation," Sister Crimmins said.

In addition to hiring the buses, the program pays for supplies and meals for the trip. Also, the children are photographed with their mothers, and on the way home they're given teddy bears and letters from their moms.

The response by people in the diocese "has been phenomenal," Sister Crimmins said.

"Parishioners, Catholic associations and religious communities have been very generous with donations," she said.

She has heard comments like: "I knew women went to prison but I never thought of the children," "I never knew that women were sent so far away," and "It never dawned on me how impossible it would be to visit on public transportation."

"The vast majority (of the women) are not in prison for violent crimes but for addictions and money problems, such as bad checks and embezzlement," said Sister Crimmins. "An awful lot don't need punishment, but need treatment."

Sister Bond, who called the program "a great gift," said the prisoners "who have to be away from their children are often stressed and having the opportunity for a visit brings a lot of joy and hope for the future."

She reported positive feelings from many who participated in the May 12 event.

Among the prisoners, Junier De Young, 33, said, "It feels great to see how beautiful my girls are turning out."

Maria Gastelum, 37, described the visit as "the best thing that's ever happened to me in a long time."

Yolanda Hall, 35, said, "It feels just like heaven. This is a day to remember."

The children were also upbeat. Monique Gastelum, 19, said she was "overwhelmed with excitement. ... This is one of the happiest days I've had in about four years."

Chris Pasquotto, 14, said, "I got to see my mom today and I adore her. There is no one in the world I have like my mom."

But 8-year-old Carlie Villegas sounded a more subdued note.

"It breaks my heart to see my mom cry," the child said.

Five new transitional deacons ordained

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — A group of men recently took important steps toward fulfilling their vocational callings.

In two separate ceremonies, five men were ordained to the transitional diaconate, the final stage of preparation for ordination to the priesthood.

Richard Gerard DeClue Jr. and Fred Werth were ordained as transitional deacons by Archbishop Edwin F. O'Brien, head of the U.S. Archdiocese for the Military Services, in the Crypt Church at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington, D.C. March 25. Archbishop O'Brien celebrated the Mass.

Preferring Bible over Brown Catholics not swayed by 'Da Vinci Code,' according to poll

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — According to a poll released May 15, American Catholics aren't likely to be swayed by the claims made in the novel "The Da Vinci Code."

A nationwide telephone survey of U.S. Catholics found that 42 percent intend to "seek the truth" — one of the catch phrases in the book and in promotions for the film version that opened May 19 — by studying the Bible more closely.

In the poll more people said they would consult the Bible than any other source.

According to the survey, two-thirds of Catholics who Diocesan schools work to prevent bullying

BY KAREN A. EVANS

CHARLOTTE — Bullying is such a serious issue that the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta monitor it as a "child-risk behavior," according to Lynne Lang, a school community health educator in St. Louis.

In fact, she said 160,000 children stay home from school each day because they're afraid of someone at their schools.

One in six children identified as bullies by age 8 will be in the criminal justice system by age 24, Lang added. One in eight will be linked to domestic violence by age 30.

Bullying can come in many forms, according to Lang. It can be verbal, physical or emotional; it can be gender-based, she said, and there is

THE PERFECT BABYSITTER

Joseph McCabe cradles his brother Riley, now 18 months old, after Riley fell asleep at St. Cecilia Church in Philadelphia. Joseph will always remember the day he saved the life of Riley, then 9 months old. The 13-year-old Boy Scout performed the Heimlich maneuver on the infant after he swallowed a piece of tape and began choking.

Catholic Boy Scout honored for saving baby brother's life

PHILADELPHIA (CNS) — Joseph McCabe will always remember July 20, 2005 as the day he saved the life of his baby brother Riley, who was then 9 months old.

Just three weeks before Riley accidentally swallowed a piece of tape he found on the floor, Joseph had learned the Heimlich maneuver and cardiopulmonary resuscitation through the Boy Scouts.

"I thank them a lot, because they give you a lot of opportunities and teach you a lot of different skills," the 13-year-old said.

For his heroics, Joseph was awarded a Boy Scouts of America merit medal following a recent Mass at St. Cecilia Church.

When the accident occurred, Joseph was talking on the telephone with his mother, who had called home to check on the boys while she was awaiting a doctor's appointment at Holy Redeemer Hospital in Meadowbrook.

Joseph threw down the phone and rushed to his baby brother.

"His face was all red. I just did the Heimlich maneuver ... right away," he said. And up came the tape.

"After it came out, he started laughing," Joseph said of Riley's reaction.

Diane McCabe, the boys' mother, had called 911 immediately after she heard her oldest son throw down the phone.

Emergency personnel arrived within minutes, but Joseph had already finished examining his baby brother, picked him up and was walking him around the house.

The emergency personnel further examined Riley, "but he was just laughing the whole time," Joseph said.

The boys' father, Philadelphia police officer Joseph McCabe, recalled what he saw when he arrived home.

"When I got in the door, the fireman said, 'Slow down, he's fine. Joey took care of it,'" the father said. "He's a very good role model for the other boys. We really thank the Boy Scouts for what they taught him. He knew exactly what to do."

Diane McCabe also applauded the courage and quickness of their eldest son.

"He was certified in CPR, he was a Boy Scout — he was everything you would want in a baby sitter," she said.

Joseph said he enjoys teaching his little brothers about the Catholic faith, playing sports with them and "keeping them on track."

The drama of Riley's accident reminded Joseph that "you shouldn't take life for granted, because things can happen in minutes."

Instead, Joseph said, "You shouldn't think about what you want (in life), but what other people need — and how you should take care of other people."

Bishops urge Congress to assist more hurricane victims, Haitians

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The chairmen of two key bishops' committees urged special attention to the poor in Haiti and to U.S. hurricane victims in need of housing as a House-Senate conference committee began work on a supplemental appropriations bill.

In a May 19 letter to the conference committee, Bishops Nicholas DiMarzio and Thomas G. Wenski urged support for those "two essential areas of funding" in the Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act for Defense, the Global War on Terror and Hurricane Recovery 2006.

Bishop DiMarzio of Brooklyn, N.Y., heads the U.S. bishops' Committee on Domestic Policy, and Bishop Wenski of Orlando, Fla., chairs the Committee on International Policy.

The bishops said the reconciled appropriations bill should include at least $100 million for rental housing assistance for low-income households in the Gulf Coast region and $40 million "for the urgent needs of Haiti," the poorest country in the Western Hemisphere.

The $100 million for hurricane housing assistance, approved in the Senate version of the appropriations bill, would support 13,500 housing vouchers for poor working families, seniors and people with disabilities living in Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Texas and Florida.

"The states and local governments of the Gulf are struggling to provide help to the hundreds of thousands of families who need housing assistance," the bishops said. "Unfortunately, those efforts do not reach a huge number of families still seeking affordable housing, those with the lowest incomes."

Catholic agencies in the area report that "rent in the hardest-hit areas has risen by 25 percent or more," the two bishops added. "Without assistance, the working poor, senior citizens and people with disabilities will find it impossible to afford housing."

Pope says devotion to Sacred Heart helps Catholics focus on love

We should respond to call of God, pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus helps Catholics focus on the reality of God's love and their obligation to love others, Pope Benedict XVI said.

In the Sacred Heart, "we can recognize in an ever clearer way the limitless love God has for us," the pope wrote in a May 15 letter.

The papal letter was addressed to Father Peter-Hans Kolvenbach, superior general of the Society of Jesus, in recognition of the Jesuits' efforts to promote the devotion throughout the church over the past 150 years.

In 2006, the church celebrates the feast of the Most Sacred Heart of Jesus June 23.

Pope Benedict said the devotion acquires its deepest meaning only when people express their awareness of God's love by dedicating their lives to his service.

"The experience of the love of God is lived as a 'call' to which one must respond," the pope said.

Gazing upon Jesus' "pierced heart" is a reminder that he took on the sufferings and sins of all humanity, which "helps us become more attentive to the suffering and needs of others," Pope Benedict said.

"It makes us able to entrust ourselves to his saving and merciful love and, at the same time, reinforces our desire to participate in his work of salvation by becoming his instruments," the pope said.

Peace entails religious freedom, pope tells diplomats to the Vatican

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Peace and justice in the world require respect for religious freedom, solidarity, policies that look beyond economic gain and respect for the environment, Pope Benedict XVI told five new ambassadors to the Vatican.

"Peace is rooted in respect for religious freedom," the pope said May 18, welcoming the ambassadors from Chad, India, Moldova, Cape Verde and Australia.

"It is important that throughout the world all people can adhere to the religion of their choice and practice it freely and without fear because no one can base his existence only on the search for material well-being," the pope said.

He also told the ambassadors that every country in the world has an obligation to work for the development of all peoples and to do so in a way that protects the earth's resources.

Pope Benedict said he appreciated India's commitment to tolerance and respect, but in the wake of attacks on minority churches and regional laws against conversion, he asked that the government do more to make the commitment a reality.

Pope Benedict praised Australia's contributions to peacemaking and to development and disaster relief around the world, especially in the Asian Pacific region.

The social situation of the Aborigines, he said, "is cause for much pain" and needs ongoing attention.

The pope also told the ambassador he was looking forward, "God willing," to visiting Australia in 2008 to preside over World Youth Day festivities.

Ambassador Anne Maree Plunkett told the pope, "The Australian government encourages the Holy See's efforts to expand dialogue with China and Vietnam, and thereby contribute to the growth and development of civil society in both those countries."

While the Vietnamese government continues to exercise control over church activities, top Vatican and Vietnamese diplomats meet regularly to discuss the appointment of new bishops and limits on seminary enrollment.

The Vatican has no formal contacts with the Chinese government, however.

Holy Angels employees recognized for outstanding work

BELMONT — Holy Angels recently awarded two employees with North Carolina Association for Residential Resources (NORCARR) achievement of excellence awards for 2006.

These highly coveted awards recognize outstanding job performance consistently displayed by a Holy Angels employee of at least one year. Nominees for both awards, the Ann Wolfe Award and the Virginia Franks Achievement of Excellence Award, are recommended by their co-workers through a formal nominating process.

Regina Moody, president and CEO of Holy Angels, announced the winners during a celebration with Holy Angels staff May 10.

Barbara Haley of Charlotte received the Ann Wolfe Award for outstanding service. She has served the residents of Holy Angels since 1992, most recently as home coordinator of an intermediate care facility for the mentally retarded.

The award is named in honor of Dr. Ann Wolfe, who served as an advocate for individuals with developmental disabilities. It is presented to a direct care professional who works directly with the residents at Holy Angels.

Elizabeth Withers of Gastonia received the Virginia Franks award. She is a registered nurse and serves as a nursing supervisor at Holy Angels.

The award was established in 1991 in honor of Virginia Franks to recognize individuals who serve in roles other than direct care.

"For fifty years, Holy Angels' employees have cared deeply for our residents and committed themselves to their care," said Moody. "(The winners) set and achieve high standards and are an inspiration to all of us."

Haley and Withers will be honored during the annual NORCARR banquet in Raleigh June 8.

NORCARR was incorporated in 1975 by administrators of agencies who care for individuals with developmental disabilities, primarily in residential settings, for the purpose of sharing knowledge, experience and expertise in the field of mental retardation.

Founded in 1956 by the Sisters of Mercy, Holy Angels is a private, nonprofit corporation that provides residential services and innovative programs for children and adults with varying degrees of mental retardation and physical disabilities, some of whom are medically fragile.

Mercy Sister McNamara defends thesis, earns doctorate

BELMONT — Mercy Sister Ray Maria McNamara recently received her philosophy doctorate from the Graduate Theological Union in Berkeley, Calif.

She earned the doctorate degree May 11 after successfully writing and defending her thesis entitled, "Interdependence and the God Quest: A Christian Ecological Spirituality."

The thesis provides a study of a Christian ecological spirituality focusing on the integration of humanity's interdependence with the created world and the self-transcending experience of a life centered in God.

Examinations of biblical text, theological anthropology, spirituality and environmental philosophy provide its foundational elements and suggest an attitude of contemplation toward God that is inclusive of the natural world.

Sister McNamara earned a bachelor's degree in biology from Clemson University in South Carolina, received a master's degree in administration from the University of St. Thomas in Minnesota and a master's degree in systematic theology from the Graduate Theological Union in California.

She has taught, served as principal or as a department chair at numerous diocesan and private schools in the Charlotte and Gaston County areas, including Charlotte Catholic High School and St. Patrick School in Charlotte, Sacred Heart Grade School in Belmont and Gaston Day School in Gastonia.

Father Mariasoosai came to serve as resident priest and administrator of the church in September 2003. Originally from the Archdiocese of Madurai in South India, he served as pastor of St. Joseph Church in Spanish Town, Jamaica, before coming to the Diocese of Charlotte.

Since Father Mariasoosai's arrival, the church has enjoyed a new level of spiritual and community life, revitalized through the dedicated commitment shown by its administrator, who has learned two new languages and cultures.

Church members have responded with grateful affection, and service to the church and community has grown significantly.

Five new transitional deacons ordained

Washington, D.C. March 25.

John Patrick Cahill, Patrick Timothy Hoare and Patrick Daniel Toole were ordained by Auxiliary Bishop Joseph R. Cistone of Philadelphia in St. Martin Chapel at St. Charles Borromeo Seminary in Wynnewood, Pa., May 13.

The new deacons committed themselves to celibacy and to the obligations of ministry — serving the sick, the poor, the needy.

"It is a tremendous blessing for the Diocese of Charlotte to have these five men give themselves over to our Lord in service to his church," said Father Christopher Gober, vocations director for the Diocese of Charlotte.

The road to the priesthood is marked by a series of milestones: lector, acolyte, candidacy, transitional deacon, priestly ordination.

During the rite of ordination of a deacon, the candidates are called forth to make promises of celibacy and vows of obedience.

The bishop lays his hands on their heads and asks the Holy Spirit to descend upon the candidates. The candidates are then vested with the dalmatic and stole and kneel before the bishop, who places in their hands the Book of Gospels. As deacons, they assist during the rest of the Mass.

As deacons, they can preach, assist priests at the altar during the Liturgy of the Eucharist; officiate at weddings, baptisms and funerals; and administer blessings during certain liturgical rites.

Deacon DeClue

"I am truly thankful to God for calling me to serve his church as a deacon, and eventually as a priest, for the salvation of souls," said Deacon DeClue.

Deacon DeClue, a native of Columbus, Ohio, earned a dual major in pre-veterinary medicine and biology at Ohio's University of Findlay before transferring to Belmont Abbey College to major in theology.

While discerning his vocation, he accepted a scholarship for graduate studies in theology at Boston College. After one year in Boston, Deacon DeClue applied to the Diocese of Charlotte for seminary studies, and has been studying at Theological College in Washington, D.C.

"It is humbling to realize that one is being called to be Christ for others, a task which one cannot perform but by the grace of God," said Deacon DeClue.

"As such, it is both a tremendous gift and a grave responsibility; one that I would not give up for anything else in the world," he said.

Deacon Werth

"Anyone who knows even the bare outline of the story of my call to the priesthood will recognize immediately the hand of God on my life," said Deacon Werth, a native of Radford, Va.

Born a Presbyterian, Deacon Werth graduated from Virginia Military Institute; married his wife, Patricia; and reported to flight school for the U.S. Air Force in 1970. Upon leaving the service, he entered the University of Virginia, intending to become a lawyer.

In 1986, as the father of three children, he began attending St. Frances of Rome Church in Sparta, N.C., and joined the RCIA classes. He soon found himself having a conversion of faith.

After the deaths of his wife and daughter, Sally, in 2002, Deacon Werth was supported through the tragedy by Father Mark Lawlor, pastor of St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte, and soon found himself called to the priesthood.

He studies for the priesthood at Blessed Pope John XXIII Seminary in Weston, Mass.

"There is nothing greater in this world than to be called to the priesthood of Jesus Christ," said Deacon Werth. "For me, it is life."

Deacon Cahill

Deacon Cahill first considered the priesthood while playing baseball and football at Charlotte Catholic High School.

"So many priests I met during high school and college invited me to think about becoming a priest, most especially Bishop (William G.) Curlin," recalled Deacon Cahill. "I was so impressed with how joyful he was as a priest, and I was inspired by that."

After completing his sophomore year at Belmont Abbey College, he entered the seminary program for the Diocese of Charlotte. He spent three years at Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C., earning bachelor's and master's degrees in philosophy. He is now studying for the priesthood at St. Charles Borromeo Seminary.

His time at seminary, as well as his summer assignments in parishes in the Diocese of Charlotte, have reaffirmed his decision.

"It has made it all the more clear that this choice was a right fit for me," he said.

Deacon Cahill said he is excited by the challenge of "preaching the Gospel in a society that is hungry for it."

"I hope to inspire others to a closer, more joyful relationship with Christ," he said.

Deacon Hoare

Deacon Hoare, a native of Willow Grove, Pa., earned a bachelor's degree in business administration from Pennsylvania's LaSalle University and a master's from Drexel University.

He worked for 14 years for Liberty Mutual Group in Philadelphia and Baltimore, Md., in its underwriting and financial departments, leaving the company as vice president of underwriting.

He followed his calling toward the priesthood, and is studying at St. Charles Borromeo Seminary.

"Each of us is called in a special way by God so that his kingdom might be realized," said Deacon Hoare.

"I am humbled and excited by my call to holy orders, and I ask for the prayers of the people of the Diocese of Charlotte that I may serve them with humility and holiness," he said.

Deacon Toole

A native of Voorhees, N.J., Deacon Toole was enrolled at Belmont Abbey College until 2000, when he left to enter the seminary and pursue his vocational calling.

His first year was at Catholic University in Washington, D.C.; he transferred to St. Charles Borromeo in 2001.

"It is an incredible gift to discover what God has called me to be and, most importantly, to grow in a deeper knowledge and love of his Son and to be able to serve his people," said Deacon Toole.

'Many Parts, One Body'

Diocesan conference explores small Christian communities

BY DEACON GERALD POTKAY
CORRESPONDENT

GREENSBORO — Speaking in both English and Spanish, Bishop Peter J. Jugis encouraged people to build and strengthen small Christian communities within their parishes.

Bishop Jugis spoke during "We are Christ's Building Blocks: Many Parts, One Body," the second annual diocesan conference on small Christian communities. The bilingual event, sponsored by the diocesan Office of Faith Formation, was held at St. Paul the Apostle Church in Greensboro May 20.

Bishop Jugis reminded those in attendance to be strong in their faith and to build upon the small group ideas, presented during the event, back within their own parishes.

In North America, small Christian (or church) communities are usually parish-based groups of eight to 12 people seeking to make their faith more alive in their daily lives.

While the emphasis differs from one group to another, generally their purposes include prayer, mutual support, reflection on Scripture and life, learning, mission and participation in the larger church.

Robin Taylor, a member of the diocesan resource team for small Church communities, said SCCs — as they are known by participants — work from within the church structure. The core groups meet and bring opportunities for parishes to grow in faith and service.

Conference participants learned about several SCCs and heard from speakers explaining how their groups function and carry out their goals.

Terry Zobel, director of adult religious education at St. Thomas Aquinas Church in Alpharetta, Ga., gave the English keynote speech on turning SCCs from vision to reality.

Zobel, who coordinates more than 30 SCCs at her parish, said meeting in small groups can help people reflect on each other's experiences and discover how God calls them in everyday life.

The best way to reflect on the Gospels, she said, is to reach out to others in your community. And a byproduct of SCCs is people going out and making changes in their world.

Father Jorge Noda, parochial vicar of Our Lady of Perpetual Help Church in Miami, Fla., gave the Spanish keynote speech on SCCs and evangelization.

Using his experience working on program SINE (a Spanish acronym that translates as Holistic System for a New Evangelization), Father Noda stressed the importance of "going outside the walls" of the church to reach everyone as evangelizers of Jesus.

By doing so, all will be brought to participate in the church in more ways in the "big community" of the parish, he said.

Kathleen Muhonen, a parishioner of St. Paul the Apostle Church, presented a workshop on how parishes can start, sustain and continually revitalize various SCCs.

Muhonen, who has been involved with several SCCs, said groups can start through a process of faith-based sharing and reflection. For instance, she said, groups can bring their faith and the church to the elderly and homebound in the community.

Deacon Ron Steinkamp, a permanent deacon at St. Pius X Church in Greensboro, presented a workshop on the Cursillo movement as a vehicle of SCCs.

People sign in for the second annual diocesan conference on small Christian communities at St. Paul the Apostle Church in Greensboro May 20.

The Cursillo ("little course") movement, which began in Spain in 1949 as a Christian renewal effort, seeks to promote individual and organized apostolic action. Deacon Steinkamp is the movement's spiritual director in the Diocese of Charlotte.

Similar to SCCs, Cursillo members — after a short introductory course — break into smaller groups to share and pray in order to evangelize and change their environment.

Deacon Steinkamp noted that effective evangelization involves bringing others to Christ through true Christian love and truth.

"I came here (to the conference) to learn as much as I can to help my community," said Ibis Centeno, a parishioner of St. Therese Church in Mooresville.

The workshops, she said, provided helpful steps on tackling the social and spiritual necessities in her parish.

"I am motivated and looking to become involved in stewardship," she said.

IN OUR SCHOOLS

Diocesan schools work to prevent bullying

"cyberbullying" — bullying in cyberspace.

"Parents are ... clueless today about what goes on with computers," Lang said.

Gender-based bullying can be extremely harmful, she added. Of the 37 school-based attacks in the United States between 1974 and 1999, nearly every attacker had been bullied as a child.

In many Catholic schools in the Diocese of Charlotte, measures are in place to recognize, address and prevent bullying behaviors.

Terri Hardy, guidance director at St. Leo the Great School in Winston-Salem and Libby Jones, guidance counselor at Our Lady of Grace School in Greensboro, have implemented the "Witness for Christ" program at their respective schools.

Witness for Christ helps give voice to the bystanders in order to stop bullying behaviors and focuses on witnessing for Christ in one's life.

St. Leo the Great School administration, staff and parents work together to ensure cooperative approaches to dealing with bullying, according to Principal Georgette Schraeder.

"The School Improvement Plan includes proactive approaches to address bullying," she said. "Plans are in place for presentations at the opening of school to define and share strategies between home and school, and to ensure support for the efforts and consequences to stop the bullying."

The focus at Our Lady Grace

Teachers, parents and students must work together to "protect the dignity of every kid in (the) classroom."

— Lynn Lang, school community health educator

School is to have a clearly stated policy, and to educate the faculty, parents and students, focusing on "Witness" as a part of the "Bully, Target, Witness" triangle, Jones said.

"Bystanders constitute 80 percent of the equation and can use their 'witness' capabilities to defend the target and stop the bully," said Jones.

Leigh Ann Plemmons, guidance counselor at Sacred Heart School in Salisbury, addressed this issue of bullying with every grade this past school year.

"In the younger grades, I talk to them about what it means to be a good friend and about feelings, and I talk to them more specifically about how we should not hurt others with the things we say or do," said Plemmons. "I also make it clear to them that they should let someone know if someone is hurting them."

Teachers at St. Matthew School in Charlotte teach the students T.W.A. — Telling the bully to stop, Walking away to find another friend and Asking for help if the person continues to bully them.

Assistant Principal Kathy McKinney said this method is taught to all grade levels. An "Anti-Bully" pledge is also signed by parents, students and staff

One in six children identified as bullies by age 8 will be in the criminal justice system by age 24, according to Lynn Lang, a school community health educator in St. Louis. Bullying can come in many forms — verbal, physical, emotional. In many Catholic schools in the Diocese of Charlotte, measures are in place to recognize, address and prevent bullying behaviors.

stating the definition of bullying and the agreement that bullying will not be tolerated at the school. A similar pledge is signed by parents, students and staff of St. Ann School in Charlotte.

In policing bullying at recess — which Lang said was the most common time for bullying — she suggested the "New Games" approach of having concerted group activities to achieve goals rather than letting children figure out for themselves what is amusing.

New Games, a concept developed more than 30 years ago, are noncompetitive, cooperative activities such as group juggling and verbal rhyming contests that promote fun and have no winners or losers.

Ultimately, teachers, parents and students alike must work together to end bullying.

"It's up to you to protect the dignity of every kid in your classroom," Lang said.

The St. Jude math-a-thon, celebrating its 28th year, has been conducted in more than 53,000 schools nationwide and raises funds to continue life-saving research, patient care and educational programs at St. Jude Hospital.

Student 'math-a-thon' nets $6,161.76

HENDERSONVILLE — Students at Immaculata School in Hendersonville recently raised more than $6,000 during a "math-a-thon."

Every other year, students raise funds for St. Jude Children's Research Hospital in Memphis, Tenn. This year, students in kindergarten through eighth grades raised $6,161.76 for the pediatric treatment and research facility.

Students found sponsors to support them as they worked approximately 200 math problems in a workbook or on a CD-ROM provided by St. Jude hospital.

In addition to helping children and researchers at St. Jude's, the students reinforced their math skills, according to Robin Chandler, media coordinator for Immaculata School.

Students earning the highest amount in each grade level were recognized by the school. The overall top fundraiser was first-grader Camille Long.

Other students recognized were: kindergartener Royster Strickland, second-grader Kristian Gaylord, third-grader Kaitlyn Capps, fourth-grader Kayla Bray, fifth-grader Shelby Caruso, sixth-graders Megan Aubrey and Kortney Clark, and seventh-graders Mariah Guedes, Denise Hategan-Drajan and Hunter Kowald.

The fifth grade had 100 percent participation in the fundraiser, with all students turning in money. They were awarded a special ice cream treat for their hard work.

A mosaic of art, culture

South Carolina artist Holly Marchman assists fifth-grader Aliyah Benton to complete a mosaic of two turtles during art class at Our Lady of the Assumption School in Charlotte May 22.

Our Lady of the Assumption School's fifth-grade students are participating in a workshop project for the new Levine Children's Hospital at Carolinas Medical Center in Charlotte.

Schools from throughout the Charlotte-Mecklenburg area will submit original art, some of which will be selected for permanent display in the children's hospital. Our Lady of the Assumption School was the only Catholic school selected to participate, in part because of the diversity of its student body.

"Artwork for public buildings can sometimes be relegated to simply opening a catalogue and ordering mass-produced art," said Vicki Neumann, art teacher at Our Lady of the Assumption School. "In contrast to this generic selection, the art in the Levine Children's Hospital will be as unique as the building itself."

The Our Lady of the Assumption School students produced colorful mosaics made of paper depicting various animals — elephants, koalas, birds, turtles.

'Father Crunk' preaches on popular Atlanta radio show

BY ERIKA ANDERSON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ATLANTA — It was 6:30 a.m. the Monday after Easter, and Father Ricardo Bailey was looking over the notes for his sermon one last time.

His well-read Bible resting next to him on the table, he flipped through his notes, making last-minute changes. As a parochial vicar at Holy Spirit Church, his Easter weekend was busy.

His eyes were heavy with a lack of sleep, but as soon as he walked into his "church," the youthful energy he is known for appeared in a burst of exuberance.

On Monday mornings this year, the priest's church has been the studio of pop station Q100 (100.5 FM), his pulpit the popular morning show "The Bert Show."

"We call him 'Father Crunk.' It's Father Bailey from Holy Spirit Catholic Church," announced Bert Weiss, as Father Bailey sat across from him, headphones on for his segment.

"Crunk" is a type of hip-hop music, but it is also an urban term used to describe a high level of energy — which applies to Father Bailey.

"Father Crunk here tells us that, look, you can't laugh at the dysfunction going on in Hollywood with some of these celebrities. What you ought to do is embrace it and apply it to your life because there's some spiritual messages coming out of Hollywood that we can learn every single week," Weiss said.

"Yes, indeed," Father Bailey replied. "And today's title is 'Stop dippin' and dappin' when you don't know what's happenin'."

Father Bailey went on to talk about the rumors surrounding the relationship between Tom Cruise and Katie Holmes.

"Relationships, my friends, are hard enough, and the last thing that anybody needs are the rumors that fan the flames of the hater-ology that goes on out there," Father Bailey said.

"When you look at the Bible, there are people all around it that are trying to hate on one another. ... Remember all that drama that happened when Jesus was getting ready to be born?" he asked.

"I mean, man, people were hating on Mary, filling Joseph's mind with the fact that he needed to kick Mary to the curb because he wasn't that baby's daddy. But we all know how that turned out," he said.

The message of Jesus, Mary and Joseph might seem out of place on a radio station that plays hits from rapper Kanye West to pop superstar Kelly Clarkson, but Weiss said Father Bailey fits in perfectly.

"I think entertainment is entertainment," Weiss said. "If it's engaging, it's engaging. Father Bailey is entertaining, engaging and talks about subjects our target audience is interested in: pop culture. It was an easy fit."

Father Bailey first appeared on "The Bert Show" last fall to pray for a local Catholic high school's football team. Listeners responded so well that Weiss brought him back for a regular segment.

"The trick was bringing a priest on without people feeling we were forcing them to listen to a religious sermon. The connection with Hollywood made it a perfect segment," he said.

And Atlantans have agreed with a resounding "Amen."

"People generally love him. I've only received one negative e-mail about one of his segments," Weiss said. "People love him because of his delivery and the non-threatening way he approaches his subjects."

Father Bailey remains humble about his work. His decision to do the radio segments was blessed by both Archbishop Wilton D. Gregory of Atlanta and Holy Spirit Church's pastor, Msgr. Edward Dillon.

He said he was nervous the first time he was on the air, but Weiss gave him pointers to ease his nerves. In preparation each week he said he prays, looks at the entertainment news published on Q100's Web site, and works to turn the Hollywood message into a holy one.

"I don't take this lightly," Father Bailey said. "But I want to make it as funny as it is spiritual. Q100 is a secular station, but it's very important to realize that there are listeners who have been alienated by things that have happened in the past, and they are searching."

"If you'd have told me when I was back at seminary that one day I'd be on a top 40 radio station, I'd have said you were lying," he laughed. "But all I want to do is lead people to Jesus. That's what it's all about."

Holy Spirit sustains, fills us if we let it

BY BEVERLY CORZINE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

In 1980 in north central Texas, an inferno of 84 straight days of temperatures above 100 degrees began in June and continued into September when teachers and students returned to school.

Trudging into my classroom the first day of school, I realized that the traditional fall bulletin boards I'd created had no connection with the baking world outside.

At the close of the school day, I thought of the 179 days yet to come. I stood in the deserted classroom, chalk in hand, consumed by the challenges that this school year presented.

The year ahead was daunting.

What I needed was a strategy for Day 2. Bulletin boards, the incredible heat and a milestone birthday at the end of the week now seemed insignificant because I had discovered that my new students spoke no English or very little, and I spoke no Vietnamese or Laotian.

What I would have given for one of those tongues of fire that solved the communication problem on the first Pentecost!

During my commute home, my frustration level rose in proportion to the clogged highway. Finally, the Lamar Boulevard stoplight signaled the welcome fact that home was three blocks away.

At that moment I saw the gigantic posters. I recognized the work of my neighbor Linda who had planted them along the median ahead, announcing to everyone that Beverly Corzine was going to have a monumental birthday on Saturday.

For me this was absolutely the last straw in a day of frustration. However, when I rounded the corner, I saw Linda, my family and the neighbors doubled over with laughter.

Laughing and crying, I joined this commotion of love.

The Pentecost readings are rich with the message of assurance and hope. The same Holy Spirit that Jesus promises to his disciples fills our hearts today if we invite the Spirit to strengthen us and guide our daily lives.

Sometimes we witness the fruits of the Spirit that St. Paul defines in the most surprising places. Jesus did not leave us alone in a confusing world.

The Holy Spirit that was palpable in the rushing wind and flames of fire that first Pentecost sustains us and fills our very being if we open the door of our hearts.

All I wanted was sanctuary from school's first day.

Questions:

When have you seen the fruits of the Holy Spirit in an otherwise daunting situation? How have you experienced the sustaining power of the Spirit?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"When you send forth your Spirit, they are created, and you renew the face of the earth" (Psalm 104:30).

Vatican official warns against people posing as pope's organist

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The archpriest of St. Peter's Basilica has issued a warning to concert organizers about people presenting themselves as the official organist of St. Peter's or of Pope Benedict XVI.

The only legitimate official organist of the basilica is James E. Goettsche, a Los Angeles native who has held the title since 1989, said Cardinal Francesco Marchisano, the basilica's archpriest.

The cardinal's May 15 letter was published as concert organizers in Germany were promoting a tour of an Italian musician who, organizers claimed, "Pope Benedict XVI has appointed as the new organist of St. Peter's Basilica in the Vatican."

Goettsche, meanwhile, is in Rome playing the organ at St. Peter's Basilica during papal Masses as well as during Sunday and feast day prayer services.

"I have been advised to take legal action," Goettsche told Catholic News Service May 19, "but for now I am looking more for clarification and correction."

He said he already has had some success: a U.S. agent representing the "phantom organist" has dropped the pretender from his Web site roster of artists and has written a very apologetic e-mail to Goettsche.

The U.S. agent provided the Vatican with the documentation the Italian organist had used to convince him he was legitimate, documentation the Vatican says is not authentic.

The U.S. agent's withdrawn Web site biography of the Italian even contained the fanciful detail that the Italian organist travels the world on a Vatican diplomatic passport.

Goettsche said he had heard that the Italian organist, in addition to organizing concerts in the United States and Germany, is preparing to perform as the papal organist in New Zealand.

Sirius, archdiocese to launch Catholic radio channel

NEW YORK (CNS) — Beginning this fall, the new Catholic Channel on Sirius Satellite Radio will air nationally seven days a week, 24 hours a day, featuring Catholic-oriented talk shows, music programming and live daily Masses from St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York.

The new channel is to be operated jointly by the New York Archdiocese and Sirius.

Programming also will include human interest and inspirational stories, shows offering counseling and guidance and educational programs, as well as "regular and previously unavailable content from the Vatican," the New York-based Sirius said in a news release.

Cardinal Edward M. Egan of New York, who Sirius said would be a "prominent contributor" to the new channel, called it "a splendid opportunity for the church."

"By using this modern medium, we will be able to communicate directly with the Catholic faithful as well as (with) anyone of any religious faith who might be interested in what the Catholic Church is saying and doing here in New York and around the country," he said.

Mel Karmazin, CEO of Sirius, said the company's partnership with the New York Archdiocese "is a significant step forward in our ... mission to provide our listeners with the finest and most distinctive Christian programming on radio."

Other religious-themed programming on Sirius includes EWTN Global Catholic Radio Network, at channel 160; Christian Talk, channel 159; and music channels such as Spirit, channel 66; Revolution, channel 67; and Praise, channel 68.

Sirius said the hosts and guests of the Catholic Channel's talk shows and other programs will be "clergy and distinguished laity from across the nation."

A detailed schedule with specific programs and hosts was to be announced prior to the channel's launch.

Sirius offers 67 commercial-free music channels and 61 channels of sports, news, talk, entertainment, traffic and weather nationwide.

Catholic university plan sparks debate commitment to the project and its prospects for success.

Monaghan, who made his fortune as founder of the Domino's Pizza chain, broke ground in mid-February for Ave Maria town, a 5,000-acre, 11,000-home community to be built around Ave Maria University, which he established as an interim campus in 2003.

He founded Ave Maria College near Ann Arbor, Mich., in 1998, but later elected to move the institution to Florida, prompting a mix of praise and criticism even from his own faculty and administration. He currently is seeking board approval to move the Ave Maria School of Law to the Naples area as well.

More recently, he has faced a media backlash over his stated desire to create a family-friendly atmosphere in Ave Maria, one free of morally problematic elements such as pornography, contraceptives and abortion.

As far back as 2004, he told an audience that he and his partners would "own all commercial real estate" and thus "will be able to control what goes on there."

"You won't be able to buy a Playboy or Hustler magazine in Ave Maria town. We're going to control the cable television that comes in the area. ... If you go to the drugstore and you want to buy the (birth control) pill or the condoms or contraception, you won't be able to get that in Ave Maria town."

Clarifying restrictions

Leading the charge against Monaghan's plans is the American Civil Liberties Union.

Howard Simon, the ACLU's executive director in Florida, said that "arbitrarily discriminating" against who receives reproductive health services could lead to "a whole series of legal and constitutional problems and a lot of litigation."

In early March, Monaghan and his partner-developer, Barron Collier Cos., issued a statement clarifying his previous statements. Monaghan and Paul Marinelli, the president and CEO of Barron Collier, said that there is "a growing misperception" that Ave Maria is to be a "Catholic town, controlled by Tom Monaghan."

Although the town will reflect traditional family values and retailers will be asked to refrain from practices opposed to Catholic teachings, "no restrictions will be enforced on contraceptives or any other inventory," the statement said.

"As far as the town goes, it will end up being whatever it is, obviously, open to everybody," Monaghan told Our Sunday Visitor, a national Catholic newspaper based in Huntington, Ind.

"We have had 20,000 names inquire (about the town's residential lots) from all over the country and beyond. I imagine a lot of them would be Catholics, and strong Catholics," he said.

Some of the restrictions he seeks, Monaghan said, will be covered under lease agreements with the developer — including prohibitions against topless bars and adult bookstores — while others could be more informal understandings among the commercial tenants and the landowners.

Debating the vision

But some Catholics have expressed doubt — much of it debated on the Internet — about the vision of Ave Maria town.

While some see the project as a Catholic, pro-family utopia, others question whether the project represents a return to the "Catholic ghetto," an insulated environment that limits the kind of contact with the diversity of the world that is required for effective evangelization.

In a recent Wall Street Journal report, one alumnus of Ave Maria's law school was quoted as saying that "this town and the university in Florida is going to be a self-contained little Catholic enclave" antithetical to the law school's mission of engaging the world.

But Joseph Varacalli, professor of sociology and director of the Center for Catholic Studies at Nassau Community College on Long Island, in New York, believes such concerns about the campus and town's insularity are unfounded.

"We (Catholics) are different from, say, the Amish in that we are not retreating from the world, but rather trying to be a haven for society," he told Our Sunday Visitor.

"If the goal is to retreat from a world, you are giving up on it," he added. "I don't see the development of the community in Naples opposed to the idea that the university and the community are there to keep the faith alive, and from that base to then go out into the world.

"It would be impossible in the modern world that it could serve as a place where Catholics could associate only with other Catholics," Varacalli added.

Monaghan said he hopes the town will open its first phase in summer 2007.

were familiar with "The Da Vinci Code" story did not believe the book's premise that leaders of the Catholic Church understand the truth as portrayed in the novel but are suppressing it.

Just 12 percent said they believed the book rather than church officials. Another 21 percent said they were unsure about the claims in the book.

Among other things the novel contends Jesus Christ was married to Mary Magdalene and fathered a child.

The poll of 1,049 Catholics nationwide — a Le Moyne College/Zogby International/Contemporary Catholic Trends survey — was conducted May 2-10. It carries a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1 percentage points.

Men were considerably more likely than women to believe the church. In the poll, 78 percent of men said they do not believe church leaders are suppressing the "truth" as portrayed in the film, but just 58 percent of women agreed. One in four women said they were unsure of this point.

"The Da Vinci Code" claims the Vatican knows it is living a lie concerning Jesus, but does so to maintain its influence. The book also claims there is a church-led conspiracy to suppress Jesus' alleged marriage to Mary Magdalene, and his fathering of a "royal bloodline" with her.

The book contends Mary Magdalene is the real Holy Grail because she carries the "blood" of Jesus within her, and that Leonardo da Vinci worked this into his art.

John Zogby, the founding president-CEO of Zogby International, told Catholic News Service he was surprised by the poll findings.

Zogby also said church leaders who are the most familiar to lay Catholics get high approval ratings from them.

"The new pope's ratings were somewhere in the 80s," he said. "The bishops were back into the 60s again (following the clergy sex abuse scandal that broke in 2002). That's something we've been tracking right along."

"And everybody likes a good parish priest," Zogby said.

Zogby — who is a LeMoyne graduate, hence the polling partnership — said he had read the novel.

"I thought it was a wonderful read. I thought it got a little silly toward the end. But it certainly captured me on the first page, and it kept me captured till the very end."

"And I intend to see the movie despite some awful reviews that came out," he added.

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

Hey, Holy Father, over here!

Meeting with pope fuels spiritual high

One of the best parts of the job of being a news reporter is that you get to interact with and take your measure of famous people.

During my days as a reporter, I encountered my fair share. Ronald Reagan was sincere and unassuming; this was before he was elected president. Jimmy Carter was humble, yet very intense; this was after he was president. Arnold Schwarzenegger was friendly and self-confident. Billy Graham was thoughtful and calculating. Jesse Jackson was impatient.

So when I realized that I might have a chance to meet Pope Benedict XVI, I thought I'd "been there, done that" when it came to the excitement of meeting someone famous.

I was wrong.

Encountering Pope Benedict — and I won't overstate this: I got to shake his hand — was an experience that is on a different plane.

For my wife Debbie and me, the occasion was a recent general audience. I was in Rome attending a conference, and had requested tickets to the audience, as anyone can, through the chancery of the Diocese of Charlotte.

As a Catholic, the words "pope," "Holy Father" and "pontiff" have been a part of my vocabulary since I was about three years old. To that lifelong familiarity, add the majesty of St. Peter's Square, the encompassing arms of the colonnade topped by statues of the saints of our faith — all of it in the shadow of the mighty St. Peter's Basilica.

Top-shelf words such as "awe-inspiring" and "thrilling" come up a little short in describing what it is like to be at the wellspring of our faith.

Approximately 40,000 Catholics, Christians and Jews gathered in this cobblestone courtyard for the audience. Some of us arrived in the rain when the gates opened, two-and-a-half hours before the audience began. Seating at a general audience is first-come, first-served, and even though I loathe the idea of waiting for a french fry at a fast-food joint, I had no qualms about devoting a full day of vacation to the possibility of being "in the right place at the right time" with the pope.

When we first arrived at our assigned section, an usher directed us to seats on the third row. Close, but not close enough. Then a small group on the front row moved. We upgraded without hesitation.

A general audience runs about 90 minutes. There was plenty of cheering and some singing from choirs that were on pilgrimage. Then Pope Benedict delivered his message in six languages on devotion to the Eucharist.

At the end of the audience, the hand-shaking starts, first with the disabled who are brought to the Holy Father. Then he moves among the crowd. After walking and greeting people, he climbed into the popemobile and the greeting continued, but now moving at a slightly faster pace.

It looked like he was going to come our way, but you never know about these things until they happen. And then he was right in front of us, stretching out his left hand. That's when Debbie and I shook his hand and received his blessing.

As I shook his small, soft hand, I looked into the eyes of a kindly, caring man. I wanted to say something but the person behind me, who was shouting in Italian, grabbed the Holy Father's attention and then the pope was gone. A fleeting moment, a lifetime memory.

I jokingly said to Debbie, "I guess you can't say that we never do anything interesting."

We were both on a spiritual high that, weeks later, is as fresh as a morning prayer. The famous and the notorious people whom I've interviewed as a reporter were all interesting people, but the pope — the successor of Peter — now there's a guy who really has something to say.

Sleepless in Anchorage

Nighttime worries can be turned into prayers

There was a romantic movie in the early '90s called "Sleepless in Seattle."

Tom Hanks starred as a depressed and sleepless Seattle widower. Meg Ryan's character, on the East Coast, heard his voice on a talk radio show and instantly was intrigued.

If you've never seen the film, you've already guessed that boy eventually met girl.

I think of this movie now and then when I notice my "Sleepless in Seattle" coffee mug. My husband brought it home to me years ago from a trip to Seattle, not because I was a huge fan of the movie but because he knew that while he was sleeping in Seattle, I would be, as usual, "sleepless in Anchorage."

I always have been a poor sleeper. As a recent issue of Newsweek magazine trumpeted on its cover, lots of women can't sleep. The article contained mostly facts I'd already heard or remedies I'd already tried.

And, in fact, through a combination of efforts, I'm a much better sleeper than I once was.

Occasionally, though, I still get those 4 a.m. wakeups. Some folks claim they have brilliant ideas at 4 a.m., but I think more people are like me: We're 4-in-the-morning worriers.

Mark's Gospel contains an intriguing sentence that opens up many thoughts about Jesus: "In the morning, long before dawn, he got up and left the house, and went off to a lonely place and prayed there" (1:35).

Often in Scripture we're reminded of Jesus' desire for contemplative prayer and the example he set for us in pursuing it. I imagine a cramped little house somewhere in Galilee, his fishermen buddies snoring around him and a wakeful Jesus rising in the pre-dawn hours.

Pondering this line once, it suddenly occurred to me: Maybe Jesus couldn't sleep. It was a welcome thought, because it brought Jesus' humanity a little closer to my own.

Sleeplessness can be caused by many things — anxiety, hormonal imbalances, even restless leg syndrome. Sleeplessness is also, as every mother knows, the plaintive cry of an infant in the night or the warm breath of a frightened toddler at your bedside.

Sometimes I think a creative and overactive mind causes sleeplessness. Did Jesus, so brilliant and insightful, ever replay, in the still hours of night, his intellectual jousts with Pharisees?

When we see Jesus' anxiety in the Garden of Gethsemane, we know this was a man who was aware on many levels of the sacrifice he was being called to make. As he lived through those years of intense public ministry, did the night sometimes bring a measure of apprehension?

The line from Mark tells me, though, that Jesus didn't waste time tossing and turning. He was a man with an inner call, and he went to the lonely place where he knew his call would be answered.

Would it be possible to turn our own dark, worry-filled hours to prayer?

In Father Richard Rohr's "Everything Belongs, The Gift of Contemplative Prayer," the Franciscan priest and author presents a prayer that can be used to draw us into the present moment with God.

I think it might be a good prayer for sleeplessness, too:

"Be still, and know that I am God.
Be still, and know that I am.
Be still, and know.
Be still.
Be."

Repeat those lines slowly, weeding out the thoughts that, like bothersome ants at a picnic, crop up between each line. It begins to feel like a welcoming embrace.

Next time I can't sleep, I'm going to see where those words take me.

The core message of Christianity

Jesus' teachings pure, yet often misunderstood

Woody Allen once described Christianity as "pay now, enjoy later." The full truth was more aptly described by St. Catherine of Siena who said, "All the way to heaven is heaven."

There are many other inaccurate views about our Catholic faith that need correction.

For instance, Jesus rejected the worldly view that wealth and social status are sure signs of God's favor. When he said, "Blessed are the poor in spirit for theirs is the kingdom of heaven" (Mt 5:1), he was not condemning the rich, nor was he saying that poverty is a blessing.

The poor, even those who have made themselves poor by renouncing the goods of this world, are not ipso facto among the "blessed." The "blessed" are those who are "poor in spirit," who put God's will before their own.

Jesus never condemned any class of people. Some rich people are scoundrels, and some are saints. What Jesus did condemn was hypocrisy, selfishness and greed. These are found in all classes of people.

When Jesus said, "Blessed are the meek," he wasn't praising weaklings and cowards. Jesus was meek and humble of heart, but he always accepted his Father's will. This often led him to be confrontational. He always practiced tough love.

Spirituality for Today

It takes courage to surmount difficult circumstances.

A few years ago I ran a drug and alcohol rehabilitation center where we had to enforce strict discipline every day in order help our clients recover from their addiction. If you showed weakness around drug addicts, most would surely take advantage of you.

To help them break away from their self-destructive behavior, the staff constantly had to exercise tough love. There was no room for meekness in this setting.

When Jesus said, "Blessed are the peacemakers," he wasn't endorsing absolute pacifism as some biblical literalists imagine. Jesus did not practice a policy of "peace at any price."

Peacemakers include those law enforcement officers who are honorable in their efforts to keep the peace. They put their lives on the line to prevent criminals from plundering the weak.

Also included among "the peacemakers" are those brave men and women who serve their country honorably in the military. Jesus said, "There is no greater love than to lay down one's life for another."

When Jesus said, "Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for justice," he wasn't blessing everyone who rants and raves at a protest rally. He was praising those who struggle to promote a just cause, and he promised that one day they would be satisfied.

Perfect justice may never be attainable in this world, but God blesses those who strive to build a just society.

When Jesus said, "Blessed are the merciful," he wasn't saying that we should never hold people responsible for their actions. Mercy is another name for love when it confronts misery; it is not an invitation for the unruly to force their agenda on others.

Jesus praised the compassionate, but even the compassionate have to crack down on those who engage in anti-social behavior. Love demands both service and fidelity to the common good.

In the Book of Micah Chapter 6:8, we read, "Act justly, to love tenderly, and to walk humbly with your God."

Jesus added, "I have told you (to love one another) so that my joy may be in you and your joy may be complete" (Jn 15:11).

Pope says path of faith not easy, even St. Peter suffered doubt

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The path of faith is not easy, but rather long, arduous, and marked by pain and love, Pope Benedict XVI said during his May 24 general audience.

The day before he was to leave on a May 25-28 trip to Poland, the pope spoke to more than 40,000 people in St. Peter's Square, focusing his catechesis on St. Peter.

He explained that even this apostle, chosen to lead the universal church, still suffered the human weaknesses of doubt and betrayal early in his faith.

St. Peter's early faith in Jesus was not complete, in part because he had not yet witnessed the mystery of Christ's resurrection, the pope said. But his was already an authentic faith that was "open to a greater reality" and believed not in something but in someone, the pope said.

The apostle's great love for Jesus, however, did not protect him from temptation and humiliation, he said. He betrayed Christ, which also made him realize he was weak, the pope said.

It was only after St. Peter saw through his own mask of superiority and faced his sinful heart, the pope said, that he could repent and become ready for his mission to lead the church.

The pope said that for all Christians "the school of faith is not a triumphal march, but a journey peppered with suffering and love," trials and a faithfulness that needs to be renewed every day.

When Jesus asked St. Peter three times, "Do you love me?" St. Peter replied yes, but he felt his love was inadequate, limited by his human heart and doubts, the pope said.

But slowly St. Peter realized that his impoverished love was enough for Jesus, because "Jesus adapts himself to Peter, not Peter to Jesus," the pope said.

Pope Benedict said Jesus works around people's weaknesses. The faithful follow Christ with their limited capacity to love and remain open to his will because "we know Jesus is good and that he accepts us," he said.

Because Jesus accepted St. Peter's fragile love and told him to follow, St. Peter's journey of faith was marked by hope, the pope said, because he knew the Lord was always with him.

St. Peter and all Christians become steadfast witnesses not by becoming perfect, but by remaining "constantly open to the work of the Spirit," he said.

When 'me' plus 'me' doesn't equal 'we'

New alternative lifestyle harms basics of love, commitment

Just when you thought you'd heard the last redefinition of marriage, a new mutation is born.

Apparently, while many were hawking the importance of no-fault divorce, blended families, co-habitation, same-sex marriage and polygamy, a new creature was forming and quietly growing: LAT, or Living-Apart-Together.

LATs are relationships where two people claim to love each other, may have an exclusive sexual relationship and may share some financial expenses, but deliberately do not live together. The bottom line is that LAT "couples" want independence, and don't want to share themselves or their possessions unconditionally with each other.

The number of people in LAT relationships is on the rise in Europe and the United States. Sociologists are at a loss to explain what is causing this trend. Some say it is a reaction to divorce, both from the emotional and economic perspectives: "My kids would never get along with him" or "Why bother joining households and lose a great city apartment?"

An advantage older LAT couples might have is in avoiding the complicated inheritance issues that would arise if they were to marry. Others say it is just a harmless lifestyle alternative for both young and old.

Still, insightful people are worried that it may be simply autonomy run amok.

This last point was starkly highlighted in a New York Times article (May 4, 2006) that featured interviews with couples in LAT relationships. Most spoke about their need for "alone time" or "personal space," or said they didn't want to "wait on" the other person.

In each case, the couples had fiercely narrow views of personal freedom as freedom from the inconvenience of others. It is a warped understanding of freedom where the individual has absolutely no legitimate ties to anyone, according to Jennifer Roback Morse, author of "Smart Sex: How to Find Life-Long Love in a Hook-Up World."

But it also seems like narcissism taken to another level.

A popular dictionary defines love as "unselfish, loyal and benevolent concern for the good of another." Love points to a person's deep connection to another. It requires things like saying "I am yours!"

When a man and a woman love each other as spouses, it goes even further: "And the two shall be one flesh" (Gen. 2:24). "Me" becomes "we."

Pope John Paul II said of this love that it "involves a totality, in which all the elements of the person" are present. "It aims," he said, "at a deeply personal unity." (Familiaris consortio, no. 13)

When a man and a woman recognize each other as "my other half," a whole new self-understanding is born. A symphony of give and take, mystery and recognition forms a deep sense of mutuality.

One need not fear losing one's "individuality." Living a life of love is restorative. It is nothing short of a return to paradise — how God wants us to love!

St. Benedict Church provides welcoming parish, community outreach

GREENSBORO — St. Benedict Church is one of the oldest churches in the Diocese of Charlotte. Established in 1877 as St. Agnes Church, it was founded before there was a Catholic diocese in North Carolina.

The cornerstone of the original church was laid by then-Bishop James Gibbons of Richmond, Va., who would later be named cardinal of Baltimore.

As the years passed, the original church building became too small to accommodate the needs of the growing parish. Therefore, the building was sold to the Greensboro Public School System and became the city's first high school.

Today's church still stands where it did in 1899. At that time, St. Agnes Church became St. Benedict Church in honor of the father of western monasticism and the Benedictine fathers of Belmont Abbey, who staffed the church.

While the new facility was being built, a wealthy Philadelphia woman, Katherine Drexel, founder of the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament for Indians and Colored People, was working to distribute her fortune to benefit African Americans. Drexel learned of the building project and gave St. Benedict Church $1,500 for a new building, with the condition that one of the four rows of pews be reserved for African Americans.

St. Katherine Drexel was beatified Nov. 20, 1988 and canonized Oct. 1, 2000 by Pope John Paul II.

Before World War II, several divisions of National Guardsmen came to Ft. Bragg for maneuvers. Many of the men would travel to Greensboro for the weekend and attend Mass at St. Benedict Church.

Because of the large number of participants, the priest would often celebrate Mass outdoors, leading from the parish hall porch, and the men would kneel in the grass and in the two-lane street, which was blocked off by the city.

By 1994, the brick-venered church had weakened due to age and weather. As a result, the church building received a facelift and the towers were reinforced.

Then-Bishop William G. Curlin dedicated a new parish center Oct. 14, 2000.

Nearly all of the church's 150 families attended the Mass and ceremony, officially marking the start of a new era in the church's long history.

St. Benedict Church now is a community that seeks faithful adherence to the Magisterium of the Catholic Church.

"Our particular charisms include a profound reverence and love for the Eucharist, as well as a strong pro-life stance," said Father Duc "James" Duong, pastor.

Father Duong celebrates a weekday noontime Mass to accommodate the lunchtime schedule of the many Catholics working downtown. First Friday is observed every month with Mass followed by eucharistic adoration and Benediction.

St. Benedict Church provides ample opportunities for everyone to be involved in a variety of service areas within the parish and a wider community, including pro-life work; St. Vincent de Paul Society and SHARE, a food distribution program; Ladies Group; altar serving; Altar Guild and social justice.

"As the 'Mother Church' in the Greensboro area, St. Benedict Church continues to bring the good news to all people with care and love in words and in deeds," said Father Duong.

Despite pressure from supporters of embryonic stem-cell research, "Congress should not be misled" into believing that most Americans back the use of federal funds for research that kills embryos, according to an official of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities.

Richard Doerflinger, deputy director of the pro-life office, cited a new poll that showed 48 percent of Americans oppose federal funding of stem-cell research that requires destroying human embryos, while only 39 percent support such funding.

CAN-DO ATTITUDE

Rosa Murillo pulls her cart with her collection of cans in Troy, N.Y., in early May. Many of the locals think Murillo, 89, is homeless because they see the tiny Colombian woman collecting cans all over the city. But all the money she collects from redeeming the cans for recycling goes to mission work at home and abroad.

Troy woman looks homeless, but she's actually doing mission work

TROY, N.Y. (CNS) — Rosa Murillo laughs as she recalls all the people in Troy who have given her money.

One man watched her redeeming cans for a nickel apiece at a supermarket and handed her a $20 bill. Another person passed her $3 after Mass at St. Anthony of Padua Church.

Many Trojans mistakenly think she's homeless because they see the tiny Colombian woman, clad in an old coat and stocking cap, collecting cans all over the city. They don't realize she has a greater purpose.

All the money that Murillo, 89, collects goes to mission work at home or abroad.

"I have letters from the missions, and they say, 'Send money,' so I say, 'OK,'" she said.

Although she struggles with speaking English, she was eager to make her "mission for the missions" understood.

She came to the United States 40 years ago and worked as a nanny for two families. After hitting retirement, she noticed a woman collecting cans from trash barrels and followed the woman to a grocery store, where she learned about the can-redemption center.

Just like that, she had found her own form of redemption: something to keep her busy in retirement. She got a rolling grocery cart and began collecting cans.

"I feel happy because I'm busy. God, Mary and St. Joseph — they accompany me," Murillo said.

Murillo often pulls in as much as $18 a day collecting cans. When she gets to $200 or $300 — including any money handed to her by helpful benefactors — she brings it to her church, which has Masses in Spanish that she likes to attend. She hands the money to a priest to forward to the missions.

"Every year, I give almost $1,000," she said, smiling.

Franciscan Father Mario Julian, pastor of St. Anthony Church, said Murillo "every so often hands me a brown paper bag with a wad of cash in it."

He distributes her donations among the parish ministries or community programs for the needy.

Other donations have benefited missions in South American countries. After an earthquake hit Costa Rica, Murillo sent money.

Murillo sees collecting cans for the missions as a way of showing gratitude to God for her physical and mental health at her age.

Being mistaken for someone homeless and destitute doesn't bother her. Of those who try to press money on her, she added, "They think I need it, but I know who needs it more."

Catholic-Lutheran dialogue discusses death, judgment, resurrection

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Catholic and Lutheran scholars discussed death, judgment and resurrection at a four-day session of the U.S. Lutheran-Roman Catholic Dialogue.

The April 20-23 meeting in Phoenix was the second session of the 11th round of the dialogue. The theme for this round is "The Hope for Eternal Life."

Questions the group plans to address in future sessions are Catholic-Lutheran differences over issues relating to life after death, including purgatory, indulgences and Masses and prayers for the dead.

"The members of the dialogue team have established solid foundations for further discussion and development," said the Rev. Lowell G. Almen, secretary of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America and Lutheran co-chair of the dialogue.

Auxiliary Bishop Richard J. Sklba of Milwaukee, Catholic co-chair, said, "One of the more illuminating and instructive aspects of the meeting was the manner in which both Lutheran and Catholic scholars were able to reflect on the developing history of their own respective practices since the Reformation."

The way both traditions imagined and described the state of the justified immediately after death "inevitably reflected the various currents of thought in vogue at the time," he said.

"I look forward to a future discussion of the meaning of Dr. Martin Luther's 71st thesis, namely that indulgences are apostolic," Bishop Sklba added. "These serious conversations, especially in view of their pastoral implications, are extremely fruitful."

The U.S. Lutheran-Roman Catholic Dialogue was begun in 1965. The 10th round, 1998-2004, culminated in a common statement that said the Catholic and Lutheran churches are wounded in their ministries and communities by a lack of full Catholic-Lutheran communion.

FROM THE VATICAN

Vatican official: Church in China seeks no privileges, only freedom

VATICAN CITY (CNS). — The Vatican's top foreign affairs official said the church seeks no privileges in China, but only wants the freedom to organize its internal affairs.

The comments by Archbishop Giovanni Lajolo came after a month of heightened church-state tensions in China over the ordination of bishops unapproved by Pope Benedict XVI.

The archbishop said interference by Chinese authorities in the bishop selection process ends up exacerbating divisions among Chinese Catholics.

"As in all countries of the world, the church in China does not seek any privilege but only wants to be free in its internal organization," Archbishop Lajolo said.

He said this was a matter of church law and did not represent an intrusion in the affairs of the Chinese state.

"Likewise, Chinese political authorities should not interfere in the internal ordering of the church and especially in the appointment of bishops," he said.

The archbishop said noninterference by the state in bishops' appointments would bring greater social peace among the Chinese people, who at present are forced to choose between "forced obedience to a so-called patriotic church and belonging to the one Catholic Church in communion with the pope."

From the late 1950s, when the Chinese government formed the Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association, until the mid-1980s, the only Catholic bishops in China recognized as legitimate by the Vatican were those chosen and ordained secretly by other bishops in the underground Catholic community.

Since then, however, many government-approved bishops reconciled with the Vatican, and, increasingly, new spiritual growth and help inactive Catholics bond and share their faith. It will also provide an opportunity for them to discuss any questions or issues with other Catholics and get a sense of the modern-day church. In late April, China began ordaining bishops who had not been approved by the Vatican, and sources in China indicated some of those participating in the ordinations were pressured by the government to do so.

Vatican review of English-language Mass translations picks up speed

VATICAN CITY (CNS). — The Vatican's review of English-language Mass translations is picking up speed as bishops' conferences approve liturgical books.

The Vox Clara Committee, a body of English-speaking bishops appointed to advise the Vatican on translations, met May 29-June 1 and will meet again in July.

The July meeting is likely to focus on reviewing the Order of Mass translations adopted in May by the bishops' conferences of Australia and of England and Wales. U.S. bishops will be asked to approve the translation during their June 15-17 meeting in Los Angeles.

The Order of Mass contains the prayers recited every day at Mass, including prayers for the penitential rite, the Gloria and the creed and the four main eucharistic prayers; it does not include the Scripture readings or the prayers that are specific to a certain Sunday or feast day.

Liturgical translations must be approved by two-thirds of the members of a bishops' conference before they are sent to the Vatican's Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments for final review.

The Vox Clara Committee, in addition to discussing translations that are in progress and making suggestions before the final drafts are presented to the bishops, assists the congregation in reviewing the versions approved by national bishops' conferences.

The committee said June 1 it expected to be able to complete its work of reviewing the English translations of all parts of the Mass by the end of 2007.

The International Commission on English in the Liturgy prepares the translations.

The initial ICEL draft is sent to English-speaking bishops and members of Vox Clara for comment. The final draft is sent to all members of English-speaking bishops' conferences for final action, which may include amendments and changes specific to their country.

The text approved by a bishops' conference is sent to Rome.

Cardinal Francis Arinze, prefect of the congregation, reiterated to Vox Clara members his "unwavering intention to assure the implementation of the (2001 congregation) instruction, 'Liturgiam Authenticam,'" which called for strict translation of texts from the original Latin.

The document also called for specific changes in the English Mass translations, including the people's response "And with your spirit," to the priest's proclamation, "The Lord be with you."

Many bishops had expressed caution over changing texts recited by the faithful during Mass, but Cardinal Arinze said fidelity to the original Latin text must be given precedence over preserving texts in use since the Second Vatican Council.

Mass was celebrated outside the House of the Virgin Mary, where it is believed she was cared for by St. John in her last days.

The group of 32 pilgrims spent 10 days traveling in the footsteps of St. Paul as they visited five Greek islands, Athens and Istanbul, learning of the history of the Catholic Church and deepening their personal faith experiences.

The next diocesan pilgrimage will visit the Holy Land in September. For details, see the ad on page 11.

"This very successful Bible study program, the fastest-growing in the Catholic Church today, was started here in our diocese," said Gail Buckley, program founder and executive director.

The conference featured a variety of speakers, including Hahn, a professor of theology and Scripture at the Franciscan University of Steubenville, Ohio; Shea, a Catholic writer and radio show host; and Olson, author and Catholic apologist.

John Morales, host of the weekly radio show Catholic Exchange Today, served as the conference master of ceremonies. Bishop Peter J. Jugis, who serves on Catholic Scripture Study International's advisory board, gave his imprimatur, or ecclesiastical approval, to the program's leader's manual written by Buckley.

The bishop celebrated the conference's closing Mass.

Other conference speakers included Father Patrick Winslow, pastor of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Jefferson and St. Frances of Rome Church in Sparta, and Father Matthew Kauth, pastor of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Franklin.

Father Winslow and Father Kauth are lecturers for the program, which is now in 40 countries.

showed not only their entertaining personalities but also their great knowledge and deep reverence of our Catholic faith and Scripture," said Buckley.

The conference covered a number of topics, such as Bible resources, managing group discussions, understanding the catechism and starting Catholic Scripture Study programs.

"The conference was a huge success and two Protestants who were in attendance are now (interested in) converting to the Catholic Church," said Buckley. "One said she cried tears of joy all the way home."

Women's Guild celebrates 40 years with Mass, reflections

CHARLOTTE — The Women's Guild at St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte recently celebrated its 40th anniversary.

The celebration, held May 21, included Mass and installation of the guild's 40th board of directors.

Mass was celebrated by Father Mark Lawlor, pastor, and concelebrated by Msgr. William Pharr, a retired diocesan priest who had served as pastor there for 10 years.

A historical slide presentation, prepared by guild member Grace Narus and narrated by first guild president Marianne Loftus, highlighted the many changes at the parish over the last 40 years. Changes included modifications to the church buildings and growth in the parish, which has grown from 100 families to more than 1,673 families.

The guild's mission is to foster unity among women in the parish, encourage spiritual growth, render assistance to the pastor, care for the sacristy and sanctuary, and assist other parish organizations and members of the community.

The Women's Guild helps support the parish's diversity with an annual parish dinner dance featuring more than a dozen cultures reflective of the parish membership.

The guild also has held numerous fundraisers to support the parish, and helped build a rectory and sidewalk on the property.

In addition to supporting outreach organizations throughout the Charlotte-Mecklenburg area, the guild also established the American Red Cross blood drive at the parish and helped found the parish's Girl Scouts and Brownie troops.

Well-classed priests

2006 ordination class better educated, older, survey finds

WASHINGTON (CNS)—Although the number of new priests remains steady, the ordination class of 2006 in the United States is better educated, older and more likely to be foreign-born than their colleagues of years past.

Data gathered by the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Vocations and Priestly Formation was analyzed by the Center for Applied Research in the Apostolate, the Catholic research organization based at Georgetown University in Washington, and made public May 1, as part of an annual report.

Based on survey responses from 233 seminarians from 98 of the 195 U.S. dioceses and 24 of the more than 200 religious orders of men, CARA found that nearly 80 percent of the men scheduled for ordination in 2006 had a bachelor's degree before entering the seminary and 30 percent had earned a graduate degree.

The average age of the class of 2006 is 37, with 22 percent under 30 and 4 percent over 60. Almost a third of the men were born outside the United States.

Based on responses to a separate survey of vocations directors of U.S. dioceses and religious orders, "it appears that the number of ordinands remains steady," the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops said in a news release.

Ordinations numbered 438 last year and 454 the year before, according to the Official Catholic Directory.

The 144 diocesan vocation directors and heads of 44 religious orders who responded to the survey estimated 359 potential ordinands, but about 25 percent of dioceses and 90 percent of religious orders did not respond to the survey.

Exact ordination figures for 2006 will not be available until the 2007 Official Catholic Directory comes out next year.

The Archdiocese of Newark, N.J., has the largest ordination class in 2006, with 17 men slated for ordination. The Archdiocese of Washington reports 12 ordinands, the Archdiocese of Denver 11 and the Diocese of Rockford, Ill., 10.

In the Diocese of Salt Lake City, Utah, where Catholics make up 8 percent of the population, four new priests are being ordained this year.

The Diocese of Charlotte ordained two men to the priesthood June 3.

"These are quality men," said Bishop Blase J. Cupich of Rapid City, S.D., chairman of the U.S. bishops' Committee on Vocations.

"They started out in the seminary with strong educational backgrounds and underwent thorough theological education and spiritual, human and pastoral formation throughout their seminary experience," he said.

SURVEY STATISTICS

Among the survey's other findings:

— The percentage of ordinands who are Asian (13 percent) is higher than the U.S. Catholic Asian population overall (2 percent).

The percentage of Hispanics (12 percent) is lower than the U.S. Catholic Hispanic population (28 percent), and the percentage of African-Americans (1 percent) is lower than the U.S. Catholic African-American population (4 percent).

— The percentage of foreign-born ordinands increased from 24 percent in 1998 to 27 percent last year to 30 percent in 2006.

— About 75 percent of the new priests reported having full-time work experience before entering the seminary, with the most common field being education.

— Almost 10 percent of the ordinands had served in the U.S. armed forces, more than a third of them in the U.S. Navy.

"The variety of backgrounds reflects the variety found in the current Catholic community which will welcome them in parishes nationwide," Bishop Cupich said.

"The generosity of these men needs to be met by the entire community promoting and encouraging their sons to become 'fishers of men.' God has blessed us once again and we pray for continued blessings," he said.

Bishop ordains two men to priesthood

"What joy you bring to all of us this day by responding to Christ's call: 'Come, follow me,'" said the bishop.

Answering the call

Father Ayala first heard the call to the priesthood as a child in his native Argentina.

"I had a beautiful, decisive experience during my first Communion. It marked me deeply and ever since I have pursued embracing religious life," he said.

Father Ayala came to the United States in 1994 and worked as a caretaker at the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville.

"I had a chance to think and pray on the feeling that God was calling me to give my life entirely to follow him," said Father Ayala.

He learned English and applied to be a seminarian for the Diocese of Charlotte. In 2000, he was enrolled in St. Vincent Seminary in Latrobe, Pa.

The experience of being ordained is "hard to put into words," he said.

"It's a wonderful gift of God. I have a great sense of peace and joy," said Father Ayala.

Father Stuhrenberg, who grew up in Charlotte, originally worked as a civilian avionics engineer on military aircraft at the U.S. Marine Corps air station in Cherry Point, N.C.

"I saw (my call) as being like that of Moses ... I'm not the right person," said Father Stuhrenberg. "But God always reminded me that I said I would follow him and go where he wanted me to go."

His calling led him to Blessed John XXIII National Seminary in Weston, Mass.

"Jesus has given me a great love for his people," said Father Stuhrenberg. "I've always been interested in what people think, what they believe and why they believe it."

Priests need to possess a combination of piety, study and prayer, he said.

"Those are a means to be the bridge between people and God," said Father Stuhrenberg.

"It's a wonderful day for the Diocese of Charlotte. It shows the Holy Spirit is moving in the hearts of men to respond to the invitation to serve at the altar and to nourish the people of God," said Father Christopher Gober, diocesan vocations director.

"Fathers Ayala and Stuhrenberg both bring a spirit of joy and willing service. They will be blessings for the faithful on their first assignments," he said.

Father Stuhrenberg has been assigned as parochial vicar of St. Mark Church in Huntersville; Father Ayala as parochial vicar of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury.

"The process of formation that started long ago and continued in seminary still continues for the newly ordained priest," said Father Ayala.

"I'm looking forward to serving the people and learning under the faithful experience of Father John Putnam (pastor of Sacred Heart Church)," said Father Ayala.

Serving like Christ

The parish priest serves as Christ the Shepherd, Christ the Teacher and Christ the Priest, said Bishop Jugis.

"Jesus ... had compassion for the vast crowds who followed him," said the bishop, "and the priest in his parish is surrounded by the vast crowds of his parish family and he has compassion for all of them, sharing in their joys, their sorrows and in their striving to live the Catholic faith."

"He shepherds them, tending them as his flock, and he nourishes them on the bread of life and the cup of eternal salvation ... the body and blood of Jesus Christ in the holy Eucharist, so they can make progress in the life of grace," said the bishop.

As a teacher, Jesus proclaimed the Gospel to the great crowds who followed him. The priest, said Bishop Jugis, must teach the Gospel and faith of Christ to the parish who follows him.

The spiritual union between Christ and his priests is an intimate one, said Bishop Jugis.

"When speaking to his first priests, the Apostles, at the Last Supper, he used the word 'friends' to describe his relationship with them: 'I call you my friends because I have told you everything I have learned from my Father,'" said Bishop Jugis.

Jesus' character is permanently impressed upon a priest, said the bishop.

"There is a unique oneness of Christ with his priests ... a special relationship of belonging to the Master, which allows the priest to act in the person of Christ," said Bishop Jugis.

The bishop asked three things of the new priests: to pray, love and serve.

"Sanctify each day through your prayer ... love with boundless generosity ... and serve for the salvation of your brothers and sisters," he said. "You are ordained not for yourself, but for their sanctification and salvation."

Priests "are the hands and feet of Christ, doing the work of Christ, with Christ," said Father Stuhrenberg. "Jesus promised me it would be a partnership."

Ordination Mass

Concelebrants of the ordination Mass included Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and diocesan chancellor; Father Gober; and other priests serving in the Diocese of Charlotte. In attendance was Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin.

During the rite of ordination, Fathers Ayala and Stuhrenberg confirmed their promises to fulfill the office of the priesthood. Kneeling, they placed their hands between Bishop Jugis' hands in a promise of obedience to the diocese.

The congregation was invited to join in prayer for the priestly candidates, the church and its people as they lay prostrate before the altar.

During the rite's most solemn moment, Fathers Ayala and Stuhrenberg knelt before Bishop Jugis, who laid his hands on their heads. The celebration of the sacrament of holy orders was completed as the bishop extended his hands over the kneeling candidates and prayed the prayer of consecration.

Fathers Ayala and Stuhrenberg were vested with stoles and chasubles — outer garments of the priestly office. The bishop anointed their hands with sacred chrism and they were then presented with chalices and patens signifying their roles as celebrants of the Eucharist.

Father James Stuhrenberg, a native of California who grew up in Charlotte, studied for the priesthood at Blessed John XXIII National Seminary in Weston, Mass.

The newly ordained Fathers Ayala and Stuhrenberg then joined their brother priests to concelebrate the Mass, thus opening the new chapter in their lives.

All walks of life

Religious vocations can come from any place

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A few years ago Teresa Min-Sook Kim was a young Korean immigrant in Minnesota, a non-Catholic who spoke little English.

Jay Toborowsky was a young Jewish man working as an aide to the mayor of Woodbridge, N.J.

Carol Derynioski had been teaching more than 25 years and had her own home in Boca Raton, Fla.

What do they have in common? Now each is called "Sister" or "Father" and is an example of the way the call to priesthood or religious life can be heard.

It was 15 years ago that Kim — now Sister Kim in the Sisters of St. Joseph of Carondelet — telephoned her college algebra teacher, Sister Agnes Foley, to tell her she wanted to become a nun.

She said what drew her to a religious vocation was the sense of peace and freedom she found embodied in Sister Foley.

At the time Sister Kim was not Catholic. She had grown up in a nominally Protestant family, but had rejected religion and any notion of God after her sister died in 1987.

"It was a crazy idea at first" to want to be a nun, but when she made that phone call, she said, "I knew."

Over the years that followed, Sister Kim struggled to learn English, learned about Catholicism, was baptized, became a lay associate of the sisters, and in 2000 took her first vows as a Sister of St. Joseph.

On April 22 she took her final vows at the sisters' chapel in St. Paul.

"She is an Asian woman joining a province that has no other Asian women as vowed members," Sister Foley told those gathered for the event. "Remarkably, she has been able to bridge two cultures, and we need that."

Sister Kim said she has found what she thinks many people are seeking and have not yet found. "In that sense, I am so blessed," she said.

Mass, he would accompany her. But he attended a Jewish elementary school through fifth grade and learned Hebrew as a child — something that would come in handy years later in seminary studies.

He said he made Catholic friends when he started attending public schools and he felt deeply affected by Pope John Paul II's 1979 visit to New York.

During his college years, Father Toborowsky said he started thinking more seriously about life's big questions and felt himself drawn toward Catholicism. He was baptized in 1990 and became increasingly active in volunteer roles at St. Anthony Parish in Port Reading, N.J.

In 1992 the Metuchen Diocese accepted him into the seminary and in 1998 he was ordained. While he was in the seminary, he said, his father began seeing a priest for spiritual direction and also converted to Catholicism.

Father Toborowsky, now an associate pastor of St. Mary Church in Alpha, N.J., and moderator of the weekly diocesan radio program, "Proclaim the Good News," said he did not feel certain of his call to the priesthood until "the day I was ordained a deacon."

He said he advises young men who are considering the priesthood not to let doubts or fears deter them.

"Think you can't do it? So did I," he said. "Think you're not good or holy enough? Been there, done that."

Filling a void

Carol Derynioski grew up Catholic in Connecticut, the oldest of five children, and entered the Daughters of Mary of the Immaculate Conception as a teenager.

But her father died during her third year in religious life and "I left the community the next year to help my family," she said.

She earned a college degree and taught for 26 years. But she felt a restlessness. She returned to her former order and for six years taught school as Sister Mary Carol, most recently in Ware, Mass.

It was not enough, she said. "I felt that although I was living in an active community I was drawn to the contemplative life."

After learning about the Monastery of the Mother of God in West Springfield, a community of contemplative Dominicans, she contacted them. Last August she entered the monastery and in February she took the white veil of a novice and the name Sister Maria Gianna of the Divine Mercy.

She said back in her teens she probably would not have been mature enough to understand contemplative life or persevere in it. She believes God used her experiences to bring her to this point.

Spiritual adoption

Having a connection with nuns and priests and learning about the paths many take to ecclesial vocations is one of the aims of an apostolate at Holy Trinity School in Greenfield, Mass. The youngsters have adopted and been adopted — spiritually — by religious orders.

That started when Marcie Zimmerman, a mother of two of the students, started thinking about the fact that few children today have the opportunity to know members of religious congregations.

With support and input from the principal, she wrote to about 25 communities of men and women religious, inviting them to connect with the students and adopt a class that they would pray for. The students in turn post pictures in class of "their" communities of priests, brothers or sisters, correspond with them and pray for them.

The groups range from religious communities in Massachusetts to the Canons Regular of Jesus the Lord in Vladivostok, Russia.

Zimmerman said many of the communities were delighted with the spiritual adoption idea and said they had never been approached that way before. The program has led to visits to the school by several members of the religious communities involved.

Who knows which student there might some day, years from now, feel a restless tug toward priesthood or religious life?

ASHEVILLE — "Ago?" the students were asked, meaning, "Do I have your attention?"

"A'me," they replied, meaning, "Yes."

The students were participating in dialogue used between teachers and students throughout Africa.

It was part of a weeklong residency during which two Zulu tribe members brought their music, art, culture and history to third-, fourth- and fifth-graders at Asheville Catholic School in May.

As part of a group of professional performers and teachers, Shaka and Naimah bring their culture to schools throughout the United States. Relocated after Hurricane Katrina from New Orleans to Atlanta, they continue teaching students about the Zulu in New Orleans as well as the history of Mardi Gras.

Hands-on history

St. Matthew School students experience 18th-century life

BY KAREN A. EVANS

CHARLOTTE — The fifth-graders of St. Matthew School in Charlotte recently took a field trip to the past.

Camp Flintlock set up a Colonial era-style encampment on the school's campus May 31, introducing the students to the crafts, games and chores of families during the 1770s.

"We chose this time period because we study all of the history of the United States," said Utahnah Miller, fifth-grade teacher. "Camp Flintlock was the only place that would provide hands-on activities."

Camp Flintlock was created in 1999 to teach young people about Colonial history in an authentic historical context.

The students learned to make fudge over an open fire, bookbinding, candle making and jewelry making.

Fifth-grader Jennifer Holder was surprised that children living in the 1770s had time to play games like tug-of-war, nine pins and hoop racing.

"I thought they would stay inside, and it would be boring," she said.

After dressing up in a period costume, student Nicholas Shoat decided he would rather live in 1776 than 2006.

"They were more adventurous — hunting and fishing," Nicholas said. "You had to meet your own needs."

Youths, priest recognized at DYC

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Three high school students and a priest were recognized for living out their faith and outstanding personal qualities and community service.

The awards were given at the 29th annual Diocesan Youth Conference near Black Mountain April 28-30.

Kierstan Snyder received the Bishop Michael J. Begley Award in recognition for demonstrating the attributes of Bishop Begley: outstanding character, parish involvement and service to the community.

She serves as a faith formation teacher, Vacation Bible School crew leader and RCIA sponsor at Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro.

In her community, Snyder has participated in CROP WALK, LifeSpan and the Interfaith Youth Symposium. She has volunteered for Pathways, a homeless shelter; and organizes bingo games for residents at Maryfield Health Care Households Neighborhood in High Point.

Lianna Beard received the Eagle of the Cross, a national award from the National Federation for Catholic Youth Ministers. It is awarded to a youth that demonstrates outstanding faith in action.

A parishioner of St. Barnabas Church in Arden, Beard participates in her parish youth ministry and youth music programs, is an altar server and is involved in pro-life activities.

A member of the National Honor Society and Spanish club at her school, Beard tutors middle school students in algebra and seventh-grade math.

Billy Sutton, a parishioner of St. James the Greater Church in Concord, received the St. Timothy Award, which is awarded to a youth demonstrating leadership qualities. Sutton has served in a number of parish ministries, including altar server, extraordinary minister of holy Communion, faith formation teacher and vocations advocate.

A third-degree Knight of Columbus, Sutton is a member of the Diocesan Youth Advisory Council.

Augustinian Father James Cassidy, pastor of Our Lady of Lourdes Church in Monroe, received the John Paul II Award in recognition of his service to the youth community. Father Cassidy has served as homilist and confessor at the conference for the past three years.

Cadettes bring audio books, joy to children

GREENSBORO — Eight members of Girl Scout Cadette Troop 16 at Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro recently received Silver Awards, the highest award that can be earned by cadettes.

The award has several progressive steps, all of which prepare the cadettes, ages 11-14, to design and conduct a service project.

For their project, the cadettes recorded onto tape more than 100 books. They donated the tapes, books and 10 recorders to the Pathways Center, a housing program of Greensboro Urban Ministry that provides temporary shelter to families seeking housing.

The cadettes enlisted others to help record the books, including Father James Ebright, parochial vicar at Our Lady of Grace Church, and a Spanish teacher from Guilford Middle School.

They delivered the donated items to the center March 5, and celebrated with a reading party with Girl Scout cookies for the children there.

The eight award winners were Molly Ball, 14; Emily Byerly, 13; Nicole Agresto, 14; Myriah Dixon, 14; Nikki Curnes, 14; Audrey Amolegbe, 13; Christiane Ruggiero, 14; and Patty Simril, 13.

Extension of faith

Catholic magazine marks 100 years of covering U.S. mission territory

CHICAGO (CNS) — The Catholic magazine Extension is celebrating 100 years of bringing Catholics the stories of missions in rural areas across the United States.

The Catholic Church Extension Society, which publishes Extension, has published a commemorative issue with articles, photos and stories that capture the culture of the Catholic Church and noteworthy church events over the last century.

In an effort to serve Catholics in rural and remote areas, the Catholic Extension organization was founded in 1905, and six months later, in 1906, the magazine was founded.

The Chicago-based organization has given more than $400 million over the years to construct chapels, educate seminarians, and provide campus ministry, religious education and more in U.S. mission dioceses.

"So many Catholics who know about missions in the United States have learned this from Extension magazine," said Bishop William R. Houck, Catholic Extension president.

"What a vision back in 1906 to have this wonderful way to spread the word about life in our home missions," he said.

Going through back issues is kind of like entering "a Catholic time machine," said Bradley Collins, the magazine's editor for the past 25 years.

Over the years, the magazine has become a repository of archival information and is often used by parishes to learn more about their past, Collins said.

Extension has featured work by a variety of artists, including the late Thornton Utz, whose work is displayed at the National Gallery in Ireland and the Smithsonian Institution in Washington.

Franklin McMahon is another renowned artist who began illustrating Extension's short stories in 1941. His art has since been featured in national publications, from Harper's and Sports Illustrated to Life and The Saturday Evening Post.

His son, Mark, illustrated a story for the magazine in 1992.

According to a news release on Extension's anniversary, a number of writers well-known today, including Mary Higgins Clark and Taylor Caldwell, had their first stories published by the magazine before they became household names.

Editor's Note: Subscriptions to Extension magazine are free. Readers can receive 12 months of the magazine by calling: (800) 842-7804, or online at: www.catholicextension.org.

God's grace heals our wounds, sins

BY DAN LUBY

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

"We will do everything that the Lord has told us," the people shout as one voice fervent with affirmation and confidence.

They sound so eager, so convinced, so willing to get it right this time.

That's why this enthusiastic response to Moses' proclamation of God's message makes us wince to hear it now, centuries after the fact.

For we know that despite their sincere desire to make up for their long history of shortcomings and failures of generosity and imagination and nerve, they won't get it right.

We see, with the 20/20 clarity of hindsight, that Israel lets God down, not only there in the Sinai but over and over for centuries. We know because we have listened sadly to the endless round of stories detailing Israel's capacity for self-deception, for willful deafness to God's call.

Generation after generation they will behave in ways that are faithless, inconstant, selfish.

When we hear their overconfidence we shake our heads in sorrowful recognition of our kinship with these spiritual ancestors.

Like them, our good intentions and commitments to conversion all too often prove shallow. Like them, we are tragically quick to violate the principles and betray the values of God's covenant.

The bad news then is that we are sinners, that we cannot make ourselves worthy.

The good news of the readings for this Solemnity of the Body and Blood of Christ is that the covenant depends not on our faithfulness, but the Lord's; not on our heroism, but Christ's; not on our generosity, but God's.

We are healed of our wounds, forgiven our sins, imbued with the presence of Christ through our participation in the Eucharist. In the end, we are saved, not by our efforts, but by God's grace, made tangible as food and drink in the celebration of the Mass.

That is as good as news can be.

Questions:

What is one way I experience the nourishing power of the Eucharist? Concretely, how can I make my participation in the Eucharist more intentional?

Content control

Bishop Kicanas favors 'net neutrality' regulation for Internet

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Noncommercial religious speech on the Internet is threatened unless protections are put in place to guard against Internet access providers having control over content, the chairman of the U.S. bishops' Committee on Communications said in a May 23 letter to Congress.

"The Internet was constructed as a unique medium without the editorial control functions of broadcast television, radio or cable television," said Bishop Gerald F. Kicanas of Tucson, Ariz., in the letter.

"The Internet is open to any speaker, commercial or noncommercial, whether or not the speech is connected financially to the company providing Internet access, whether it is popular or prophetic," he said.

"Those characteristics make the Internet critical to noncommercial religious speakers," said the bishop.

The House Judiciary Committee May 25 approved a bill requiring that Internet service providers give equal access to all Web services, content and applications, a principle called "net neutrality."

"Net" refers to the broadband network created by Internet service providers.

Proponents of net neutrality fear the nation's Internet service providers — mainly large telephone and cable television companies — would charge more to guarantee equal access, and slow down access for those who don't pay.

Opponents say net neutrality is a solution in search of a problem.

"Unless Congress requires telephone and cable companies to act as neutral providers of Internet access, as they had been required to do since the birth and through the spectacular growth of the Internet, those companies will use their control over Internet access to speed up or down connections to Web sites to benefit themselves financially," Bishop Kicanas said.

"If the Internet becomes, as it inevitably will without strong protections for net neutrality, a medium where speakers must pay to deliver their messages, religious speech will be effectively barred from the Internet," he said.

The debate over net neutrality arises from a Federal Communication Commission decision to classify broadband providers as information services rather than telecommunications services.

The old regulation meant these providers had to open their high-speed networks to other Internet service providers on nondiscriminatory terms and follow other common carrier rules.

FCC commissioner Michael Copps, a Catholic, told reporters May 22 the FCC has the authority to impose net neutrality.

"I think we have authority to go now to the second phase of network neutrality, to make sure that there's not discrimination against those that are not affiliated with the network owners," Copps said.

"I think we have a good bit of authority in serving the public interest in keeping the networks open to move ahead on this," he said.

The debate on net neutrality has already provided for some unusual alliances. In addition to the U.S. bishops, others calling for such neutrality include the Christian Coalition, the Gun Owners of America, large Internet firms such as Microsoft and Google, and Trent Reznor, leader of the hard rock band Nine Inch Nails.

'Cars' worth a spin

Mater, a rusty but trusty tow truck, and hotshot rookie racecar Lightning McQueen are pictured in a scene from "Cars," a delightful computer-animated movie set in a world of anthropomorphic autos.

McQueen (voiced by Owen Wilson), while en route cross-country to compete in a prestigious championship, is unexpectedly detained in a neglected desert town, where his growing friendship with the town's four-wheeled residents (voiced by Paul Newman, Bonnie Hunt and Larry the Cable Guy, among others) effects a change of heart regarding fame in the fast lane. The film has a full tank of humor and emotions — not to mention bar-raising visuals — while its solid storytelling imparts a charming message about taking the time to appreciate what really matters in life.

Author creates Web site devoted to American Catholic history

SIDNEY, Ohio (CNS) — While writing two books on Catholic history, Kevin Schmiesing discovered that "although there was a wealth of information pertaining to American Catholic history on the Web no one had collected and organized it."

So Schmiesing has launched a new Web site devoted to American Catholic history at www.catholichistory.net.

Intended as a resource for students, teachers and researchers, the site displays important events, people and places, organized by time period, and offers lists of suggested readings on topics such as "Catholics in time of war."

The "Spotlight" feature looks at a subject currently in the news from the perspective of its significance in Catholic history. Recent topics have included immigration, Catholics on the Supreme Court and Catholics in Hollywood.

Catholichistory.net, which relies solely on donations, has an advisory board that includes history professors from various universities.

Schmiesing said he hopes the Web site leads to greater awareness of the country's Catholic past.

"All Catholics should have a basic understanding of the history of their faith in the American context," he said.

A rival bill that previously passed the House Energy and Commerce Committee would codify principles the FCC adopted last year that encourage Internet service providers to ensure the Internet is open to consumers to go where they want to on it.

Immigration director outlines potential changes known as CIS, outlined his efforts to be ready for major new immigration programs that could come out of legislation in the works in Congress if the measure becomes law.

The agency could be managing a new guest worker system, and handling legalization for agricultural workers, for students whose parents brought them to the country as minors as well as for millions of others who are in the country illegally.

He also said that regardless of new mandates from Congress, many fees charged for the agency's ongoing services likely will increase to better cover costs.

Circumstances and compromise

If a legalization program is approved by Congress and signed into law, Gonzalez said that unless there are clear security concerns, he would not be inclined to take information gathered from unsuccessful applicants for legalization and turn it over to enforcement authorities at Immigration and Customs Enforcement, known as ICE.

Both agencies, formerly part of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, are now within the Department of Homeland Security.

A bill passed by the Senate May 25 would offer all but the most recently arrived of the estimated 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants in the United States a chance to legalize their status after meeting certain conditions.

The provision is one of the many differences between the Senate bill and one passed by the House in December that focused entirely on enforcement.

A House-Senate conference committee was to begin hammering out a compromise between the two bills the first full week of June. Some congressional sources expect no resolution before late summer at best.

A 1986 legalization program included provisions protecting confidentiality. The federal immigration agency was prohibited from using any information it obtained from applicants and giving it to enforcement authorities.

CIS staff members at the May 31 briefing explained that the provision was intended to encourage people to apply for legalization without fear that merely seeking legal status would cause them to be deported.

Gonzalez said it would be unwise to have such a broad confidentiality guarantee given current security concerns, but that he expected his agency would only pass along information about people with outstanding warrants or other connections to crimes.

Though he said he would comply with whatever the law ultimately says, he wouldn't be inclined to have his agency provide details that might lead to deportation for people whose legalization applications are rejected but who have clean criminal records.

The Senate bill provides for confidentiality except in connection with the investigation or prosecution of certain crimes when information is requested by an enforcement agency.

'A moving target'

Gonzalez told reporters that his agency is gearing up for a wide range of new responsibilities and changes in its current work, although much remains uncertain about the final legislation — including whether it even will include legalization and guest worker programs.

He pointed out that amid heated debate about immigration, little attention has been given to the fact that the 800-page Senate bill also includes changes intended to eliminate backlogs of applications for legal immigration.

That also will affect what he called "the day job" at CIS: approving visas, processing applications for asylum and refugee status, and naturalizing citizens.

He said CIS will make recommendations to Congress about the bill he called "a moving target," with many variables and some elements that are simply unworkable as written.

For instance, he said the Senate bill calls for applicants for legalization to register with the government within a 90-day period. Given that as many as 10 million people might apply for legalization, Gonzalez said that time frame is unrealistic.

"In a perfect world it would take nine to 12 months," he said.

One change Gonzalez said appears likely is that application fees will increase for many of his agency's services. Citizenship applications now cost $330, plus a $70 fingerprinting fee.

Fees don't cover costs, he said, and it's unlikely that Congress will approve funding to pay for services.

Although an agency ombudsman recently recommended that CIS begin charging for asylum or refugee applications, Gonzalez said that's one cost he won't pass along to applicants.

"It's never been done before," he said. "Nor will it be as long as I'm here."

"How do you charge refugees?" Gonzalez asked. "That's a cost we happily absorb."

Most Americans oppose embryonic stem-cell research, survey finds

The rest said they didn't know or refused to answer.

When told that scientists disagree on whether embryonic stem cells or adult stem cells would "end up being more successful in treating diseases," 57 percent of survey respondents said they favored research "using adult stem cells and other alternatives, to see if there is no need to destroy human embryos for research."

Only 24 percent said they would support "all methods, including those that require destroying human embryos, to see which will be most successful." Another 11 percent said they did not support either option, and the rest said they didn't know or declined to answer.

The poll was conducted by telephone among 1,022 U.S. adults May 19-23. Commissioned by the pro-life secretariat and conducted by International Communications Research, the survey had a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1 percent.

The May 31 release of the poll results coincided with the first-year anniversary of passage in the House of Representatives of the Stem-Cell Research Enhancement Act, which would lift the ban on federal funding of stem-cell research involving the destruction of human embryos.

The legislation was expected to come before the Senate in June.

"Most Americans do not support federally funded research that requires destroying human embryos," Doerflinger said in a statement.

"Our opponents also know this. No doubt this is why their public statements — and many of their own opinion polls — either ignore or misrepresent what this research involves, while irresponsibly hyping its potential for miracle cures," he said.

Polls by International Communications Research in August 2004 and May 2005 had similar results, with most Americans saying they did not support embryonic stem-cell research. The highest level of support was 43 percent in 2004.

The latest survey also found overwhelming opposition to human cloning. Asked whether scientists should be allowed to use cloning "to try to create children for infertile children," 83 percent said no and less than 10 percent said yes.

When asked about using cloning "to create a supply of human embryos to be destroyed in medical research," 81 percent were opposed and 11 percent said they were in favor.

Although the 2004 and 2005 polls conducted by International Communications Research showed strong opposition to human cloning, the new poll's figure of 81 percent opposed to cloning human embryos for research was the highest in three years.

A 'moral duty'

Catholic doctors urge substitutes for abortion-linked vaccines

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Catholics should pressure pharmaceutical companies and government authorities to quickly come up with alternatives to vaccines derived from cells taken from aborted fetuses, according to an association of U.S. Catholic physicians.

The Catholic Medical Association said in a mid-May statement that "physicians and patients are permitted to use the vaccines when no effective alternative is available."

But patients may decide not to use vaccines derived from aborted fetuses as long as the refusal does not place children or the general public at significant risk, the statement added.

Vaccines derived from cell lines that used tissue taken from voluntarily aborted fetuses include those for rubella (German measles) and hepatitis A, marketed under the names Meruvax, Vaqta and Havrix.

When alternative versions of the vaccines are available, "they must be used in place of those produced by immoral means," the Catholic Medical Association said.

The organization, founded in 1932, describes itself as the nation's largest professional association of Catholic doctors.

The statement was drawn from a June 2005 document of the Pontifical Academy for Life called "Moral Reflections on Vaccines Prepared From Cells Derived From Aborted Human Fetuses," the association said.

The Vatican academy said Catholics have a "moral duty to continue to fight and to employ every lawful means" to convince the pharmaceutical industry, government agencies and national health systems to make ethical alternatives available.

"The bottom line is that vaccines derived from abortions should mainly be avoided and used only when alternatives are unavailable," said Robert Saxer, executive vice president of the Catholic Medical Association.

"But there is really no reason why those alternatives should be unavailable. The pharmaceutical companies that manufacture the vaccines have the ability and know-how to produce versions of these vaccines which do not depend on cell lines from aborted fetuses.

"They should be pressured to develop those vaccines to meet the health needs of those who have religious and ethical objections to abortion," he said.

Saxer said the Food and Drug Administration could allow licensing and importation of "safe and effective ethical alternative vaccines ... and it has a moral duty to exercise that authority."

Richard Doerflinger, deputy director of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities, said his office would work with the Catholic Medical Association and other groups "to help make alternative vaccines readily available in the United States."

Columnist dishonors vets, skews truth

What a shame to dishonor our dedicated combatants with Tony Magliano's column ("Taking Memorial Day more seriously," May 19) with the following statement: "The lust for power and greed, arrogance, nationalism, the military industrial complex, lack of imagination and ineptitude are the real reasons young people are sent to kill and be killed."

The Catholic News & Herald must be more compassionate to the family members who have dedicated sons and daughters as soldiers, who may think their children are dying for those emotional unsubstantiated accusations.

Magliano's shameful assertion column should have limited itself to praise for these honored deaths.

— Dick Webber
Hendersonville

How unfortunate that on this Memorial Day weekend you printed "Taking Memorial day more seriously" by the anti-military and foolish Tony Magliano.

Does he really believe that a strong military is not a deterrent to world domination by some current despots? Does he think Taiwan would be free today if not for the United States?

How would World Wars I and II have turned out if we didn't lead the way to freedom? How many extermination camps did the United States and Allies liberate?

Today, Iraq and Afghanistan have a chance for freedom and self determination. And yet Magliano is critical of our country taking part in that action. I wonder if he is aware that Isaiah said and Jesus commanded us "to set free the oppressed"?

And then Magliano starts with this "change of heart" nonsense. How can you convert a person whose only purpose in life is to see you dead? After all, they believe God told them to kill us "infidels."

People such as Cindy Sheehan and Magliano owe every veteran — alive or dead — an apology. How shameful!

— R.W. Keenan
Horseshoe, N.C.

I strenuously object to Tony Magliano's column on "Taking Memorial Day more seriously," and I hope he has a different "take" on Memorial Day than he displayed.

Those soldiers who have died to keep us free, and to potentially keep others from being killed, deserve more than just our respect. They gave their lives at the prime of theirs. I recall Jesus telling us that "man has no greater love than to lay his life down for a friend."

Letters to the Editor

My son was shot in Iraq while trying to prevent terrorists from committing another 9/11. Certainly 9/11 should have been a wake-up call, and I hope Magliano has not forgotten about that. Yet he seems grossly out of touch by claiming military strength does not bring peace.

It should be obvious that the strength of the United States has prevented numerous wars and merciless killings. America has never entered a war to purposely kill — only to prevent as much killing as possible.

I seriously hope no terrorist ever knocks on Magliano's door. Then again, they wouldn't be knocking.

Abortion observers bear responsibility, sin

Father Frank Pavone's column about "The 'tragic triangle'" (May 19) around abortion, and particularly the role of observers, was most interesting to me.

Observers of sin (particularly that in which an innocent victim is harmed) do have greater responsibility because they often have, or should have, greater objectivity, and because their passive consent has tremendous meaning to both the victim and to the perpetrator.

Standing by and letting others be hurt (even from the sidelines) is a decision to participate in sin.

I pray we all recognize our propensity to remain passively quiet in the face of wrongdoing whether it be abortion, child abuse within a family, or any abuse of power. It is never easy to speak out, but it is our calling.

Our forgotten heroes

Father's Day to remember sacrifices, victories of dads

We are a nation of children, mothers and fathers. Since we have set aside special celebrations for children and mothers, why not celebrate our fathers?

The idea to honor our fathers actually developed during a Mother's Day sermon.

In spring 1909, Mrs. John Bruce Dodd of Spokane, Wash., heard a Mother's Day sermon that did not mention the word "father." Her mother had died when she was a child and her father was charged with raising her and her five siblings.

Through Mrs. Dodd's influence, the first Father's Day was observed in Spokane June 19, 1910, and on a national level in 1924.

I call my father and all fathers the "forgotten heroes," because by reading Chapter 3 of the book of Ecclesiasticus (Sir.3:1-16), I realize how much we didn't do for our fathers, and yet our fathers kept on doing their best without being recognized.

When I was cleaning my closet, I found some papers that I saved long ago in a torn cardboard box. One was a worn newspaper article quoting a broadcast of radio legend Paul Harvey. The title was "What is a father?"

A father is a thing that is forced to endure childbirth without anesthetic. A father is a thing that growls when he feels good and laughs too loud when he's scared half to death.

A father never feels entirely worthy of the worship in a child's eyes. He is never quite the hero his daughter thinks ... never quite the man his son believes him to be.

Fathers fight dragons almost every day. They hurry away from the breakfast table to the arena that is an office or a factory.

They never quite win the fight, but they never give up. Knights in shining armor and fathers in shiny trousers are very much alike, as they march out to face the world each day.

Our fathers are so important that we take for granted what they do every day.

While driving on I-40, a bumper sticker on the car ahead caught my attention recently. It was about father and dad: "Any man can be a father. It takes a special man to be a daddy."

Any healthy male can biologically generate children, but in my ministry I've discovered that many men are role models, whether they have biological offspring or not. They are the unsung heroes with a love song always in their hearts.

My father was not a preacher. He really didn't speak too much, but preached according to the Franciscan philosophy: "Preach always, sometimes use words."

Words teach, but example compels. For me, the father is a teacher who doesn't know everything, but he knows that he doesn't know and that's real wisdom.

A father was walking with his young son. The boy asked, "Daddy, what is electricity?"

Guest Column

"Well now, I don't know," said the father. "All I know about electricity is that it makes things run."

A little farther on, the boy asked, "Daddy, how does gasoline make automobiles go?"

The father replied, "Well, I don't know. I don't know too much about motors."

Several more questions followed with much the same result, until at last the boy said, "Gee, Dad, I hope you don't mind my asking so many questions!"

"Not at all, son," said the father, "You go right ahead and ask. How else will you ever learn anything?"

The father knows he is not perfect, but yet we love him. For him, "discipline" means more than chastisement or punishment, which can be misunderstood by the children.

Gen. Douglas MacArthur has been quoted to have said this prayer:

"Build me a son, O God, who will be strong enough to know when he is weak and brave enough to face himself when he is afraid; one who will be proud and unbending in honest defeat, but humble and gentle in victory ...

"Give him humility so that he may always remember the simplicity of true greatness, the open mind of true wisdom, the meekness of true strength; then I, his father, will dare to whisper, 'I have not lived in vain.'"

Yes, General, you have not lived in vain and we will not whisper, but shout, "Happy Father's Day, General!"

Father Aurilia is pastor of Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville.

Got 'windows'?

Parents must talk to kids about Internet dangers

As children grow and mature, they demonstrate an increasing desire to assume more responsibility for themselves and their activities.

It can be extremely confusing for parents when it comes to knowing how much privacy to allow their children in their use of the Internet. When trying to decide on a comfortable level of freedom, parents should consider the following:

— Even in adolescence, the brain is growing and developing into an adult brain. Not only are the "wires" and the "departments" of the brain continuing to come together and become complete, brain chemistry is in flux as well.

The most well-behaved and well-intentioned kids are still prone to questionable judgment from time to time.

— Raging hormones — enough said.

— Trusting kids is one thing; trusting the Internet community is another.

As tempting as it may be to strictly curtail kids' usage of the Internet, it is unfortunately all too easy for our children to find access to it somewhere. When they use the Internet outside of the house, we are in the dark about where they have been on the Web.

Creating "windows" into our children's Internet use is probably our best bet to maintain healthy parental controls. Making the Internet a family affair can help open up the communication about what is okay and what is not.

The following may provide some guidelines:

— Keep the computer in a central location of the home that gets plenty of traffic.

— There are a number of techniques to control what kids can or cannot access on the computer. Computer programs can be purchased that allow parents to tailor children's access to the Internet and even provide reports of Web activity.

— Cell phones that access the Internet should be subject to parental review, if allowed at all.

— Talk as a family about Internet pitfalls for children and adults alike — people lie; there are con artists aplenty; predators are real and active in every community.

— Consider a "Family Pledge for Online Safety." Post that agreement, or general family rules about Internet use, at the computer. A great example of this can be found at www.yahooligans.com under Parent's Resources.

There are a number of resources in the community and online that can help:

— www.netsmartz.org: an interactive educational safety resource to teach kids and teens how to stay safe on the Internet.

— www.playitcybersafe.com:

Peace of Mind

empowering children, parents and teachers to prevent cybercrime through knowledge of the law, their rights, and how to avoid misuse of the Internet.

— Disney.go.com/cybersafety/index.html: children learn about proper Internet ethics and the importance of keeping private information private via Mickey, Goofy and the gang.

— www.safekids.com and www.safeteens.com: Tips advice, links and suggestions to help make your family's online experience fun and productive.

Talking about Web sites and learning new things on the Web need to be parts of a continuing process. Stay interested, enthusiastic and plugged in on a regular basis to what kids are experiencing on the Internet.

Being a partner rather than an opponent in how children are exploring that enormous world is a good way to keep the "windows" of trust and communication open.

Pope condemns anti-Semitism, says world must not forget Auschwitz

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — "Our world must not forget Auschwitz," German-born Pope Benedict XVI said three days after he visited the site of the Nazi death camp in Poland.

Dedicating his May 31 general audience talk to a review of his trip to Poland, Pope Benedict condemned anti-Semitism and racial hatred and prayed that all people would recognize that "God is the father of all."

The pope said that during his May 25-28 trip he wanted to visit places associated with the life and ministry of Polish-born Pope John Paul II and to call on Poles to remain solid in the faith so that Europe and the world could benefit from their testimony to Gospel values.

"All Christians must be committed to giving this testimony to prevent humanity of the third millennium from knowing again horrors like those tragically evoked by the Auschwitz-Birkenau extermination camp," he said.

Some Jewish leaders had criticized Pope Benedict for not focusing enough on the Nazis' 6 million Jewish victims and for not explicitly condemning anti-Semitism during his May 28 visit to the camp that has become a symbol of the Holocaust.

During his audience talk, the pope said, "At the Auschwitz-Birkenau camp and in similar camps, Hitler had more than 6 million Jews exterminated."

In facing the horror of Auschwitz, he said, Christians must contemplate and learn from the cross of Christ, the symbol of "a love which brings salvation by freely descending into the abyss of evil."

Christ's sacrifice, he said, can heal human beings rebelling against God.

"May modern humanity not forget Auschwitz and the other 'death factories' where the Nazi regime attempted to eliminate God in order to take his place," the pope said.

"May it not give in to the temptation of racial hatred, which is the origin of the worst forms of anti-Semitism," he said.

"May people recognize that God is the father of all and calls us in Christ to build together a world of justice, truth and peace," he said.

Who gets to go to heaven?

Q. Several times I've heard that people who do not believe in Jesus, are not baptized and are not members of the Catholic Church cannot be saved.

Recently Barbara Walters hosted a television special about heaven. She was told to her face that only those who believe in Jesus can go to heaven.

If this is Catholic teaching then God's "chosen people" along with many others will not go to heaven. Where will they go? This is upsetting to me as a Catholic, and I would guess to others as well. (New York)

A. What you report was said on that program is not Catholic teaching. Some other Christians would agree with it, but I think the belief of most mainline Christian communities today, including Catholics, is quite different.

To begin with, if people cannot be saved without explicit faith in Jesus and baptism, salvation would be impossible for most of the human race. Jesus would have failed miserably in the mission he received from the Father.

Let's discuss first the point about belonging to the Catholic Church. The Catechism of the Catholic Church speaks strongly, as we would expect, about the essential role of Jesus Christ and baptism in God's saving plan.

Then it adds a significant and critical sentence:

"Hence, they could not be saved who, knowing that the Catholic Church was founded as necessary by God through Christ, would refuse either to enter it or to remain in it" (No. 846, quoting Vatican Council II's Constitution on the Church, 14).

When you read this carefully, especially the words between the commas, you can see that they do not apply to billions of people on earth now and in the past, including most if not all people of the Hebrew tradition.

This teaching becomes more explicit in the following catechism paragraph:

"Those who, through no fault of their own, do not know the Gospel of Christ or his church, but who nevertheless seek God with a sincere heart and, moved by grace, try in their actions to do his will as they know it through the dictates of their conscience — those too may achieve eternal salvation."

Note the words "moved by grace." Jesus is, we believe, the universal and only Savior of mankind. All good and virtuous actions, even by those who never heard of the Gospel or Jesus, or of God as we believe in him, happen because of the saving merits of our Lord's life, death and resurrection.

In other words, God's grace is guiding and saving those who live sincere and conscientious good lives, but who have, for whatever reason, honestly never seen the embrace of Christ or the church as a personal religious obligation.

Pope John Paul II, in his book "Crossing the Threshold of Hope," reflects the understanding of the Catholic Church when he speaks of the common elements of belief between Christianity and what we often call "pagan" religions.

"The Catholic Church rejects nothing that is true and holy in these religions," he writes, because we are "guided by the faith that God the Creator wants to save all mankind in Jesus Christ."

We don't know how God does all this, he continues, but we do know that "Christ came into the world for all these peoples. He redeemed them all and has his own ways of reaching each of them" in the present age of salvation history (pp. 80-83).

This acknowledges that our heavenly Father has told us much about some details of his saving love for us; but he still "has his own ways" of doing things. If that is true anywhere, we would expect it to be true in his plan for the salvation of the world through Jesus Christ.

New bishop for Raleigh

BISHOP GOSSMAN RETIRES, SUCCESSOR NAMED

BY JERRY FILTEAU
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Pope Benedict XVI has accepted the resignation of Bishop F. Joseph Gossman of Raleigh and named Philadelphia Auxiliary Bishop Michael F. Burbidge to succeed him.

Archbishop Pietro Sambi, apostolic nuncio to the United States, announced the changes in Washington June 8.

Bishop Burbidge is to be installed as bishop of Raleigh Aug. 4. Bishop Gossman is to serve as administrator of the diocese until Bishop Burbidge's installation.

Bishop Gossman, 76, has been a bishop since 1968 and head of the Diocese of Raleigh since 1975. With his retirement there are only five active U.S. bishops who were given their current posts by Pope Paul VI.

Father Jose Guadalupe Hernandez Sanchez stands at the altar of his church, which features a statue of the infant Jesus dressed in a made-to-measure replica of the Mexican national soccer team's uniform in Puebla, Mexico, June 8.

Mexican Catholics pray for a World Cup miracle

MEXICO CITY (CNS) — Less than an hour after Mexico won its first World Cup match, worshippers in Mexico City were praying for further success before a statue of the infant Jesus dressed in a soccer uniform.

Since at least as far back as 1990, some churches in Mexico have been putting the national team's jersey on the statue, which many believe can grant miracles.

Early in June, worshippers passed before the statue placed near the altar at St. Gabriel the Archangel Parish in the capital's Tacuba neighborhood. The figure is wearing the full national team uniform — from the green jersey and white shorts right down to little tennis shoes — and is resting a foot on a tiny soccer ball.

"We're praying we'll win the World Cup," Jorge Leon said following a June 11 Mass at the parish. "That would be a miracle."

It seemed like every second person on the streets of soccer-mad Mexico City was wearing a national team jersey, as were many people at the Mass. Outside, people waved Mexican flags from their cars as they drove down the street, honking to celebrate Mexico's 3-1 win over Iran in Nuremberg, Germany.

Leon, his wife, Monserat, and their 1-year-old daughter, Artet, sat through Mass with each of their faces painted in the flag's green, red and white colors.

The service was during the 90-minute break between Mexico's match and another between Angola and Portugal, both of which Mexico will face later in the first round. The Leon family was among the first out of church as Mass ended; they were hurrying back home to catch the game.

"We usually come to the earlier service, but this is a big day for the national team," Leon said.

Mexico has never advanced past the quarterfinals of the 32-nation cup, and Brazil's superstar-filled team is widely billed to win the trophy. Mexico is tipped to make it to the second round of the tournament, which runs through July 9 in Germany, but would have to beat much stiffer competition to advance further.

Bishops adopt new Mass texts, study reorganization

LOS ANGELES (CNS) — Meeting June 15-17 in Los Angeles, the U.S. bishops approved a new translation of the Order of Mass and studied a proposal to downsize the committee structure of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

The bishops debated and voted on a new English translation of the Order of Mass — the exchanges between priest and people and the prayers such as the penitential rite, Gloria, creed, eucharistic prayers and Lord's Prayer that are used regularly in daily or Sunday Masses.

Bishop Donald W. Trautman of Erie, Pa., chairman of the bishops' Committee on Liturgy, said the new translation still has to be approved by the Vatican and probably will not take effect until the rest of the English translation of the Roman Missal is completed and approved. He thought that could take up to two years.

Catholics will find changes in the wording of several prayers they have used for the past 35 years or so, including the Gloria, creed and Sanctus.

Before voting, they heard from Bishop Arthur Roche of Leeds, England, president of the International Commission on English in the Liturgy, which provided the basic translation that the bishops approved with some changes.

Bishop Roche said one thing often lost in the freer translations encouraged by the Vatican was the richness of scriptural references with which the prayers of the liturgy are filled. In 2001 the Vatican adopted stricter translation rules for all new liturgical translations from the Latin.

The bishops approved the Order of Mass by a vote of 173-29. They also adopted some American adaptations, mainly extra prayers not found in the Latin edition of the Roman Missal, by a vote of 184-8.

The bishops also discussed a proposal for restructuring and reducing the number of committees of the USCCB, from 35 standing committees and 16 ad hoc committees to be merged into a total of 14 new committees.

FROM THE VATICAN

Preacher: Vacation to be lived as a gift

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Vacation time should be lived as a gift allowing workers and students time to think, pray and dedicate time to family relationships, said the preacher of the papal household.

Capuchin Father Raniero Cantalamessa said it is good to have fun and relax on vacation, but extended free time is rare for most people and they should make the most of it.

"It is not that vacations should not also be used for enjoyment and amusement, but they are a gift given in order to discover something; they are not a time to lose or waste, but a time to value to the maximum," the preacher told Vatican Radio June 8.

"Vacations should be that time of year when, through contemplating nature and reading the word of God, people can look inside themselves and get in touch with the most important motivations of their lives," particularly their relationships with God and with their families, he said.

Father Cantalamessa, speaking in Italian, told Vatican Radio listeners that it was no accident that the British refer to their vacation as holidays, a derivative of "holy days."

"Perhaps the most beautiful meaning of vacation is that of getting back into an intimate, profound contact with the root of our being, with God," he said.

Pope Benedict XVI made similar remarks about the importance and purpose of vacations while he was in the Italian Alps last year.

Vacation time with family is an opportunity to spend "more time dedicated to prayer, reading and meditation on the deep meaning of life," he said in Les Combes, a village in Italy's Valle d'Aosta region.

The regional government and the Aosta Diocese have announced that Pope Benedict will return to Les Combes for a July 11-28 vacation.

Religious leaders discuss unfair detention of refugees

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — "National security" is not a good enough reason to systematically detain refugees, asylum seekers and undocumented migrants, said Catholic, Jewish and Muslim leaders at a Vatican press conference.

The leaders were gathered in Rome June 15 by Jesuit Refugee Service, a member of the steering committee of the new International Coalition on the Detention of Refugees, Asylum Seekers and Migrants.

The coalition, which includes human rights and faith-based organizations, was formed to study detention policies, assist detainees and lobby for changes in detention practices.

Cardinal Renato Martino, president of the pontifical councils for Justice and Peace and for Migrants and Travelers, said, "There are real concerns about detention becoming a systematic policy to which many countries resort, more as a rule than as an exception, and justify the policy by so-called national security concerns."

Jesuit Father Lluís Magrina, director of JRS, said more and more governments are using systematic detention "to arbitrarily discourage migration, even flight from persecution."

"Immigration detainees," he said, "are being imprisoned without charge and with less judicial oversight and fewer rights than are offered to those convicted of crimes."

Cardinal Martino, Father Magrina and representatives of a Jewish group and a Muslim organization agreed governments have a right to control entry into their countries and sometimes to detain people, but not indiscriminately and not in conditions that violate their human rights.

Cardinal Martino denounced unlimited detention terms, overcrowding, unsanitary facilities and the lack of basic health care and adequate food.

JRS said it is "almost impossible" to know how many refugees, asylum seekers and migrants are being detained in the world, because most countries do not publish such information.

However, 5.7 million of the 9.2 million refugees counted by the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees have been living in closed camps for extended periods of time, often decades.

The United States, which does publish figures, "detained over 230,000 non-U.S. citizens for migration-related reasons this past year, and on any given day there are over 20,000 people in U.S. immigration detention centers, jails and prisons pending a final decision in their immigration/asylum cases," the JRS statement said.

Five Sisters of Mercy celebrate combined 310 years of service

BELMONT — Five Sisters of Mercy recently celebrated a combined 310 years of service to the Catholic Church.

Mercy Sisters Mary Cecilia Lewis and Josephine Maria Thomas each celebrated 70 years as women religious at a Mass held at the Sisters of Mercy's Sacred Heart Convent in Belmont June 3.

Mercy Sisters Jeanne Marie Kienast and Maureen Dees, celebrating 60 years each, and Mercy Sister Mary Hugh Mauldin, celebrating 50 years, commemorated their anniversaries at St. Matthew Church in Charlotte June 17.

"In her own way and in her own ministry, each of the five jubilarians has used her unique gifts to benefit those around her," said Mercy Sister Paulette Rose Williams, president of the Sisters of Mercy of North Carolina.

Sister Lewis, 89, entered the convent in June 1935. She earned a bachelor's degree in liturgical music and a master's degree in music education, and holds certificates of professional advancement from the North Carolina Music Teachers Association and the Music Teachers National Association.

She has served as a teacher, a principal, on boards and committees, including Gaston Fine Arts Council; volunteered at Gaston Memorial Hospital and for AIDS patients at House of Mercy in Belmont; and played and taught piano.

Clinton, N.C., native Sister Thomas, 91, entered the Sisters of Mercy in 1935.

She earned a bachelor's degree in elementary education and has served as a superior, regional superior and principal in Guam.

She also has taught and served in administrative positions at schools in North Carolina, Florida and New York.

Currently she is a pastoral associate at Queen of Apostles Church in Belmont, providing respite care and follow-up care to those who are hospitalized or confined to their homes.

Born in Port Au Prince, Haiti, Sister Kienast, 78, was received as a Sister of Mercy in 1946.

She earned a bachelor's degree in English and a master's degree in education administration and has taught in the United States and in Guam. She has also served as an administrator within the Diocese of Charlotte and as diocesan vicar for women religious.

Her passion is "helping others find their own unique God-given gifts so that they can respond to God's call to serve God's people — with joy," she said.

Currently she is a pastoral associate at St. Matthew Church in Charlotte.

Gastonia native Sister Dees, 80, spent the majority of her ministry years within the Catholic education system.

She earned a bachelor's degree in elementary education, and taught and served as an administrator at schools in the Diocese of Charlotte.

Sister Dees has taught at schools in New York and Florida, served at a mission in Guam and has cared for AIDS patients at House of Mercy.

Currently she works at Catherine's House for homeless women and their children in Belmont.

Sister Mauldin, 69, was born in Honolulu, Hawaii. She earned bachelor's and master's degrees in mathematics education, a master's in theology and a certificate in liturgical studies.

She also served for 25 years as director of McAuley Center in Belmont, a program focused on adult religious education, primarily within the Diocese of Charlotte.

Currently she is an assistant professor of mathematics and theology at Limestone College in Gaffney, S.C.

Bishop ordains 16 men to permanent diaconate

Msgr. Mauricio West, chancellor and vicar general; officials from the Redemptorist order, and priests and permanent deacons of the Diocese of Charlotte, as well as the deacons' wives, children and grandchildren.

A deacon is an ordained minister in the Catholic Church and is one of the three degrees of the sacrament of Holy Orders, the origins of which can be found in the Acts of the Apostles.

As ordained ministers, permanent deacons may perform many of the sacramental ministries of the church except consecration of the Eucharist, anointing of the sick and reconciliation.

The permanent deacon is the only ordained man allowed to be married. However, if a deacon's wife passes away, he is not allowed to remarry. If a man is single, he is not allowed to marry after ordination.

"When we think of the life and ministry of the deacon, we think of Jesus himself," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis in his homily. "Jesus was not averse to being seen in the role of servant."

During the Mass, Bishop Jugis asked each candidate if he wanted to be ordained and if he was willing to serve the bishop and the diocese.

"In the promises you are about to make, you will be asked to conform your way of life always to the example of Christ, of whose body and blood you are ministers at the altar," said Bishop Jugis.

The candidates prostrated themselves before the altar to signify their commitment, during which the litany of the saints was sung.

The bishop then prayed the prayer of consecration, completing the ordination of the permanent deacons. Each deacon was invested with a stole, a sign of his office; and dalmatic, the outer garment worn during the liturgy.

During the liturgy of the Eucharist, the newly ordained deacons distributed the Eucharist to their families, friends and fellow worshippers.

McAnulty earns Eagle Scout rank

HICKORY — Peter Charles McAnulty of Boy Scout Troop 234 recently earned the rank of Eagle Scout, the highest rank in Boy Scouts.

Family and friends gathered to honor him at a Mass celebrated by Capuchin Father Gregory Reisert, Peter's great uncle, at St. Aloysius Church April 1. A court of honor ceremony followed.

To earn Eagle Scout, Peter earned 33 merit badges and completed a service project at Jenkins Elementary School in Hickory. The project consisted of four parts, including an erosion control project, landscaping and refurbishing.

Peter also completed the requirements to earn a Bronze Palm.

Peter is a Vigil Honor Member of the Order of the Arrow, the highest achievement a Boy Scout can earn as a member of the Order of the Arrow. The Order of the Arrow is recognized as the national honor society for Boy Scouts of America.

An active member of the Esau Huppeday Lodge and Oconoluftee Chapter, Peter was elected to serve as vice chief of administration, the second highest youth leadership position of the 500-member Lodge.

In Troop 234, Peter held the offices of patrol leader, assistant senior patrol leader, senior patrol leader, librarian and troop guide.

He also earned the Arrow of Light award, the highest award in Cub Scouts. As a Catholic Boy Scout, Peter earned the Ad Altare Dei religious emblem.

Peter is an active member of Life Teen at St. Aloysius Church and serves as an altar server, lector and usher.

A senior at Hickory High School, Peter is a member of the National Honor Society, Math Honor Society, Beta Club, National Latin Honor Society and Latin Club.

He was captain of the 2005 cross country team and co-captain of the 2006 track and field team.

Interfaith prayer meeting held for immigration reform

CHARLOTTE — Immigration was the focus of a recent international interfaith prayer meeting in Charlotte.

Franciscan Sister Andrea Inkrott, director of Hispanic ministry for the Diocese of Charlotte, joined members of other faith groups and organizations at First United Methodist Church June 4.

Participants shared Scripture and reflections at the meeting to "unite for comprehensive immigration law reform," according to organizers.

"The experience was indeed a Pentecost experience," said Sister Inkrott.

The participants shared prayers and writings of their faith traditions and were "together in their prayers to the one God," said Sister Inkrott.

"All the prayers were different, but all pertained to the message that God is one and that we are all to love one another," she said.

Other faith groups represented included the Islamic Center of Charlotte, Charlotte Presbytery, Temple Israel, Hickory Grove Baptist Church, Western Conference of the United Methodist Church and the Episcopal Diocese of North Carolina.

Also present were members of International House, a center for international diversity; the Latin American Coalition; and Mecklenburg Ministries.

"Interest and openness were evident in all the participants and that is what we prayed and hoped for, that all in our country will be interested in and open to one another so together we can resolve the issues that are challenging us at this time," said Sister Inkrott.

Bishop McGuinness graduates 90

KERNERSVILLE — Seniors at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School celebrated the conclusion of their high school careers June 3.

During the graduation ceremony, Sandy McMonagle, principal of Our Lady of Mercy School in Winston-Salem, was honored for her upcoming retirement and was awarded the Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School Founders Award for her leadership excellence and a career marked by extraordinary service to the church, the community, Catholic education and the teaching profession.

Diplomas were conferred by Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and chancellor for the Diocese of Charlotte; Linda Cherry, superintendent of diocesan Catholic schools; and George Repass, principal of Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School.

Repass presented McMonagle with a recognition plaque.

The class of 2006 also heard remarks from Anna Sweigart, salutatorian; Paul Gerlach, valedictorian; and special guest speaker Gregory Beier, president of Novant Health Triad Region, and father of two Bishop McGuinness graduates.

Bishop urges more public-interest shows

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Television stations should be required to air more public-interest programming before the expected conversion of broadcast signals from analog to digital is to be completed in 2009, said the chairman of the U.S. bishops' communications committee.

In a letter to Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin released June 6, Bishop Gerald F. Kicanas of Tucson, Ariz., said a "substantial effort to provide programming that better serves the public" should be required of broadcasters in exchange for the new spectrum rights they will receive with digital broadcasting.

"Today, even as the broadcasting industry continues to benefit from its subsidized use of the public airwaves, broadcasters' observance of meaningful public interest obligations has declined," Bishop Kicanas said in the letter.

The experience of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops "is that there has been a steady decline in television stations willing to broadcast noncommercial religious programming or local public interest programming featuring local religious leaders," Bishop Kicanas said.

"A significant number of dioceses that produce television programs and public service announcements have consistently informed us of the financial burden and increased difficulty involved in obtaining airtime on local broadcast stations," he added.

"The bishops are concerned that local broadcasters' programming decisions are more deeply rooted in their desire for commercial gain, rather than meeting their statutory obligations to serve their communities' needs and interests," he said.

Bishop Kicanas said the U.S. bishops were concerned that, "with the imminent conversion to all-digital broadcasts, the already limited amount of religious programming will decline even further."

The FCC has given additional spectrum to each station for its digital programming.

Analog, the traditional TV broadcasting system, uses magnetic waves to transmit and display pictures and sound. By transmitting information used to make a TV picture and sound as "data bits" — like a computer — a digital broadcaster can carry more information than analog technology allows.

Bishop Kicanas offered three ways that public interest requirements could be ensured with digital broadcasting:

— By amplifying the views of the public, including community organizations and noncommercial religious entities.

— By increasing the amount of local news and public affairs programming, including religious programs and public service announcements.

— By increasing programming for the educational needs of children, people with disabilities and underserved communities.

Jesus protects us on perilous journeys

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Near the university campus where I am currently a graduate student, there is a busy street that serves as the property's western boundary. Unfortunately, the two pedestrian traffic lights are not situated at the place where I usually need to cross, so when I'm in a hurry — which is most days — I join dozens of other students who navigate through moving traffic with heavily laden briefcases and book bags in tow.

As an experienced street-crosser, I can gauge whether I have sufficient time to safely traverse the distance, and I have learned that once I assess the traffic and commit to the crossing, I need to proceed without hesitation. Still, it's a little scary and certainly not something I would do at night or with a child.

The Gospel reading for this Sunday is intriguing in that Jesus initiates a lake crossing in the evening when a storm is threatening — not the most prudent time. The image of water gone out of control, common to all the readings, is a powerful metaphor for the very human fear we experience when our lives are out of control or we face an unfamiliar situation.

In the midst of an experience that terrifies even seasoned boatmen, Jesus does not panic, hesitate or ask them to turn the boat around. Rather, he calms both the tempests outside the boat and within their hearts, and seizes the moment to teach them something important about faith.

In the course of life, one often must "make crossings" — leaving a secure job for a new vocation, committing to love a person for life, giving birth to a child — that carry an element of risk. Some ventures are foolish and should not be attempted. Yet other risks are necessarily taken in order to answer and obey God's call of love. In those moments, even seasoned risk-takers know the jolt of adrenaline that fear brings.

But persons of faith know that Jesus always makes the crossing with them, calming the storms within, paving the way and encouraging them to proceed without hesitation to the other side. Awakening that faith — as the disciples awakened Jesus in the back of the boat — is the key to safe passage.

QUESTIONS:

When was the last time you felt paralyzed by an unfamiliar or overwhelming situation? How did your faith in Jesus help you overcome your fear?

Recreating the Nativity

The city of Matera, Italy, famous for its rock-hewn homes and grottos, is being used to film "The Nativity Story." The filmmakers used the hill facing the city to shoot crucifixion scenes.

When filming about Jesus' birth, animals don't always follow script

MATERA, Italy — The hardest part about making a movie about Mary, Joseph and the birth of Jesus is convincing the animals to follow the script.

Herd of sheep, ornery oxen, caravaning camels and pack donkeys all feature in a new film, "The Nativity Story," due out in theaters Dec. 1.

Digital technology has made putting a shooting star and hovering angels on celluloid a cinch, but convincing an ox to kneel and low before the baby Jesus in a manger proved to be an ordeal.

The film by New Line Cinema is being shot this spring and summer in the ancient city of Matera.

Scriptwriter Mike Rich said he wanted the story to flesh out who Mary and Joseph were and what emotions they must have felt as they faced the immense responsibilities God entrusted to them.

Rich said he felt the story of the Nativity had always been presented as an "event-based" story. After months of research and input from religious scholars, Rich started writing what he called "a character-based story."

Rich noted that the only description of Joseph he found in the Bible was that "he was a righteous man."

A nondenominational Christian, Rich said that even though his story was speculative he still sought to keep it faithful to the spirit of the biblical account.

The result is that the young Mary, played by Keisha Castle-Hughes ("Whale Rider"), and Joseph, played by Oscar Isaac, leap to life on the script's pages and hopefully, Rich said, also on the screen.

Co-producer Marty Bowen, a Catholic, said that growing up he always put Mary "up on a pedestal."

"The Nativity Story" is trying to make Mary real, Bowen said, adding that he hoped that the movie would help people see "Mary was a girl before she became a woman and a woman before she became the mother of God."

The film's promoters sent copies of the script to a number of religious scholars for their input as well as to the head of the Pontifical Council for Social Communications, Archbishop John P. Foley, and secretary of communications for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, Msgr. Francis J. Maniscalco.

While Archbishop Foley told Catholic News Service in late May that he had yet to read the script, Msgr. Maniscalco said he found the screenplay "faithful to the biblical narrative and that the additions made for narrative and theatrical purposes were tasteful."

New bishop of Raleigh selected

Bishop Gossman

Francis Joseph Gossman was born in Baltimore April 1, 1930. He was ordained a priest of the Archdiocese of Baltimore in 1955 after studies at St. Mary's Seminary in Baltimore and the Pontifical North American College in Rome, the U.S. national seminary in Rome.

After ordination he earned a doctorate in canon law at The Catholic University of America in Washington.

He served as an assistant pastor, cathedral administrator, vice chancellor, tribunal official and St. Mary's Seminary professor before he was named an auxiliary bishop of Baltimore in 1968 at the age of 38.

He was the first U.S. bishop to be ordained in the new, simplified ceremony for the ordination of a bishop, which had just received Vatican approval for use in the United States on an experimental basis as part of the liturgical reforms following the Second Vatican Council.

In place of the traditional banquet honoring a newly ordained bishop, he celebrated his ordination with a simple buffet and reception and had the money that would have been spent on a banquet sent for aid to Biafra, a short-lived secessionist state of Nigeria, which was then in the midst of a destructive civil war and faced massive humanitarian needs.

When he was made bishop of Raleigh in 1975, the 38,000 Catholics in the diocese formed a tiny minority, less than 2 percent of the 2.5 million people in the eastern half of North Carolina.

During his 31-year tenure the Catholic population more than quadrupled. It now numbers about 190,000 in a population of 4.1 million.

Active in ecumenical relations and social justice issues, Bishop Gossman used the sale of a property in 1989 to establish a permanent $2.5 million diocesan endowment for the poor.

He supported a nuclear freeze in the early 1980s and in 1990 warned against unilateral U.S. military action before the Persian Gulf War. He fought for the rights of immigrants and in 1992 was one of five Southern bishops who issued a joint statement opposing use of the death penalty.

He promoted lay leadership in parishes and the role of women in church leadership positions.

In 1997 he and then-Bishop William G. Curlin of Charlotte issued a joint pastoral letter on economic justice in their state, expressing concern that while North Carolina was enjoying economic prosperity and expansion the working poor were being left behind.

Bishop Gossman was a member of the Anglican-Roman Catholic dialogue in the United States and in 1991 was a leader in the formation of a statewide Catholic-Lutheran covenant, an agreement of joint witness and collaboration that at the time was only the second such covenant in the nation.

In 1999 he started the diocesan Reconciliation Initiative, a program of pastoral outreach to Catholics separated from the sacraments because of irregular marriages.

Over the years he has served on numerous committees of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

He welcomed the appointment of Bishop Burbidge, 48, to Raleigh, describing his successor as "a man of prayer and faith."

Bishop Burbidge

Michael Francis Burbidge was born in Philadelphia June 16, 1957. He was ordained a priest of the Philadelphia Archdiocese in 1984 following studies at St. Charles Borromeo Seminary there.

He also studied at Villanova and Immaculata universities in Pennsylvania and has a doctorate in education as well as master's degrees in theology and education administration.

After two years in parish work he spent five years teaching high school. In 1991-92 he was dean of students at St. Charles Borromeo Seminary.

From 1992 to 1999 he was a special assistant to Cardinal Anthony J. Bevilacqua, then archbishop of Philadelphia, and from 1999 to 2004 he returned to the seminary as rector.

In 2002 he was named an auxiliary bishop of Philadelphia. As a bishop, he has held several archdiocesan posts including vicar general and head of the Priests' Personnel Board.

Church role seen in mobilizing Hispanics

in U.S. political life.

On the local level, priests can promote civic involvement and church organizations can sponsor courses in English as a second language, said Rodolfo de la Garza, law professor at Columbia University in New York.

"There is a crying need in the Hispanic community for that help," said de la Garza, who has written books on Hispanic politics in the United States.

Robert de Posada, president of the Latino Coalition, said that the church "has the moral authority to make things happen."

In the heavily Catholic Hispanic community, "when people need help, they first turn to their family, then to the church and then to the government," he said.

Both men attended a June 7 symposium on Latino participation in U.S. politics after the series of rallies calling for immigration reform held earlier in the year.

The symposium was organized by the Tomas Rivera Policy Institute, an independent social research center specializing in Hispanic issues.

De Posada and de la Garza cited encouraging voter registration drives and getting people to vote as important tasks for the church.

"Priests from the pulpit have a captive audience" to encourage registration, said de Posada.

"Our church also needs to push stronger in making sure that citizens vote," he said.

De la Garza said that priests need to preach the importance of voting because it's elected officials who decide how to spend taxpayers' money.

The Latino Coalition does an annual survey of Hispanic views on political and social issues.

One of the symposium speakers was Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., who said that the energy from rallies pushing for immigration reform "should be the beginning point for Latino participation" in a wide variety of political issues.

He stressed working with young Latinos, most of whom are U.S. citizens, to get them to vote. Salazar estimated that there are about 5 million Hispanics who are citizens but not registered to vote or who are currently eligible to become citizens.

Although the number is small when compared to the total number of eligible voters, many of these Hispanics are in key swing states in presidential elections, such as Texas, California and Florida, he said.

Salazar said that a main difference in the Senate and House versions of immigration legislation concerns the wall

"The rallies said: 'We are here. We are visible.'"

— Roberto Suro, director of Pew Hispanic Center to be built along the border.

Unlike the House bill, the Senate bill would require local government officials on both sides of the border to approve construction of the wall in their jurisdictions, he said.

Several speakers disagreed as to whether the immigration rallies had a positive or negative impact on U.S. public opinion.

Roberto Suro, director of the Pew Hispanic Center, said the events were basically positive and looked like peaceful family affairs because among participants there were many little children being carried by their parents.

"The rallies said: 'We are here. We are visible,'" he said.

It also showed the strength of the informal networking and intercommunication among immigrants who got the message out about the marches through churches, labor unions and radio station disc jockeys, he said.

Mark Krikorian, executive director of the Center for Immigration Studies, said the marches promoted immigration control because they showed the general U.S. public the "size of the problem" of illegal immigration.

People saw hundreds of thousands of demonstrators filling downtown Los Angeles, Chicago and Washington, he said. This was more powerful than reading about an estimated 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants, he said.

The marches "guaranteed that there will be no amnesty this year" for illegal immigrants, he said.

They also eroded the reasoning of business leaders who see illegal immigration as a source of docile, cheap labor, said Krikorian.

"This undermined the rationale because the docile, cheap labor was now marching in the streets," he said.

Several speakers said that many immigrants risk death to sneak into the United States because of the poor domestic policies in their countries and because of U.S. trade policies that promote U.S. exports at the expense of the production of other countries.

"Mexicans used to pluck chickens in Mexico. Now they do it here," said Suro. "We used to buy chickens from Mexico. Now we export chickens to Mexico."

'666 babies'

Ominous date reminder of difficulty in reporting faith issues

Chalk up another one for those brainy marketing folks in Hollywood. Somebody out there thought it would be clever to open the movie "The Omen" on a Tuesday instead of the usual Friday to take advantage of the date 6/6/06. It worked!

As communications director for the diocese, I got lots of calls from reporters who wanted to know what the church was telling people about the ominous date.

June 6, 2006, or 6/6/06, has no relation to the mark of Satan referred to in the Book of Revelation. The number 666 refers to an evil thing or person. The date, which occurs once every hundred years, is related to evil the way diet is related to pizza. But lacking a connection to reality has never prevented a reporter from searching for a story.

I had several conversations with reporters doing 666 stories that went like this:

Reporter: We've heard that some pregnant women, due to deliver, don't want to have a baby on June 6. Have you heard that?

Me: No.

Reporter: Does the church have any advice for a woman who is concerned about having a 666 baby?

Me: A what? Look, that's something between a woman and her doctor.

Reporter: So, the church doesn't want any 666 babies?

Me: ANY WHAT?

And so it goes. I know reporters often ask silly questions bordering on the offensive; I was very good at it when I had a press card. But I've often wondered why most reporters seem so clueless when it comes to matters of faith. Some are Catholic, and many belong to other Christian denominations, but most seem willing to accept the silliness of 666 because it gives them a story.

Faith is important. It gives individuals meaning to their lives, it motivates good on a grand scale and, in the case of some aspects of the Muslim faith, it underpins an ongoing war with the West. (Christians have plenty of wars to be of ashamed, too — remember the Crusades?)

Yet most news organizations assign minimal or no resources to the understanding of faith. For the average reporter, a "religion" story is about a church fire.

Faith is a difficult subject to report. An explanation of the Resurrection or transubstantiation won't fit very well into a sound bite.

People of faith usually can't prove a miracle and they are predictable when it comes to showing gratitude, repeatedly thanking God. But those should be minor obstacles to news organizations that have the wherewithal to "imbed" reporters in a war in Iraq, or send us pictures from the summit of Mt. Everest.

In February 2005, Time magazine ran a profile of Catholicism in the South. The Diocese of Charlotte and Bishop Peter J. Jugis figured prominently in the story about the vibrant faith life found below the Mason-Dixon Line.

The reporter on that story, Tim Padgett, told me that most national news organizations felt that they had completely dropped the ball in the coverage of the recently completed presidential campaign because they didn't understand the role that faith played in the re-election of George W. Bush. Padgett thought that more in-depth reporting of faith would soon be the norm. It sounded like a good start for a new kind of journalism. The reporting on 666 day is a reminder that bad habits are hard to break.

Catholic, Orthodox have a relationship as sister churches, says pope

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Just as Sts. Peter and Andrew were brothers, the Catholic and Orthodox churches have a special relationship as true sister churches, Pope Benedict XVI said.

After Christ's death and resurrection, St. Peter left Jerusalem for Rome in order to carry out the universal mission Jesus entrusted to him, the pope said during his June 14 weekly general audience.

St. Andrew, fluent in Greek, went to the Greek world, he said, and became the "apostle of the Greeks."

The Gospels show that in their life and death, Sts. Peter and Andrew were "true brothers" and that their brotherhood is expressed "symbolically in the special rapport between the sees of Rome and Constantinople, churches (that are) truly sisters," Pope Benedict said.

In St. Peter's Square, the pope continued a series of talks on the apostles by turning to St. Andrew, patron saint of the Ecumenical Orthodox Patriarchate of Constantinople.

His June 14 talk came less than a week after bishops of the patriarchate expressed concern over the pope's decision to drop "patriarch of the West" from his official titles in the Vatican yearbook.

The Orthodox bishops' synod said in a June 8 statement, "It is of extreme importance to the Orthodox church that Pope Benedict, while having rejected the title 'patriarch of the West,' retained the titles 'vicar of Christ' and 'supreme pontiff of the universal church.'"

The synod said these titles still create serious difficulties for the Orthodox since the titles seem to imply "a universal jurisdiction of the bishop of Rome over the entire church, which is something the Orthodox have never accepted."

"By retaining these titles and discarding the 'patriarch of the West' the term and concept of 'sister churches' between the Roman Catholic and Orthodox church becomes hard to use," they said.

Meanwhile, in his catechesis, Pope

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

Benedict said Jesus foresaw that after his death his teachings would spread and be embraced by people beyond the Jewish world and into the pagan lands of the ancient Greek world.

St. Andrew helped translate to a group of Greeks Christ's parable of the grain of wheat in which Jesus said the grain will produce fruit only if it dies after it falls to the ground.

Christ's "meeting with the Greek spirit, with the Greek world" was to come about not as an encounter with curious onlookers, but as a true welcoming and fruitful following of his teachings, he said.

That grain of wheat, a symbol of Christ crucified, will be resurrected and grow into the "bread of life for the world; will be light for peoples and cultures," the pope said.

St. Andrew, who was crucified in the Greek city of Patras, teaches today's faithful an important lesson about how to confront one's own sufferings, the pope said.

During his crucifixion, St. Andrew praised the "good cross" as an object that had been "consecrated by the body of Christ and adorned by his limbs as if with pearls" and that it would "take me away from men and restore me to my master."

Pope Benedict said the saint's words reflect the Christian interpretation of the cross not as "an instrument of torture as much as an incomparable way for a full assimilation with the Redeemer."

"Our crosses take on value if they are seen and received as part of Christ's cross," the pope said, adding that "only from that cross our sufferings, too, become noble and take on their true meaning."

Hating the waiting

Patience, prayer can help us find God

"You must have a very hungry cat," I said to the man in line in front of me at the grocery store.

Thirty or 40 small cans of cat food sat in his basket. Nothing more. Just cat food and lots of it. He laughed.

"I don't even have a cat," he said. Then he went on to explain that he was going shrimp fishing and cat food makes the best bait.

"There's something about this greasy stuff that shrimp love."

Who knew? Sometimes grocery lines can be very educational. Sometimes they can be fun, when you end up next to a good friend.

But for most of us, they apparently are downright exasperating. At least, that's according to an Associated Press article, which cites a poll conducted recently showing that Americans are a very impatient people.

Americans don't like waiting. The post office and the motor vehicle registry are places we especially hate to tarry, said the article. And we detest phone calls that put you on hold until the next representative is available.

But "almost one in four in the AP-Ipsos Poll picked the grocery checkout as the line where their patience is most likely to melt like the ice cream turning to goo in their carts," said the story.

For the Journey

EFFIE CALDAROLA
CNS COLUMNIST

Why are we so impatient? It seems we're always rushing. Even our children — maybe especially our children — are scheduled into one activity after another.

As a group, Americans are way too busy. At least that's the conventional wisdom and perhaps explains why we hate waiting.

But I think we rather take pride in our busyness. We brag about it. We have stuff to do, so we must be important — and impatient.

So, when the clerk at the post office puts up a "closed" sign when it's our turn, or the woman in front of us at the grocery is having trouble with her credit card, we fret, we fume.

Samuel Beckett's "Waiting for Godot" is a play about two tramps who are waiting for a mysterious gentleman named Godot. The whole play centers on their waiting, but Godot never shows up.

The title makes one wonder if they really are waiting for God, but Beckett claimed that wasn't so.

Literary critics imagine that the existential play deals with the meaninglessness of life. But as Christians we don't believe our lives are meaningless, and we do believe that waiting is an essential part of faith.

Think how long the Hebrews waited for a savior.

Perhaps it's a stretch to imagine that what we experience in life as waiting for God can be related to the waiting we are forced to do at the grocery store. But could a time given for prayer each day, which is essentially a time of waiting for God, strengthen patience throughout our lives?

Could it help to turn those moments of fretful waiting into moments of prayer?

When an archbishop of Canterbury was asked once how much time he prayed each day, he replied with humor, "About two or three minutes, but it takes me a half an hour to get there."

In other words, he gave time to prayer but had to wait, with patience and perseverance, for the glimpse of God he so desired.

Sometimes I wonder if our constant need to hurry is because we, perhaps like the men waiting for Godot, struggle to find our life's meaning, and being busy masks that struggle.

Giving a half an hour each morning to simply waiting on God might bring meaning into even the most frustrating moments of our day.

Traumas remind us life is precious

The Human Side

FATHER
EUGENE HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

I was sitting at a golf course near the Washington Hospital Center. It is the norm there to see helicopters shuttling patients to the center.

But this time we suddenly heard a great thud. I knew immediately that a helicopter had crashed.

Some of us jumped into a golf cart and sped down the hill. There in the distance was scattered debris, a tree cut in two and the downed helicopter on its side.

As I went to assist other men who had gotten to the copter first, I noticed it was smoldering. Normally, the injured should not be moved until medics arrive to remove people without causing further injury.

But we felt we had no time to wait. It seemed the helicopter could burst into flames at any moment.

We tried to lift the pilot out as best we could as he shrieked in pain. It was extremely difficult to get him out because his feet were strapped into pedals that maneuver the plane.

I next looked into the rear of the helicopter where a nurse and her patient were trapped.

As we dragged her away from the helicopter, I asked her how she was. She replied that her shoulder was in extreme pain.

We had to wait and hope that the helicopter wouldn't blow up until the fire department arrived to cut free the patient who initially was being transported to the hospital center. Later, we were informed that the patient, who had been in critical condition prior to the crash, died.

I have been in trauma situations before. You never get used to them. They leave you traumatized yourself.

That accident spoke of life in a way I never thought of it before. When others' lives are in danger and your life is endangered in the process of helping them, the urge is to forget danger and do what has to be done to save another.

As I looked at the trapped nurse and her patient, all I wanted to do was to free them as soon as possible, just in case the helicopter exploded. Their lives meant everything to me, even at the cost of losing mine.

As painful as it is, traumatic life-and-death situations make us realize how precious life is. There is no taking death or even injury for granted.

The experience of such a trauma is a very difficult reminder that we can never become callous about people getting blown up before our very eyes.

In an ironic way, it reminds us of the human being next to us and the God-given instinct within us to ensure his or her life, no matter the cost, no matter whether we know or don't know the person.

The bite of 'choice'

Many doctors choose not to end unborn life

In my current series of columns, I've been examining the truth that the price to be paid for doing abortions is life as an abortionist. It is, in many ways, its own punishment, and the examples we have given of how it destroys the personality are only the tip of the iceberg.

Another dimension of this truth is how the stigma of being an abortionist is causing the abortion industry to collapse for lack of personnel.

Here we find a beautiful irony, because "choice" has come back to bite the abortion industry.

They have discovered the hard truth that if women can choose to have abortions, so doctors can choose not to perform them. There is an amazing disparity in the medical community between the number of those who will identify themselves as "pro-choice," and the number of those who are willing to work in an abortion clinic.

Abortionist Morris Wortman attested, "There is tremendous support in the medical community for a woman's right to choose, as long as she doesn't 'choose me' to perform her abortion" (Medical Tribune, March 6, 1997).

This has created nothing less than a crisis for the abortion business, and has caused many in it to express openly their fears that the pro-life movement will end abortion without even having to make it illegal.

Abortion is quickly becoming the legal procedure that no doctor wants to do and fewer and fewer women want to undergo. Don't take my word for it; read these quotes:

— "When I look back on the [Roe v. Wade] decision, I thought these words had been written in granite. But I've learned it was not granite. It was more like sandstone. The immediate problem is, where will the doctors come from?"

(Sarah Weddington, pro-abortion attorney who successfully argued Roe v. Wade before the Supreme Court; Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, February 15, 1998)

— "That's how the anti's are going to win ... by attrition, because fewer and fewer doctors will perform abortions."

(Abortionist Herbert Hodes, Glamour, September 1991)

— "Abortion opponents will achieve their goal without ever having to overturn Roe vs. Wade."

(Kate Michelman, former director, National Abortion Rights Action League, Dallas Morning News, October 4, 1997, commenting on the shortage of abortionists)

— "We've seen a turn-off of

Guest Column

physicians coming into this field."

(Abortionist Ed Boaz, ABC World News Tonight, January 16, 1998)

— "Having the right to abortion doesn't mean a [expletive] thing if you can't access it."

(Barbara Ellis, abortion advocate, National Abortion Federation Annual meeting, San Francisco, March/April 1996)

So many pro-life activists have looked for visible results of their legislative and educational activity, and often don't find as much as they would like. Yet these quotes prove that the abortion industry feels the weight of our success.

The goal in war is not to destroy one's enemy, but to destroy the enemy's capacity for waging war.

By educating the public, especially medical students, about how ugly life as an abortionist is, we continue to rob them of what they need to keep abortion going.

Cloistered monks maintain spiritual connections with outside world

BY CAROL ZIMMERMANN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

BERRYVILLE, Va. — At first glance, the Holy Cross Abbey in Berryville seems completely shut off from the world at large.

For starters, its location is off the beaten path in the foothills of Virginia's Blue Ridge Mountains. This is not a place that visitors accidentally stumble upon.

And yet, the quiet pastoral setting is often inundated with visitors, those who come seeking solace or perhaps wanting to absorb some of the rich spiritual tradition on the monastery grounds.

"The retreat house is always full," Trappist Father Robert Barnes, the abbot, said of the guest house that sleeps 16, either for weeklong or weekend retreats.

He said people reserve their spots months in advance and plenty are "on standby" if anyone cancels.

Visitors essentially set their own routines. They are welcome to attend any of the five times reserved for prayers in the chapel with the Trappist monks — with the first prayers, the night Office of Vigils, at 3:30 a.m. and the closing prayers, or compline, at 7:30 p.m.

They may attend meals with other participants or receive spiritual counseling from one of the monks, but they are not required to do so.

After the Second Vatican Council, the grille in the church dividing monks and guests was taken down. Now there is a simple rope separating the two groups. Guests are restricted from the monastery's private quarters and dining area.

Providing an opportunity for spiritual renewal is key for the Trappists, according to Father Barnes, who said

Pope Paul VI "insisted that monks have to be in touch with people seeking to renew their spirituality."

Capuchin Franciscan Brother Effrin Sosa, who is in the process of becoming a Trappist brother, is not at all surprised by the large turnouts at Trappist retreat houses, particularly in recent years.

"People are starving out there, especially young people. They're looking for depth," he said.

And when they visit, if nothing else, they get a chance to experience firsthand a silent environment in a TiVo- and radio-free zone. They also get the chance for some spiritual counseling or to receive the sacrament of reconciliation.

Trappist Father Edward McCorkell, 80, a native of South Africa, frequently counsels married couples who stay at the retreat house.

Although he did not choose married life and has long lived inside the monastery walls, he can certainly say a thing or two about facing challenges head on. When he decided to become a priest, he came to the United States by ship in a 55-day trip at times surrounded by U-boats in World War II.

The priest, who helped start a Trappist monastery in Chile, was the abbot at Holy Cross Abbey in 1966-80, a period of significant change in the world, the church and even the abbey. In the early 1960s, the abbey had the highest number of monks in its history — 61.

Father McCorkell welcomed the changes brought by Vatican II, particularly the decision to do away with silence on the abbey grounds and the use of the Trappist sign language. Today he gets plenty of opportunity to talk, either in informative

He is also quick to point out that meeting with those on retreat is a two-way street. "It's wonderful for me to

He also said the couples are a witness to him by their example of living out their faith in the world.

ASHEVILLE — They came from near and far, singing and praying the rosary as they solemnly processed through the streets of downtown Asheville.

Echoing a scene from the inaugural Eucharistic Congress in Charlotte in September 2005, Catholics gathered in Asheville for a Eucharistic Conference June 24.

The conference began with Mass celebrated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis in the standing-room-only Basilica of St. Lawrence, followed by a procession around four city blocks to the Asheville Civic Center.

The conference was organized by the diocesan Eucharistic Congress Committee in response to the requests of people in the western part of the diocese.

Many people wanted an opportunity to gather for Mass, a procession and speech in preparation for the Eucharistic Congress in October, Bishop Jugis said.

MAKING A 'SPLASH'

Children inspired by teammate's illness

ST. LOUIS (CNS) — Four Catholic school students in the St. Louis area finished sixth grade with a bang.

Alexis Jennings, Gloria Maciorowski, Melissa Rey and Jack Terschluse are the Neon Warriors, a team of inventors who won the grand prize in the East Coast Nationals TOYchallenge competition.

The Neon Warriors invented Splash Dash, a fitness-focused outdoor tag game that involves "blasting" opponents with splash balls.

"We went through a lot of designs before we came up with the right one," Melissa said. "It was really fun to see our ideas working and in action."

Jack added, "I learned one person can't do it all. You always need help on a project like this. A team is like a puzzle. You can't put together the puzzle if you don't have the pieces or the help from team members."

The East Coast Nationals, held in Research Triangle Park, N.C., was one of two final rounds of TOYchallenge, an annual contest sponsored by Sally Ride Science company.

More than 350 teams competed across the country, with 50 making it to each of two finals. The West Coast final at the end of April at the San Diego Aerospace Museum in California yielded its own prize-winning team.

The grand prize is a Kennedy Space Center weekend VIP tour this summer that includes air travel, along with a trophy.

"I want to be an astronaut when I grow up, so I can't wait until our trip to the Kennedy Space Center," said Melissa.

TOYchallenge aims to interest middle-school students, especially girls, in science and engineering. The toy and game competition has three categories — family games, teaching toys and "get out and play."

That last category was the one the Chesterfield youngsters chose for strong personal reasons.

"We decided on a game that allowed the players to get some exercise after our teammate Jack was diagnosed with juvenile diabetes last summer," said Melissa. "We learned that exercise helps keep blood-sugar level in check, so we wanted to invent a game that would especially benefit people like Jack who have diabetes."

The game works like this: Players, wearing special vests, use a slingshot-type mechanism to toss lightweight sponge balls at one another. The object is to avoid being hit while staying within the boundaries.

Splash Dash is aimed at children age 8 and older.

"I learned that working hard is the only way to get things done," said Gloria. "I also learned that if you have pride and faith in something, follow through with it. You never know how things will turn out."

West Virginia bishop commends Bush, governor for new mine safety laws

WHEELING, W.Va. (CNS) — Bishop Michael J. Bransfield of Wheeling-Charleston commended President George W. Bush for signing into law the Mine Improvement and New Emergency Response Act June 15 to improve the safety of coal miners and to strengthen recovery efforts of miners who are trapped.

He also commended West Virginia Gov. Joe Manchin, who was present for the signing at the White House, for state legislation passed in January.

"In the past months, because of the great catastrophes in West Virginia and the loss of life, we have seen improved laws concerning the protection of our miners," Bishop Bransfield said. "It is to the governor's credit and recently to the president's credit that these mining laws have been updated."

The MINER Act carries the first revisions to federal mine safety laws since the Federal Mine Safety and Health Act of 1977.

"The MINER Act will build on the Mine Safety and Health Administration's ongoing efforts to enhance mine safety training, to improve safety and communications technology for miners and provide more emergency supplies of breathable air along escape routes," Bush said.

With Bush for the signing of the new law was Randal McCloy, the sole survivor of the Jan. 2 Sago Mine disaster in Upshur County, W.Va., that left 12 miners dead.

A total of 33 miners, including 19 in West Virginia, have been killed in mine-related accidents in the U.S. this year. Bush's signing of the mine safety measure into law came less than a month after the latest tragedy in the state in which Todd Upton of Fairmont was killed in an accident May 25 at a mine in Harrison County.

Catholics can get indulgence for praying for families in early July

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — To encourage Catholics to attend the Fifth World Meeting of Families in Valencia, Spain, and to recite prayers with their families, Pope Benedict XVI is offering a special spiritual gift, the Vatican said.

"The gift of a plenary indulgence" will be given to those who participate in the July 1-9 meeting in Spain or who gather their own families together in early July to pray for families, the Vatican announced June 27.

An indulgence is a remission of the temporal punishment deserved for sins.

In order to receive the indulgence, Catholics must attend the meeting in Spain, go to confession, receive the Eucharist and offer prayers for the intentions of the pope.

If they cannot go to Spain, the decree said, "they will obtain the same plenary indulgence under the same conditions," but rather than going to the meeting they are to "recite as a family the Our Father, the creed and other devoted prayers" asking God to strengthen their families.

Both those in Spain and those remaining at home are to promise to "dedicate themselves generously to conforming their families ... to the holy rule of the Gospel," said the decree, which was signed by U.S. Cardinal J. Francis Stafford, head of the Apostolic Penitentiary, a Vatican court responsible for regulations governing indulgences.

Belmont Abbey Basilica, 100 Belmont-Mt. Holly Rd. Devotion begins at 9:30 a.m. with the recitation of the rosary, followed by reconciliation and Mass. For more information, call Phil or Terri at (704) 888-6050.

No one should be put to death, not even Saddam, says Vatican official

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — No one should be put to death, not even former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, said Cardinal Paul Poupard, president of the pontifical councils for Interreligious Dialogue and for Culture.

"The Catechism of the Catholic Church, the church itself and the pope reaffirm that every person is a creature of God and that no one but the creator can claim to be the lord of the life and death of another," the cardinal said June 21 in an interview with the Italian news agency ANSA.

"Every creature, even the most wretched, was created in the image and likeness of God," the French cardinal said. "God is the master of life and death."

The cardinal made his comments after Avvenire, the Italian bishops' daily newspaper, published an editorial June 20 calling for the life imprisonment and not the execution of Saddam and his co-defendants, who are on trial in Iraq.

"Even in the daily slaughterhouse of Iraq a human life — any human life — always is sacred," the newspaper said.

Revenge, even resulting from a fair trial, "will not heal wounds, but rather risks exacerbating them further," Avvenire said. "Nothing gives legitimacy to a killing unless it is motivated by a compelling need for legitimate defense."

In his final arguments in Saddam's trial June 19, the chief prosecutor called for the death penalty for Saddam and his co-defendants "because they spread corruption on earth, they showed no mercy even for the old, for women or for children, and even the trees were not safe from their oppression."

"The law calls for the death penalty, and this is what we ask be implemented," the prosecutor told the court.

Shared blessings

Hindus and Buddhists wait in line at Assumption Catholic Church in Katmandu, Nepal, for a blessing immediately after Communion. Nearly half the 700 people present at the church April 29 were non-Catholics so they queued up for the blessing since they cannot receive Communion.

"Only Catholics can receive Communion. But there are many Hindus who come for the Mass regularly," Father Justin Lepcha, vicar of the church, told Catholic News Service in mid-June. "Certainly, the number of non-Catholics attending the Mass is steadily going up. So, we have introduced this system of special blessing ... to make them feel at home in the church."

Msgr. Anthony Sharma, apostolic prefect of Nepal, who heads the 7,500-strong Catholic community in the Hindu kingdom, also said that "there is a growing demand from the people (Hindus and Buddhists) to become Christians."

In recent years, there have been between 300 and 400 mostly adult baptisms, said Msgr. Sharma.

DIOCESAN REQUIREMENTS FOR REPORTING MINISTRY-RELATED SEXUAL ABUSE OF A MINOR

1. Any individual having actual knowledge of or reasonable cause to suspect an incident of ministry-related sexual abuse is to immediately report the incident to the Chancery.
2. The Chancery will then report the incident to the proper civil authorities. The individual reporting the incident to the Chancery will be notified of the particulars regarding the Chancery's filing of the incident with civil authorities.
3. This reporting requirement is not intended to supersede the right of an individual to make a report to civil authority, but is to ensure proper, complete and timely reporting. Should an individual choose to make a report to civil authority, a report is still to be made to the Chancery.

Student from Charlotte wins national religious award

CHARLOTTE — Jeffrey Durkin, a parishioner of St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte and sophomore at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C., recently won a religious studies award.

Durkin, 18, is the 2005 winner of the A. Albert Clark Award for best undergraduate paper in religious studies or theology. Theta Alpha Kappa, a national honor society for religious studies and theology, presents the $200 annual award.

Durkin was recognized at a Georgetown Theta Alpha Kappa chapter awards dinner in April.

His essay, which was written as a term paper for theology class, will be published this year in the Journal of Theta Alpha Kappa.

Entitled "A Cultural Reading of Luke 16:1-9," it examines the historical context of the puzzling parable in which the dishonest steward is commended by his master.

At Georgetown, Durkin is in the

A spiritual home for all

New Our Lady of the Americas Church dedicated

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

BISCOE — Once a sleepy little mission, Our Lady of the Americas Church is now home to approximately 1,000 Catholics.

Since its establishment in the late 1980s, the mission church quickly outgrew its first home, a former Baptist church.

Approximately 1,000 members, guests, local officials and clergy attended the dedication Mass of the new Our Lady of the Americas Church June 25.

The Mass was celebrated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis, with Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin presiding. Principal concelebrants were Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and chancellor of the Diocese of Charlotte; Benedictine Abbot Patrick Shelton, pastor of St. James the Greater Church in Hamlet and Sacred Heart Church in Wadesboro; and Father Ricardo Sanchez, pastor of Our Lady of the Americas Church.

Msgr. Michael Buttner, pastor of Holy Family Church in Clemmons; and Father Mark Lawlor, pastor of St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte, also concelebrated along with priests of the Diocese of Raleigh.

"Here in the new church we come to worship and praise Jesus Christ, and celebrate the mystery and presence of Jesus Christ," said Bishop Jugis in his homily presented in Spanish.

Humble beginnings

When Our Lady of the Americas Church was founded in 1989, a multicultural outreach to the ever-growing Hispanic community in the Diocese of Charlotte was further strengthened.

Then-Bishop John F. Donoghue and Oblate Father Gerard Clarke established the first Catholic church in Montgomery County. When it came time to choose a name for the church — a mission of Our Lady of the Annunciation Church in Albemarle — Father Clarke suggested Our Lady of Guadalupe because the mission was made up mainly of Mexican immigrants.

Bishop Donoghue, wanting to ensure that the church would represent all the Catholics of the area, asked Father Clarke for other suggestions, and Our Lady of the Americas was chosen.

Bishop Donoghue dedicated and blessed the church in February 1990. Two Masses in Spanish, along with one in English, were scheduled originally. Since then, growth in the mission prompted the addition of a Saturday vigil Mass as well.

Over the next 15 years, the mission grew steadily as 2,000 Hispanic immigrants moved into Montgomery County.

"The original building ... was built to accommodate only about 130 people. We often squeezed in 300 or so," said Father Lawlor, who served as pastor of Our Lady of the Americas Church from August 1997 to July 1999.

"For Masses such as Palm Sunday, confirmation, first Communion, we used a community auditorium that was part of the old high school," said Father Lawlor.

Fundraising for the new facility began in January 1998 by selling food after the Sunday Masses. Two car raffles netted an additional $24,000.

Members of the children's choir sing during the dedication of Our Lady of the Americas Church.

By July 1999, $100,000 had been collected for the building fund and 15 acres were purchased from a farmer by using a diocesan loan.

On April 9, 2005, Bishop Jugis presided at a groundbreaking ceremony for the new church.

The new church

The new 24,000-square-foot facility features a worship space, social hall, four classrooms and meeting rooms, all under one roof. Many of the church furnishings were donated by members, church groups and other diocesan churches.

"May this new church be a place where the love of Christ is celebrated," said Bishop Jugis.

The 6,400-square-foot church includes stained-glass windows, Stations of the Cross made in California, and an Italian-made crucifix. The new altar contains relics of St. Augustine donated by St. John Neumann Church in Charlotte.

The matching baptismal font, altar and ambo were handcrafted in Mexico, and statues of Sts. Joseph and John and Our Lady of Consolation were imported from Mexico.

The new bell tower carillon is programmed with more than 100 hymns for daily Mass, Sunday Mass and special occasions such as Christmas, Easter, weddings and funerals.

A statue of Our Lady of Guadalupe, which is housed in an alcove to the left of the altar, was blessed by Bishop Jugis after it was processed to the altar by the Aztec Dancers, who performed a traditional Aztec ceremonial dance following the conclusion of the dedication Mass June 25.

Parish life

The emphasis on community is strong in the parish, with ethnic lines disappearing in a cooperative effort involving both Hispanic and Anglo church members. About 100 Anglo members work side-by-side with their Hispanic brothers and sisters to maintain the church's vitality.

The educational mission within Our Lady of the Americas Church is shared by volunteers through an active faith formation program taught in English and Spanish. Hispanic parishioners learn English at the church as well.

"It is great to see that the community persevered and they have constructed a very suitable place for worship, faith formation and fellowship," said Father Lawlor. "I was happy to concelebrate the dedication Mass and to know that I had a small part in the building of the community."

"May this church always be a place from which the love of Christ Jesus is spread throughout the surrounding community," said Bishop Jugis.

Lay ministry guides Catholics to deeper spirituality

Catholic Conference Center in Hickory June 11. Msgr. Mauricio W. West, chancellor and vicar general of the Diocese of Charlotte, presided.

The Lay Ministry Program is comprised of 12 classes each year, covering such topics as Scripture, Christology, theology and history of the Catholic Church, Vatican II, liturgy and sacrament, morality, social ministry and the "nuts and bolts" of ministry.

"Lay ministry isn't just learning about your faith," said Frank Villaronga, director of the diocesan Evangelization and Ministry Formation Office. "It is a formational program, and the idea behind lay ministry is that participants are in the program in order to answer their baptismal calls to ministry."

"The program is an extremely beneficial preparation for taking an active role in participating in Christ's mission to which we have been called in baptism," said Ralph Sullivan of Charlotte, who completed the lay ministry in June.

"The opportunity to learn about that mission through Scripture, tradition and church history, from talented instructors, while feeding off the energy of students committed to serve, left me thirsting for more," he said.

Most participants in the lay ministry program are trying to figure out what it means to be a minister, Villaronga said.

The program is comprised of people who might already be involved in some kind of activity or formal ministry in their parishes — prison ministry, catechesis, feeding the homeless — and those who are exploring various ministries.

Lay ministers contribute much-needed help to the sacramental ministers in parishes throughout the diocese.

"Bishops, priests and deacons can't do it all," said Villaronga.

Lay ministers can serve as counselors, spiritual companions, extraordinary ministers of holy Communion, catechists and in many other areas of the parish.

"(The program) was a call and a reminder that (Christ) still loves and cares for me," said Mark Mejias, Hispanic ministry coordinator at Holy Family Church in Clemmons. "I feel his love growing more and more."

Peggy O'Hanlon, a parishioner and volunteer at St. Michael Church in Gastonia, accepts her Presidential Active Lifestyle Award from Amy Hill, an instructor at South Gaston YMCA in Gastonia in April.

The award, part of the President's Challenge Physical Activity and Fitness Awards Program, is earned by performing physical activity five times a week over a six-week period.

O'Hanlon, 71, was nominated for the award due to her strong commitment to physical fitness, according to YMCA instructors, who tracked her regular participation in various group fitness and water aerobic classes.

Rising sixth-graders Mackenzie Evans and Michael Tepedino earn top honors in this year's President's Challenge Physical Activity and Fitness Awards program. They both won the Presidential Physical Fitness Award by scoring above the 85th percentile (based on the 1985 School Population Fitness Survey) in all five events, including pull-ups, curl-ups, push-ups and running.

The national physical fitness test is conducted annually at most schools and offers three levels of awards for students who meet the qualifications — the Presidential Physical Fitness Award, the National Physical Fitness Award and the Participant Physical Fitness Award.

Fifty-eight students from Immaculate Heart of Mary School in first- through eighth-grades also received the national award by scoring above the 50th percentile in all five events.

Those involved in stem-cell research may face excommunication destruction of a human embryo and therefore human life, "it is the same thing" as abortion and similarly entails excommunication, Cardinal Alfonso Lopez Trujillo, head of the Pontifical Council for the Family, said in a recent magazine interview.

Italy's leading Catholic magazine, Famiglia Cristiana, published the interview with the Colombian cardinal in its July 2 issue, released June 28.

"To destroy the embryo is equivalent to an abortion," he said, "and the excommunication applies to the woman, the doctors, the researchers who eliminate embryos."

In his 1995 encyclical "Evangelium Vitae," Pope John Paul II wrote that the church's evaluation of the immorality of abortion "is to be applied also to the recent forms of intervention on human embryos," even if the aim of the experimentation is legitimate, such as in research to treat fatal or debilitating diseases.

Any act that uses embryos or fetuses "as an object of experimentation constitutes a crime against their dignity as human beings" and this "killing of innocent human creatures, even if carried out to help others, constitutes an absolutely unacceptable act," the encyclical said.

The church supports the use of stem cells derived from adults or umbilical-cord blood for scientific research.

Cardinal Lopez Trujillo said those who face excommunication in the case of an abortion include "the mother, the doctor, the nurses, the father if he is in agreement" with aborting the child.

Abortion "is a crime, and instead it is becoming a right" in some countries, the cardinal said.

Human life is no longer considered something "sacred, untouchable, but has become something flexible in the hands of people who can decide even when (life) begins and when it ends," he said.

Instances where Catholic politicians pass laws that go against the teachings of the church call for "a reflection, because these (legislators) would not be able to approach the Eucharist," he said.

"No one in the world is authorized to contradict church doctrine concerning the protection of life at all stages," he added.

Threats against family

The cardinal's comments came a little more than a week before he and Pope Benedict XVI were set to attend the Fifth World Meeting of Families in Valencia, Spain, where life issues and threats against the family were expected to be major topics of discussion among participants.

Ampuls containing a medium for storing stem cells are shown by supervising cell biologist Lesley Young at the UK Stem Cell Bank in London May 19, 2004. The world's first embryonic stem-cell bank opened, breaking ground in one of the most controversial areas of medical research.

In the magazine interview, Cardinal Lopez Trujillo also denounced the growing trend among governments to legally recognize same-sex unions and said giving legal rights to gay couples was "even more serious" than giving similar rights to heterosexual couples.

Couples can only be a man and a woman, he said, and homosexual relationships represent "absolute emptiness."

Because of the church's vocal stand against laws that oppose church teaching, Cardinal Lopez Trujillo said he feared "the church risks being brought before some international court, if the debate gets more tense."

Speaking out in defense of human life and the family, "in some places, is becoming a sort of crime against the state, a form of disobedience against the government, discrimination against women," he said.

Renewed in the Spirit

Gifts of Holy Spirit shared at charismatic conference

BY DEACON GERALD POTKAY
CORRESPONDENT

HIGH POINT — The gifts of the Holy Spirit continue to inspire the faithful in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"Stay With Us," a Catholic charismatic conference, was held at Maryfield Chapel in High Point June 16-17.

Speakers included Deacon Dennis and Elizabeth Chitwood, charismatics from the Archdiocese of St. Louis, Mo., and founders of Genesis Ministry, which helps people who are emotionally scarred.

A Mass was celebrated by Father Andrew Lasko, a retired priest of the Diocese of Charlotte and resident at Maryfield Nursing Home.

"We are here today to bring the Good News that Jesus Christ is alive and well and is still fully present in the Eucharist," said Deacon Chitwood, who has a master of theology degree in pastoral studies with a focus on spiritual counseling from Aquinas Institute of Theology in St. Louis, Mo.

"Satan and his works are very prevalent in the world today, but he can be overcome by the grace of the Holy Spirit," said Deacon Chitwood.

"Remember that God is continually trying to restore us to that original goodness in which he first created us through the words of the Holy Spirit," he said.

Charismatics emphasize the living presence of the Holy Spirit in the Catholic Church. The charismatic renewal movement grew rapidly in the 1960s and '70s as a spiritual revival movement; it had its beginnings in prayer groups, mainly on U.S. college campuses, following the Second Vatican Council.

The birth of the movement is considered to be the outpouring of the Holy Spirit to two dozen students during a retreat at the Duquesne University in Pittsburgh in 1967.

But during a congress of lay movements in Italy in June, Patti Mansfield, who attended the 1967 retreat, said the Duquesne students were not founders of a movement.

"We are simply witnesses to what God has done."

— Patti Mansfield

"We are simply witnesses to what God has done," she said.

Nearly 120 million Catholics around the world have had some experience of the movement, she said.

The gifts, or charisms, of the Holy Spirit "are given for the purpose of building up the Body of Christ," said Elizabeth Chitwood.

"Therefore, we must be open to these gifts. Not for ourselves, but so that we might use them, give them away, all for the glory of God in the strengthening of the mystical Body of Christ," she said.

Throughout their lives and ministry, the Chitwoods have learned and reaffirmed their belief in articulating God's word.

"It is Satan who lies," said Elizabeth Chitwood. "He tells us that you are not good enough where you are. The truth is God loves you completely and beyond your understanding right where you are."

Elizabeth Chitwood emphasizes a point during her talk at the Catholic charismatic renewal conference at Maryfield Chapel in High Point June 16-17.

"There is nothing that I've done or can do that will cause God to love me less. And all we need to do in return is to love, to be like St. Paul as we are present to all people in all situations."

Many participants felt renewed after the conference.

"I think it's wonderful for all of us to be here together worshiping God. It pleases God that we are ... so enthusiastic about his son, Jesus," said Hanna Hammer, a parishioner of St. Pius X Church in Greensboro.

"At the same time, it is the Holy Spirit who gives us the desire to witness," she said.

Body and Blood of Christ

Corpus Christi celebration brings together faithful

BY DEACON GERALD POTKAY
CORRESPONDENT

REIDSVILLE — Both English- and Spanish-speaking parishioners came together recently to celebrate the power of the Eucharist.

"The people must be able to see, with the eyes of faith, the superiority of Jesus' divine flesh, which will ultimately transform us," said Father Christopher Roux, administrator of Holy Infant Church in Reidsville.

Father Roux led a eucharistic procession outside the church as part of the parish celebration of the feast of the Body and Blood of Christ June 18.

The Catholic feast was formerly known as Corpus Christi and often involves the Eucharist being carried in procession down city streets or around public squares.

"If we spend our time and effort on sin, we cannot focus upon Jesus, who is the center of our worship," said Father Roux.

"We all must know that the grace of Christ is found in this present moment," he said. "Jesus says, 'Don't look for me in the past. I am not there. Don't look for me in the future. I am not there. I am in the present. Look for me here, for I am here.'"

The celebration included a bilingual Mass with the English- and Spanish-language choirs, as well as the children's choir from St. Mark Church in Huntersville.

"This celebration truly brought everyone together. It is good to see our community come together as one," said parishioner Bob Krebs.

"It was just overwhelming to see one community come together like this," said Lisa Poppa, a parishioner of St. Paul the Apostle Church in Greensboro.

"It must have taken a lot of planning, coordination and effort on everyone's part to make a celebration like this happen," she said.

The celebration, which took six months of planning, was designed to bring the two communities together with Jesus Christ at the center of their faith.

The efforts have inspired other changes within the parish — work crews, including members of the parish and Knights of Columbus Council 6970 — have made improvements and changes to the church and parish hall.

The alterations were accomplished in time for the feast day.

"I really thought this was a good celebration," said parishioner John Wall. "The people really turned out in great numbers for it."

During his midday Angelus address June 18, Pope Benedict XVI said that while the Eucharist is the church's treasure, the focus of its liturgy and adoration, its life-giving and life-changing power extends beyond the walls of a church or chapel.

"The Eucharist is the Lord Jesus who gives himself for the life of the world," the pope said.

By transforming bread and wine into his Body and Blood, Jesus began the process of the "divinization of creation itself," demonstrating that his life, death and resurrection were meant to transform the whole world, the pope said.

The Corpus Christi celebration is a sign that "we want to immerse the bread come down from heaven in our daily lives; we want Jesus to walk where we walk and to live where we live," he said.

The public procession, he said, proclaims to the world that "the Eucharist is everything" for the church, it is the church's life and source of love.

Hundreds honor Eucharist at Asheville conference

In his homily during the Mass opening the conference, Bishop Jugis gave reasons for having a eucharistic procession.

"The procession reminds us that the whole people of God are on a journey, or procession, through history. On the journey through history, the holy Eucharist is with us for food for the journey," he said.

"As we are also on a journey, or procession, we are reminded of the journey of the people of God to the promised land of heaven, and of the mission to change the world around us to reflect more closely the values of the Gospel," said the bishop.

About 500 Catholics from throughout the Diocese of Charlotte participated in the procession.

"It was wonderful to see and experience our eucharistic Jesus being given the praise and honor of which he is so deserving," said Gail Carroll, a parishioner of the Basilica of St. Lawrence.

"At first, I felt a little foolish walking through the streets," said Carroll. "Then I thought of how Jesus humbled himself for us on his way to the cross."

"I was so happy to see him on display for everyone to see, to exalt him for what he does for us," she said.

The conference was designed to be a prelude to the second Eucharistic Congress to be held in Charlotte Oct. 6-7. Like the congress, the event in Asheville centered on the Eucharist and its importance in Catholic life.

Following the procession to the Asheville Civic Center, Bishop Jugis led the participants in a holy hour, including a Gospel reading, homily and singing of the litany of the saints.

The conference also featured Patrick Madrid, a Catholic apologist and author of several books defending the Catholic faith, who spoke on "The Mission to Evangelize, Search and Rescue."

The first step to evangelization is to be willing to stand up and speak about Jesus and the gift of the Eucharist, said Madrid.

"Let's not be ashamed of the Eucharist ... but be proud of the Eucharist in a charitable and winsome sense," he said.

Madrid presented his audience with six reasons to believe in the real presence of Jesus in the Eucharist and three "don'ts" for Catholics.

According to Madrid, Catholics should not doubt Christ; should not be ashamed of the Eucharist; nor should they be "lukewarm" about their faith.

"Be faithful and we can conquer

"The holy Eucharist is with us for food for the journey."

apathy and ignorance about the Eucharist," Madrid said.

"The conference was such a witness to what our faith is, to what's going on here, a proclamation of our faith and what we believe," said Rosemary Kingsley, parishioner of the Basilica of St. Lawrence.

"The conference was a beautiful opportunity for people in the western part of the diocese to come together and celebrate their unity in faith through the sacrament of the unity: the holy Eucharist," Bishop Jugis said.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis carries a monstrance during the eucharistic procession in Asheville June 25. The procession was part of the diocesan Eucharistic Conference in Asheville.

What participants said about the Eucharistic Conference:

"Aside from the blessings that the faithful receive, for the city of Asheville to receive the blessings of our Lord literally walking through its streets is incomprehensible," said Father Matthew Kauth, pastor of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Franklin.

"This was a day of spiritual reflection and community, a chance to share with fellow Catholics who share the same beliefs with a more in-depth feeling of community," said Clarisse Grubby, a parishioner of St. Benedict Church in Greensboro.

"I read about the conference and saw it as a day to reflect on more peace in the world and to bring unity for people who participate," said Joan Calvert, a parishioner of Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro. "Walking through the streets of Asheville made me proud to be a Christian, a Catholic."

"The conference made me feel stronger about my faith," said Tommy Davis, a parishioner of the Basilica of St. Lawrence. "Mass is mostly the same each day, but a big change such as this opens people's eyes and makes them see things differently about the (Catholic) Church."

"The people bonded and were joyful during the conference," said Alice Cella, a parishioner of the Basilica of St. Lawrence. "All the various groups pulled together, and the pagentry was ... quite moving."

Holy Spirit Church bids pastor a fond farewell

DENVER — Parishioners at Holy Spirit Church in Denver had the opportunity to thank their pastor, Father Joseph Ayathupadam, for his six-and-a-half years of spiritual guidance June 25.

A farewell reception was held in the parish activity center to wish him well in his upcoming retirement.

Following Mass, the Knights of Columbus escorted Father Ayathupadam from the church to the parish activity center, where he was met with a standing ovation by about 170 parishioners who had gathered to pay tribute to their pastor.

He was presented with cards, a laptop computer and other gifts. Earlier that morning, the Knights of Columbus and faith formation groups had sponsored a living rosary in his honor.

During Father Ayathupadam's leadership, Holy Spirit Church's membership grew from 260 to 450 families. In September 2005, the parish built a 20,000-square-foot activity center for its fast-growing congregation.

Father Ayathupadam grew up in southern India and knew at an early age that he wanted to serve in religious life. In the 45 years he has served as a priest, he worked in India, Africa, Europe and Canada before coming to the United States in 1978.

"Father Ayathupadam has served the Lord and the Catholic Church in many parts of the world, and we in the Diocese of Charlotte have been blessed to benefit from his priestly zeal and faithfulness to the Lord," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis.

"From the time Father Ayathupadam and I served together as parochial vicars of St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem in the early 1990s, I have respected his wisdom and enjoyed his sense of humor," said Bishop Jugis.

Father Ayathupadam said he looks forward to traveling again and visiting his family. Although he has traveled worldwide, Father Ayathupadam considers America his home.

Recently, he bought a house in south Charlotte and will spend his retirement years there.

Father Hoover celebrates retirement at St. Ann Church

Catholic convert served several parishes in Diocese of Charlotte

CHARLOTTE — More than 400 parishioners, friends and family members gathered at St. Ann Church in Charlotte June 10 to honor Father Conrad Hoover upon his retirement.

Father Hoover celebrated his "farewell" Mass, concelebrated by Msgr. Mauricio W. West, diocesan chancellor and vicar general; and Msgr. Richard Bellow, pastor of St. Mark Church in Huntersville. Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin presided at the Mass.

Following the Mass, special guests, including Msgr. West; Sister of St. Joseph Helene Nagle, principal of St. Ann School; Nancy West, a founding member of St. Ann Church; and others paid tribute to Father Hoover with stories and anecdotes.

Father Hoover began his ministry as an ordained Presbyterian minister. In 1970, he became a member of the ecumenical Church of the Saviour in Washington, D.C.

In 1979, Father Hoover was received into the Catholic Church and was ordained to the priesthood in 1989. He earned a master's degree from Union Theological Seminary in New York and a doctorate in ministry from Catholic University in Washington, D.C.

"Father Hoover has been a faithful servant of the Lord, as pastor of several parishes in the diocese over the years," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis.

Father Hoover plans to spend his retirement traveling and reading. He also will be assisting Msgr. Bellow at St. Mark Church.

"I am glad he will be settling here in our diocese during his retirement, so he can continue to offer his priestly ministry to the faithful of the diocese," said Bishop Jugis.

Forming the faithful

Sister Meehan to take on parish work in Charleston

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — After a decade of helping form North Carolina students in the faith, Mercy Sister Maureen Meehan is moving on.

Sister Meehan, director of religious formation for diocesan Catholic schools, accepted a position in the Diocese of Charleston, S.C., where she will serve as director of religious formation at two parishes.

She was honored by her coworkers at a farewell reception at the diocesan Pastoral Center June 23.

Father James Hawker, vicar for education and pastor of St. Luke Church in Mint Hill, said Sister Meehan's role in the Diocese of Charlotte was "truly valuable."

Since 1996 she ensured that "teachers throughout the system have been enabled to appreciate the nature and mission of the Catholic school, as well as their responsibility to contribute to the realization of its identity and mission," he said.

Sister Meehan's duties included coordinating the formulation and implementation of curriculum guidelines and the certification and ongoing development of religion teachers in Catholic schools.

"The teacher must take diligent care to faithfully present the entire treasure of the Christian message," she said.

In 2002, Sister Meehan developed a book of standards that was adopted by the Religion Education Office for religious curriculum in kindergarten through the 12th grade. More than 30 training workshops throughout the year further assisted teachers in implementing the standards and guidelines into their everyday curriculum.

"All new teachers, whether they're teaching religion or not, must go through a period of training on the traditions of the church and Scripture to remind them that our schools are beacons of Catholic identity," said Sister Meehan.

For three decades, Sister Meehan's life has been centered around Catholic instruction within schools. In addition to her bachelor's degree in education, she has master's degrees in religious education administration, theology and spirituality, and a doctorate in ministry.

She has taught at the elementary, high school and college levels and served as a principal.

"We are grateful for the richness of her contribution to Catholic education in this diocese," said Father Hawker. "Her impact upon the diocese will be apparent well into the future."

Books tell of Founders' fight for religious freedom, beliefs

BY BEN GRUVER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — This Fourth of July, Americans not only can celebrate their independence but also their religious liberty, thanks to our Founding Fathers.

"The Founders on Religion: A Book of Quotations" and "Washington's God" both illustrate the truth about the Founders' faiths and religious beliefs.

James Hutson, chief of the manuscript division at the Library of Congress, is the editor of "The Founders on Religion."

Hutson said many books of quotations only mention one or two things about the Founders' religion and try too hard to make a case for what they believed by using anecdotes that are false, which he said damages the credibility of what is true.

"The Founders on Religion" is a byproduct of a 1998 exhibition at the Library of Congress: "Religion and the Founding of the American Republic," which Hutson put together.

In it, he showed that the Founding Fathers were Christian and that religion was indispensable to the nation's institutions.

"(The Founding Fathers) were idiosyncratic," Hutson said.

For instance, he said, John Adams was a Unitarian and George Washington was an Episcopalian who believed in providence — the guiding power of an invisible hand.

Washington was also a Mason, as were many Christians in his day.

Hutson searched for figures who represented religious views of people at the time. Seventeen people are quoted in the book.

In addition to the Founding Fathers, Hutson quoted some lesser known figures, such as John Dickinson, who was president of Delaware in 1781 and Pennsylvania in 1782, and Benjamin Rush, one of the most influential physicians and social reformers of the Revolutionary period.

Some of them had opinions about Catholicism.

"I have long been decided in opinion that a free government and the Roman Catholic religion can never exist together in any nation or country," Adams said to Thomas Jefferson as quoted in Hutson's book.

In "Washington's God," co-authors Michael Novak and his daughter, Jana, both Catholics, examine the way Washington spoke of God and providence.

They also debunked the myth that Washington was a deist. Deists reject revelation or authority as sources of belief, believing in God purely on rational grounds.

"A deist," Novak said, "is someone who believes, 'Well, God may have created the world but he doesn't really take sides. He really doesn't interfere in individual lives.'"

Washington respected all religions and didn't criticize anyone because of what they believed, according to Novak's book.

When Washington asked Maryland politician Charles Carroll what Catholics hoped to gain from their newfound freedom, Carroll responded that Catholics wanted to be free from religious tests for public office, Novak said.

Carroll was the only Catholic to sign the Declaration of Independence and worked to win political and civil rights for American Catholics.

Novak said an example that illustrates Washington wasn't a deist comes from when he was general of the Continental Army — he encouraged his men to pray for the assistance of divine providence in their duties.

Belief in providence helps one understand his or her success is owed in part to God, "and it tempers the bitterness of defeat," said Novak.

Another piece of evidence is when Washington accepted the offer to be the godfather of eight children of Christian parents, Novak said. He took on the responsibility of providing them with a Christian education and sent them prayer books as well as other signs of his Christian faith, he said.

He also noted that such terms as "under God," which was added to the Pledge of Allegiance in 1954, really "begin with Washington."

Abraham Lincoln, who was a student of Washington, used "under God" in the Gettysburg Address.

"The phrase 'under God' ties us to ... early historical moments," Novak said. "And it's main point is there're limitations on government."

"Both men recognize that they aren't the controller of events, they aren't the disposer of events," he said. "They depend very heavily (on) divine providence. So the use of the phrase in the Pledge of Allegiance has tremendous historic resonance."

The America of Washington's era held religion and freedom in the same regard.

The great Christian preachers were in favor of independence, Novak said. People didn't need to be intimidated by each other because they all had the same rights by the same God, he said.

"That's why Washington insisted on public prayer — to keep people faithful to that and behaving in light of that," Novak said. "They're asking God's favor — they better behave like God's people."

Washington believed there are some things that go beyond human understanding. By that, Novak said, he meant that just because something disappears, such as the sun behind a cloud, doesn't mean one should stop believing in it.

"It's a violation of American history not to see ... the great role that religion played in giving people courage and direction in fighting for liberty," he said.

Faith heals, but cannot be forced

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

It was only 20 minutes into the deacon's introductory class on Christian morality that it became obvious the three people slinging questions at him from the back of the room had an agenda.

They had come not to learn, but to make sure he "got it right." Judging by their increasing agitation, they clearly thought he didn't.

Deacon Mike was highly and widely regarded in the local Catholic community for his homilies and teaching. Fully a third of the participants in this particular class had come because he was the teacher.

A university economics professor,

Deacon Mike had a reputation for his knowledge of theology, church history, and Catholic teaching, and a gift for making it understandable to everyone. When he gave the homily at Mass even teenagers sat up and listened.

But on this night he was under fire, as the questions grew more heated.

The other students became restive and not a little resentful as these participants soon were dominating class time by loudly interrupting to push their contrary opinions on two or three specific issues of Christian morality.

But the deacon firmly and kindly answered them in steady tones with what he had promised in the course: accurate, current Catholic teaching based on Scripture and the latest edition of the Catechism of the Catholic Church.

He was simply teaching the truth of God's Word. For some it was not easy to believe or follow. But he would not be drawn into a fight. There was no point. The truth takes hold in an open heart.

But there is no forcing it into a hardened one. It is receptiveness, not coercion, that is the key to salvation. Jesus explained repeatedly that it is our faith that heals and saves us.

In today's Gospel he tells his disciples to share his message, but not to waste energy on those who are not receptive.

Here's another important instruction for all of us who might spread the Word: Take a walking stick, not a club.

'Water' worth wading through

Seema Biswas (right) and Sarala star in a scene from the movie "Water," a poignant drama set in 1938 India about the lives of women who, in accordance with Hindu tradition, are required — following their husbands' deaths — to live out their days as outcasts in a squalid widows' ashram.

These women include an 8-year-old child bride (Sarala); a young beauty (Lisa Ray) forced into prostitution by the camp's matriarch (Manorma) who falls for a progressive-minded law student (John Abraham); and a devout older woman (Biswas), torn between conscience and her faith.

Visually poetic with soulful performances, director Deepa Mehta's film is simple yet deeply moving, balancing heartbreak and hope as it explores the lives of the widows in whose humanity is reflected the dignity of all women.

Implied prostitution, a suicide, brief drug usage, a transvestite character, some sexual references and a few mildly crude expressions. Subtitles.

St. Padre Pio brought to life in biographical drama on DVD

BY DAVID DiCERTO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — Beloved by millions, Padre Pio — saint, stigmatic, humble priest — is brought to life in the artfully crafted biographical drama, "Padre Pio, Miracle Man," starring Sergio Castellitto.

Originally broadcast over two nights on Italian television in 2000, the film — now released on DVD from NoShame Films — traces the life of the pious Capuchin friar, born Francesco Forgione in 1887, from his peasant roots in rural southern Italy to his death in 1968.

Told through a series of flashbacks as an elderly and mortally ill Padre Pio recounts his story to a skeptical bishop (Jurgen Prochnow), the DVD runs nearly four hours and focuses on the monk's years at the monastery of San Giovanni Rotondo, where his popularity as a confessor, visionary and miracle worker attracted both devotion and controversy, prompting two Vatican investigations.

Padre Pio was beatified in 1999 and canonized in 2002 by Pope John Paul II, who, as the film dramatizes, visited the mystic as a young priest.

Director Carlo Carlei's reverent, if episodic, approach avoids hagiography in presenting a nuanced portrait of Padre Pio in remarkably human terms, showing him grappling with fear and self-doubt, battling poor health and spiritual trials while remaining steadfast in his faith, his fidelity to the church, and his concern for the souls in his care.

Castellitto's soulful performance conveys an accessible blend of humor, sanctity and tough love.

Beautifully shot, with picturesque Italian vistas, the film eloquently captures Padre Pio's simple spirituality of uniting one's life with Christ — especially in suffering — and should be of particular interest to those with a special devotion to the saint.

The DVD includes a companion booklet containing a short biography of Padre Pio, Pope John Paul II's address during the saint's canonization and an interview with the film's star.

Subtitled.

The film contains scenes of demonic torment and some mature thematic elements. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. Not rated by the Motion Picture Association of America.

DiCerto is on the staff of the Office for Film & Broadcasting of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Murphy named Teacher of the Year

CHARLOTTE — Joanne Murphy, a second-grade teacher at St. Patrick School in Charlotte, was recently named a Teacher of the Year.

Since 1995, the Wal-Mart Teacher of the Year program, one of the largest teacher recognition programs in the country, has recognized more than 25,000 teachers in the United States and Puerto Rico and contributed more than $19 million in educational grants to those schools.

Murphy accepted a $1,000 educational grant on behalf of St. Patrick School.

"We are proud to help raise awareness for excellence in education and to salute teachers, who play such an important role in growing and shaping young people," said Betsy Reithemeyer, director of the Wal-Mart/Sam's Club Foundation.

"We encourage parents to help students nominate a teacher who's made a difference in their lives," she said.

Murphy, a parishioner of St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte, was nominated by a parent of one of her students.

Fifth-graders win top prizes in county contest

GREENSBORO — Three fifth-graders took home top honors for explaining the U.S. government.

Students Jonah Carmichael, Jack Sartore and Alex Bruno from Our Lady of Grace School in Greensboro received first and second places in the "Liberty Under Law: Separate Branches, Balanced Powers" multimedia contest, in which Guilford County students illustrated the three branches of U.S. government.

The contest, sponsored by the Greensboro Bar Association, was part of the annual Law Day observance May 1. In addition to receiving cash prizes, the winning entries were displayed at the Law Day panel discussion at the Greensboro Historical Museum May 1.

The three students were recognized during Mass at Our Lady of Grace Church May 3.

Alex and Jack won the first place elementary school award for their Lego movie on the three branches of government. Jonah won second place for a Power Point presentation.

Superman and Jesus

Similarities abound, but Son of God trumps Man of Steel

Look! Up in the sky, it's a bird, it's a plane ... you know the rest.

Superman, the ultimate hero, is back in the film "Superman Returns." His cape and costume are darker; the flying sequences are as breathtaking as a roller coaster.

And just so aging baby boomers won't feel guilty about their affection for a comic book character, this version of the Man of Steel has a deeper meaning.

Part of the hype associated with this latest iteration of Superman is his connection to the biblical story of Jesus. This is a retrofit at best.

The creators of Superman, Jerry Siegel and Joe Schuster, are both dead, but early accounts of their inspiration for the character include Tarzan and Popeye, not Jesus, Mary and Joseph.

But a comparison between the son of Jor-El and the Son of God can be instructive and even fun.

Superman, like Jesus, was sent here by his father and both were wrapped in swaddling clothes upon arrival. The Superman story takes an Old Testament twist when the Kent family finds the infant in his rocket ship. It is reminiscent of Moses among the river reeds, but that kind of confusion can happen when you retrofit a story.

Both Superman and Jesus had relatively obscure formative years. The only account of Jesus as a boy is found in the second chapter of Luke, where he made an impression on the leaders of the Temple at the age of 12.

In the latest film, Superman flies through the heavens with the greatest of ease; in the Bible, Jesus ascended into heaven.

Superman has X-ray vision and he uses it to look through walls and to check Lois Lane for damage after she takes a hard knock on the head.

Jesus has the ability to look into our souls. He demonstrates this in the Gospel

Catholics & the Media

DAVID HAINS
GUEST COLUMNIST

of John when the teachers at the temple bring an adulterous woman to him; "If any one of you is without sin, let him be the first to throw a stone at her" (John 8:7).

Superman died and came back to life about a year later — this happened in a series of comic book stories in the early 1990s. Jesus' Resurrection was a tad more spectacular, is far better remembered and obviously more significant.

Superman and Jesus are both close to women with alliterative names — Lois Lane for Superman, Mary Magdalene for Jesus. But there is a big difference between the women.

Lois Lane is a damsel in distress. Mary Magdalene is one of the strongest women in history. She demonstrated great courage at the foot of the cross and was the first human to proclaim the Resurrection.

And then there is Kryptonite, those green remnants of the planet Krypton. The glowing stones are the only physical connection Superman has to his home and, oddly, they make him ill.

In the literal realm, Kryptonite is the Achilles heel, the one weakness, the tragic flaw in the character of Superman. The presence of this vulnerability gives comic book writers the hook they need to craft stories in which the readers can't predict the outcome.

Without Kryptonite, Superman always wins and the reader ends up bored. With it, there is a chance that he and his spandex costume could be harmed, just like the rest of us.

With Jesus there is no Kryptonite. He was, is and always will be divine. His life has no flaws, nothing can defeat him. Jesus isn't a character who provides us a diversion of fantasy; he is real, he is with us.

But perhaps the biggest difference between Superman and Jesus is that the character with the "S" on his chest rescues a few people, while the man with the wound in his side saves us all.

Pope says being Christian includes living out faith through charity

VATICAN CITY — To be a Christian is more than just identifying oneself as a believer in the faith; it entails living out the Gospel through concrete works of charity, especially for the poor and those in need, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Faith in Christ "must come to fruition in one's life, above all in one's love for the other and in particular in caring for the poor," he said during his weekly general audience June 28.

The pope continued a series of talks on the church's apostolic ministry by focusing his catechesis on St. James the Less.

The pope concentrated on the important legacy St. James left today's Christians in his teachings in the New Testament Letter of James.

This apostle showed people "a Christianity (that is) very concrete and practical," the pope said.

His epistle insists that faith in Christ must not be "reduced to a plain verbal or abstract declaration," but that it must be "expressed concretely in doing good works," said the pope.

St. James also invites people to joyously accept one's trials, he said, and serenely abandon oneself to the will of God, "who knows the true good for us."

Through prayer, God will give the gift of wisdom that leads one to discover that what has true value in life is not the

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

"fleeting riches" on earth but is the awareness that people are meant to share their "means with the poor and needy," the pope said.

While St. Paul said a person will be known as just by his faith in Jesus and not by performing "works of the law," the pope said this seemingly contradictory teaching, in fact, complements what St. James teaches.

St. Paul was speaking out against pride and self-righteousness that tempt a person into thinking God's grace is not a gift that only God can give, but that it can be earned through performing rituals or good deeds, he said.

Good works, instead, follow from true faith in Jesus, the pope said, because just as a body without the spirit is dead, faith without good works is dead.

At the end of the audience, the pope called on young people to take advantage of these summer months of vacation with useful social and religious activities.

Casting out lines, reeling in souls

God is there always to pluck us from the depths

It was deadline day at The Catholic News & Herald — meetings were scheduled, phones were ringing and stories needed editing.

So I decided to knock off for a few hours and do some fishing. I grabbed my rod and tackle box and drove out to my favorite fishing spot in Gaston County.

As I neared the lake, I noticed God fishing from the end of the pier. He was sitting, sandals off, feet dangling just above the water. He held a stick with a string, which disappeared into the calm lake.

He looked up at me and smiled. "Hello there."

"Hi, God," I said. "I didn't know you fished here."

"It's one of many places I like to wet a line," he replied, scanning the scenery.

"So, how are they biting today?" I asked.

"Haven't caught anything yet," he replied, "but you're welcome to join me."

So I did, casting my line out beside his. "What are you using for bait?" I inquired.

"Nothing," he said. "I just let the fish know I'm here. They choose to bite or not."

That was odd, I thought. "How do you expect to catch anything like that?"

He simply shrugged.

The lake was swarming with fish, nibbling on this or that, yet most of them were darting by God's hook with barely a glance.

It made me realize how many people go through life, so consumed with trivial

Murray's Musings

EDITOR

things that they don't realize God is in their midst, or, worse, that they ignore him completely.

Most of us are starving for something more, and we stuff ourselves with morsels of false hopes and guilty pleasures, yet are always left feeling empty inside. And we turn to God only when we really need him; when we're finally hungry enough to bite.

Thankfully he's always there, waiting to pull us in and pluck us from the murky depths into his loving embrace.

But we are called to more — we are not only meant to recognize God's love, but to share it, live it. A big task for many; perhaps it's easier to just give up, do nothing.

Suddenly, the devil approached in a rowboat. "Good morning!"

"Oh, for the love of me," sighed God. "Not this guy again."

"I noticed you're not having any luck," called Lucifer, grinning. "There are plenty of hungry fish on the other side of the lake. Hop in and I'll take you over."

"No thanks, Lu," said God, waving him off. "We're fine."

"You, sir," said Lucifer, eyeing me. "Throw down your fishing rod and follow me, and you shall have all the fish you can stomach."

It seemed an inviting offer. I glanced to God.

"Sure, he'll feed you," whispered God, "but what he offers will leave quite the bitter taste in your mouth."

I made my decision, and again cast my line out beside God's.

"So be it," grunted Lucifer. "Maybe, then, I'll try my luck with the fish."

He lit a stick of dynamite and went to toss it into the water.

God shook his head, then snapped his fingers. A whirlpool formed under the devil's boat and swallowed him up. A moment later, the water was calm again.

"Wow! You sure showed him," I said.

"I just hope that devil doesn't sour the lake," said God. "These fish — they have enough to worry about."

"What's to worry?" I asked. "You're here."

He smiled and patted me on the head.

I had work to do, so I bid God farewell. Walking away, I glanced back at the pier. God was still there, silently dabbing his line in the water, ever patient, ever mindful.

It's true — some days the fish don't bite, but we never give up the faith. Because if we don't cast our lines, we won't catch a thing.

Your charitable report

Guest Column

Document can recall, inspire stewardship

Putting one's affairs in order usually includes an up-to-date will, a directive to physicians, a power of attorney, funeral instructions and, sometimes, a loving letter or video addressed to immediate family members.

Perhaps another document might be called "My Charitable Report." It could be a notebook, folder or large envelope. The report should explain your philosophy of giving — why you engaged in charitable giving.

The purpose of this report, of course, is not to boast about your gifts, but to explain what you did and why you did it so your survivors can be inspired to imitate your example. If you prefer to avoid listing names and types of gifts, at least provide insight into your purposes and practices.

After stating your philosophy of giving, list the names of those organizations you have supported through your regular giving. Indicate why these organizations were important to you and what led you to start and continue your support.

Then list special gifts you can recall — capital campaign gifts to your parish or others, along with any other major contributions — and explain why you made them.

Finally, disclose the planned gifts you made, including the bequests in your will, any charitable gift annuities, charitable trusts, endowments or other gift arrangements. Explain your thinking and motivation.

Also, include a copy of any gift-related documents in this section of your report. Be sure to highlight any conditions that should be monitored by the family, such as endowment provisions.

Your charitable report brings together in one place the giving philosophy and practices of your life. It will be an important document and highly influential in motivating your children, grandchildren and even great-grandchildren to follow in your steps in the practice of stewardship.

You don't need to preach; the power of your example will be enough to inspire imitation.

The songs of summer

Routines can help build family, relationships

Yessiree, summertime has officially arrived!

Some of us know this because the weather is hot and sticky, our main streets are lined with American flags for the Fourth of July parade, and the radio is cranking out those songs that make us want to head to the beach.

But for many of us, we realize the season has begun when we hear these classic tunes, "Mom, Joey looked at me again ... Hey, he hit me too ... Stop it!" and the ever-popular, "I'm bored."

We ask ourselves, "When did summer stop feeling like heaven on earth and begin feeling like a three-month sentence of conflict-resolution and perpetual event planning?"

If the start of July has you feeling less like "Free Bird" and more like "Witchy Woman," read on for some liberating tips.

Does Anybody Really Know What Time It Is?

Try to build in a rhythm to your summer days.

Maybe mornings are for chores and running errands. Afternoons are for adventures to the water park, shopping mall, the Raptor Center or Imagination.

It doesn't really matter — find what works for your family. The important thing is having a sense of routine, even though school is out.

Peace Train

"Can't we all just get along?" If too much togetherness is causing riots in your household, try:

— Setting a timer for the sharing of toys, television, computer, etc.

— Deciding on a family tactic for resolving conflict such as "rock, paper, scissors" or rolling dice.

— Posting rules on the refrigerator for consequences to arguments and fights.

When squabbles do break out, don't try to get to the bottom of who did what to whom first. Rather, all involved in the skirmish receive the consequence, such as time out in separate corners (rule of thumb is one minute for each year of the child's age).

This way, kids are motivated to work things out between themselves.

Shower the People

Keep in mind, these days — long as they may seem — are fleeting. Use this special time to deepen your relationships.

Peace of Mind

In the summer, it's the simple things that matter most. On Sunday after Mass, pack a picnic and head out to the lake. At the end of the day, turn off the TV and read aloud from a page-turner (even older kids like this).

Try to make a special "date" for each child alone during the week to do something unique with him or her. Go to a favorite restaurant, a movie or sports event. Create time to play board games as a family.

Children cherish this kind of attention and will remember these times well into adulthood.

Above all else, face this summer with a "Peaceful, Easy Feeling" and enjoy two of God's greatest gifts — time and family — with a song in your heart.

Making poverty history

Community, faith leaders rally against poverty

BY BEN GRUVER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Several hundred community and faith leaders along with religious activists from around the nation marched in Washington June 27 to fight against poverty.

The event celebrated the unveiling of the Covenant for a New America, a faith-based strategy for overcoming poverty.

The march and a related conference were hosted by Sojourners and Call to Renewal, a national network of churches, faith-based organizations and individuals working to overcome poverty in America.

Twenty-three national religious groups and religious leaders endorsed the covenant.

Among other things, the document aims to bring people from all religious and political backgrounds together so they can hold each other accountable for ending poverty. One goal is to develop a plan to cut child poverty in half over the next 10 years.

Among those endorsing the covenant was Sister Marge Clark, a Sister of Charity of the Blessed Virgin Mary who is a lobbyist with Network, a national Catholic social justice lobby whose mission is to bring about economic justice.

Sister Clark said she was proud to sign the covenant.

Jean Sammon, an organizer with Network, said the organization follows the Catholic social teaching principle of addressing the structures that affect poor people.

Several hundred people, including representatives of faith-based groups, march in Washington June 27 to demand an end to poverty. People marched from the National City Christian Church to the U.S. Capitol where they called on Congress to make eliminating poverty a priority.

Women Religious, said her organization also endorsed the covenant because it is consistent with LCWR's positions on poverty.

"Since 1727 when the first (Catholic sisters) arrived in this country, we consistently stood with the marginalized and the poor, especially women and children, and this document that we are endorsing is consistent with that position," Sister Carole told Catholic News Service.

She also was a speaker at the event.

The protesters marched to Upper Senate Park at the U.S. Capitol from the National City Christian Church, chanting as they went: "In God's name, make poverty history," "Raise minimum wage," and "Make work work."

The message of religious and government leaders who spoke at the park was clear: "Make poverty history."

Rev. Jim Wallis, founder of Sojourners and author of "God's Politics:

Why the Right Gets It Wrong and the Left Doesn't Get It," said the poor are the new interest group in Washington.

"Poverty is God's special interest," Rev. Wallis said. "This place (Congress) will be judged on how they treat (the poor)."

Rev. Wallis urged the faith community to eliminate poverty.

"As long as they (political leaders) make bad decisions, we will have to tell them what the decisions ought to be," he said.

Rev. Wallis urged the audience to "be a special interest group on Capitol Hill."

U.S. Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee, D-Texas, attended the rally. She said she believes that poverty and racism need to be ended in America.

"It is important for the faith community to announce ... that poverty is not a family value," Lee told CNS. "It is important for the U.S. Congress to wake up and address the need of people who are in poverty."

Lee called it outrageous that poverty around the world continues to increase.

Adjusted for inflation, the current minimum wage is the lowest it's been in the last 50 years, Lee added.

The Rev. David Beckmann agreed.

Rev. Beckmann, a Lutheran minister, is president of Bread for the World, a Christian anti-hunger lobby. He said his organization is glad to be endorsing the covenant.

"We people of faith are here to wake up our political leaders and say here is what God is calling us to tell them," he told the crowd.

Kevin Hunter, vice president of domestic programs at World Vision, mentioned three of the covenant's core points his organization welcomes and feels are important to endorse:

— The covenant unites faith communities on common ground.

— It promotes biblical justice.

— It calls supporters to use persuasion for ending poverty.

SPARTA — From humble beginnings to a thriving community, the mission church of St. Frances of Rome has come a long way in its 40-year history.

Hundreds crowded inside and outside of the small Sparta church as Bishop Peter J. Jugis celebrated a bilingual Mass commemorating its 40th anniversary June 9.

"There has been tremendous growth in faith and in numbers over the last 40 years," said Bishop Jugis during his homily.

"But there are greater challenges ahead. We are not here just to celebrate the last 40 years, but to continue the church's mission," he said.

Recalling his homily at the Eucharistic Conference in Asheville June 24, Bishop Jugis said the Catholic Church is on a journey through history, and the Eucharist is "our nourishment for that journey."

"In the 40 years here,
Mass has been celebrated as food for our journey with the Lord Jesus nourishing us," said the bishop.

THE GIFT OF LIFE

CNS PHOTO BY SHIRLEY HENDERSON, GULF PINE CATHOLIC

Father Ken Ramon-Landry, pastor of Sacred Heart Church in Hattiesburg, Miss., and parishioner Patricia Sanchez are pictured in the parish office June 29, just a week before the priest donated a kidney to Sanchez. By talking about the transplant operation, the pair hopes to raise awareness of the need for kidney donors.

Priest donates kidney to parishioner

HATTIESBURG, Miss. (CNS) — The scenario could give a Hallmark card commercial a run for its money: A parish priest donates a kidney to a parishioner who is his friend's wife and the mother of four.

"This is the gift of life for me," said Patricia Sanchez, who July 6 received a kidney from her pastor at Sacred Heart Church, Father Ken Ramon-Landry.

"Neither of us wants notoriety," Father Ramon-Landry said. "Both of us think it is a worthy cause to raise awareness to the fact that within some of our bodies we carry life for others — even us men — by offering a kidney, a lung.

"Perhaps this is why God gave us two to see if we would share and take seriously what his Son did for us ... laying down our lives freely," he said.

Father Ramon-Landry and Sanchez are continuing education instructors in the Diocese of Biloxi, but the priest also works with Sanchez's husband, Rafael, in diocesan Hispanic ministry.

Pat Sanchez, 60, a Scripture scholar and writer of homilies and Scripture commentaries, was first diagnosed with kidney disease 12 years ago.

The damage leads to kidney failure, which requires dialysis or a transplant.

Rafael Sanchez confided to the priest about his wife's deteriorating health and that there were no prospects of a kidney donor.

"Well, I have two kidneys; she can have one of mine," Father Ramon-Landry told him.

Both Pat Sanchez and Father Ramon-Landry have B-positive blood type.

While she qualified for a transplant, he began a donor screening process. Both had to undergo a battery of medical, physical and psychological tests.

"We were so compatible, the lab personnel suspected that we were siblings," the priest said.

Some parishioners asked why he would risk surgery.

"I guess what kind of inspired me to donate is that, if my mother or my sister needed a kidney, I would want someone to step up," he said.

And if something did happen to the priest's remaining kidney, he "would go to the top of the recipient list," Pat Sanchez said.

Sanchez has endured peritoneal dialysis daily since April 2005. At one time she was taking 14 medications daily. Now she is down to only seven prescriptions a day.

"My family is grateful to Father Ken," Pat Sanchez said.

Both Father Ramon-Landry and Sanchez said they were struck by the way everything evolved and fell into place.

"God clears the way, if it is meant to be," the priest said.

All children owed health care, says CHA head on behalf of campaign

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Concern for children's health "goes beyond the bounds of religious belief or political persuasion," said the president and CEO of the Catholic Health Association.

Sister Carol Keehan, a Daughter of Charity and former CEO of Providence Hospital in Washington, spoke at the July 11 launch of a new campaign on behalf of the nation's 9 million uninsured children.

Sister Keehan said she had seen firsthand "how being uninsured directly affects individuals and families. The principles on which our country was founded compel us to care enough about people and communities to assure that everyone — but especially children — have health care.

"As a nation of compassionate and caring people, this should be an obvious choice," she said.

CHA was one of more than three dozen groups, including other Catholic organizations, joining in the new Campaign for Children's Health Care, aimed at making expanded health coverage for children a national priority.

"Evidence and common sense tell us that healthy children are better learners," said Antonia Cortese, executive vice president of the American Federation of Teachers.

"Children with untreated health conditions have more trouble concentrating in class and have higher absenteeism than children with access to good health care," she said.

The new campaign is built around an online petition asking Congress and President George W. Bush "to begin work immediately on legislation that will provide comprehensive, affordable, high-quality health coverage for all children."

The petition is to be presented to Bush and members of Congress during a Washington lobby day in February, when Congress is expected to be considering reauthorization of the State Children's Health Insurance Program.

Despite papal transition, Vatican shows $12 million surplus for 2005

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Despite the $8.9 million of extraordinary expenses related to the death of Pope John Paul II and the election of Pope Benedict XVI, the Vatican closed its 2005 budget with a surplus of more than $12 million, officials said.

Cardinal Sergio Sebastiani, president of the Prefecture for the Economic Affairs of the Holy See, presented the 2005 consolidated budget figures at a July 12 press conference.

The cardinal did not provide figures for total Vatican income and total Vatican expenses at the press conference, but promised to provide the figures later.

Improved exchange rates and higher interest on Vatican investments helped give the Vatican its healthiest bottom line in eight years, the cardinal said. He said the Vatican's investment sector closed with a profit of $55 million compared to a profit of only $7.7 million in 2004.

Listed under "other income and expenses" in the 2005 budget were the $8.9 million in "costs sustained" during the papal transition.

Cardinal Sebastiani said a large part of the expense was the traditional extra pay given to Vatican employees on the occasion of a pope's death and again after the election of a new pope.

In addition, the expenses included extra security, employee overtime and temporary modifications of the Sistine Chapel for the conclave.

However, he said, because of the millions of extra visitors, the papal transition had a positive impact on the budgets of the Vatican bookstore and printing press, the Vatican stamp and coin office and the Vatican Museums.

Vatican announces World Peace Day theme with focus on human dignity

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — As the theme for the 2007 World Peace Day, Pope Benedict XVI has chosen: "The Human Person: The Heart of Peace."

The theme reflects the pope's "conviction that respect for the dignity of the human person is an essential condition for peace in the human family," said a July 13 Vatican announcement.

World Peace Day is celebrated Jan. 1 each year. The pope's message for the celebration is released in early December and sent to heads of state around the world.

The Vatican statement on the pope's chosen theme said human dignity is being "threatened by aberrant ideologies, attacked by a distorted use of science and technology, (and) contradicted by widespread incongruent lifestyles."

Human dignity must be promoted and defended, it said, because human dignity "is the seal of God," who created men and women in his likeness; it is "the sign of the common destiny of humanity

(and) the foundation of love for God and for one's neighbor."

Peace is threatened when technology makes human life a commodity or "lifestyles that are disordered or contrary to human dignity" lead people to deny that the traditional family is the foundation of a strong society, it said.

"The church's mission is to announce 'The Gospel of Life,' the centrality of the human person in the universe and the love of God for humanity," it said, referring to Pope John Paul II's 1995 encyclical.

The church's mission includes proclaiming the dignity of each person, the obligation to work for the common good and the need for individual human actions to correspond to "the order impressed by God on the universe," the statement said.

Every offense against a person "is a threat to peace," it said. "Every threat to peace is an offense against the truth of the person and of God. The human person is the heart of peace."

At U.N. hearing Catholic migration group calls human rights central UNITED NATIONS (CNS) — Human rights are key to resolving international migration problems, a Catholic official said July 12 at a U.N. General Assembly hearing on international migration and development.

"Rights are not the 'opposite' of practical. In fact rights solve problems," said John Bingham, head of advocacy of the International Catholic Migration Commission.

Bingham listed five human rights especially important to migration:

"The right to life; the right to work and to be paid a fair wage; the right to movement, including out of and back to one's own country; the right to stay in one's own country — closely related to the right to development; and ... the right to participate actively in decisions that affect one's life, family and community."

He said protection of rights reduces the need for migration, since lack of rights in their home country is often a factor that leads people to emigrate.

KERNERSVILLE — Helping those in need is what parishioners of Holy Cross Church in Kernersville are all about.

To help fellow parishioner and Columbiette Cheryl Gilreath pursue her dream of helping others, the parish's Knights of Columbus, Council 8509, donated $1,835 toward her training.

Only June 28, Grand Knight Lance Cancro presented a check to Gilreath, who is hoping to enter the religious life.

"One of our charter goals is to spiritually and financially support young people who are studying to become priests or nuns," said Cancro.

"Usually we support seminarians, but when we heard of Cheryl's plans, we were excited to step up and help," he said.

Gilreath's interest in the religious life grew while attending Franciscan University in Steubenville, Ohio.

Currently she is in Sabinov, Slovakia, as part of a mission trip to assist the poor in other countries. She was interested in assisting in the Sudan.

The Knights' donation is to help cover her travel costs, supplies and other expenses to assist Gilreath in her overseas mission work.

According to Cancro, one of the religious orders Gilreath is considering is Missionaries of Charity, who were founded by Blessed Mother Teresa of Calcutta and work with the poor around the world.

Cancro described Gilreath as a "very special and blessed young woman."

"Besides acting as an angel of mercy, she is also an inspiration to us all to follow God's calling," he said.

Institute gathers N.C. youths for leadership education

RIDGECREST, N.C. — More than 50 youths and adults gathered recently near Asheville in the North Carolina mountains to learn and practice the skills of a Christian leader.

The 2006 Faithful Servant Institute was held at Ridgecrest LifeWay Conference Center June 18-23.

Faithful Servant is an annual effort cosponsored by the Raleigh and Charlotte diocesan offices for youth ministry.

This formation event places youths in the roles of leaders and adults in the roles of co-learners.

Participants came from parishes throughout the state, from Waynesville to New Bern and communities in between.

Presentations were comprised of specific skill sets as well as Catholic theology. Topics included Catholic identity, the call to Christian leadership, pastoral care, group dynamics, community, evangelization, the Eucharist and the potential of Christian leadership.

St. Matthew School students collect funds for classmate

CHARLOTTE — Students from St. Matthew School recently took a break from the pool and the playground to collect money for a fellow student in need.

About 30 students and adults spent July 14 distributing 50 large piggy banks to businesses at Ballantyne, Stonecrest and Matthews Festival shopping centers.

The money raised will help pay the medical expenses of Ross Minor, 8, who authorities say was shot in the head by his father, Mark Minor, June 14. Ross' brother, Ryan, 10, was also shot and died the next day. After shooting the boys, Mark Minor killed himself, police said.

Ross, who was left blind as a result of the shooting, has been released from the hospital and is recovering at his grandparents' home.

The piggy bank collection kicked off a fundraiser in Ballantyne Village July 21-22. The fundraiser included a silent auction, autograph sessions by Panthers and Bobcats players, music and children's activities. Also, restaurants in the shopping center will donate a portion of their weekend proceeds.

For first-time participant Lindsay Ruebens, the institute taught her the importance that leaders practice service to others, not just lead and expect others to follow.

But it was the workshop on the Eucharist that she found most meaningful.

"The workshop 'Holy Eucharist: Food, Medicine and Comfort' embodied the meaning of the institute," said Lindsay, a rising senior at Charlotte Catholic High School.

Each participant was assigned to a small group that discussed the topic, utilized the skills and planned specific activities and prayer experiences.

"The week flew by, with strong bonds formed and difficult skills practiced," said Peg Ruble, assistant director for youth ministry in the Diocese of Charlotte.

The 2007 institute will be held in Smithfield at the Short Journey Center June 17-22.

Randell paints unique look at icons, Christian faith

BY CAROLE MCGROTTY
CORRESPONDENT

ASHEVILLE — Parishioners of the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville recently gathered to view the work of icon painter Elizabeth Randell.

Formerly an art teacher and portrait painter, Randell studied the art of painting icons with icon artists in the United States and iconographers in St. Petersburg, Russia.

It began when a Russian Orthodox priest asked her to paint an icon, which turned out to be "a spiritual journey."

Icons were originally used to explain church teachings to the uneducated.

They are not art for art's sake, said Randell, but are meant to "enhance a worshipper's spiritual life through imitation of the person in the icon."

In this way, icons are similar to statues of Catholic saints, she said.

"They draw us in and up to God to worship him; a window to heaven," said Randell.

Icons also allow the faithful to "see" God.

"Church history says that God was the first to make an icon when he created man — Adam, in his own image," said Randell. "Jesus was the second image."

"Before the Incarnation, no one could draw God, who was invisible," she said. "Now, united in the image of man and God, he is circumscribable."

Marianist priests celebrate jubilees in North Carolina

CHARLOTTE — Two Marianist priests with ties to the Diocese of Charlotte are celebrating jubilees this year.

Marianist Father Richard Kuhn celebrates 60 years as a priest this month. Marianist Father George Onida celebrated 25 years as a priest in May.

Father Kuhn was ordained in July 1958. In addition to teaching at Charlotte Catholic High School, he also served as a teacher and chaplain at high schools in Florida, New York, Ohio and Pennsylvania.

In 1985, he began ministering at retreat centers and currently resides at the Marianist community in Topsail Beach, N.C.

Father Onida was ordained in May 1986 and served as a pastor or assistant pastor in Puerto Rico, Peru and New York.

Father Onida, who now resides at the San Juan Diego Marianist community in Charlotte, is assisting with Hispanic ministry in the Diocese of Charlotte.

The Society of Mary (Marianists) is an international Catholic religious order of priests and brothers with more than 600 serving in the United States, India, Eastern Africa and Mexico.

In the United States, the Marianists sponsor three universities, 18 high schools, 12 parishes and several retreat centers. Blessed William Joseph Chaminade founded the Society of Mary in France in 1817. The order has been present in the United States since 1849.

Many gather, rejoice for Sparta church's 40th anniversary

As Catholics travel this journey, they are meant to "be blessings to others and share our Gospel values in the community," said Bishop Jugis.

"Our mission is to bring this area to Christ, and it begins right here at this altar," he said. "Here is where our faith grows ... and we are propelled out to share our faith and be a blessing to all those around us."

Father Joseph Dinh, who was appointed pastor in July, concelebrated the Mass, along with Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin; Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vice chancellor and vicar general of the Diocese of Charlotte; and a number of former pastors, several of whom served the mission church before the diocese was founded in January 1972.

"There were only four Catholics attending Mass here in 1961," said Msgr. Gerald Lewis, who served the church at various times in the 1960s.

"To come back now and see the overflow crowd is unbelievable," he said.

Before the early 1960s, Catholics in Alleghany County traveled to Elkin or to North Wilkesboro to attend Mass. It was in 1961 that priests from North Wilkesboro began traveling to Sparta, just four miles from the Virginia border, to celebrate Mass.

Back then, Mass was celebrated in the Sparta Community Center, the Veterans of Foreign Wars Hall, the homes of area Catholics and in the cafeteria of a shoe factory.

Though small in number, the Catholic population was determined to spiritually reinforce its presence by building a church. In 1965, a grant from the Catholic Church Extension Society and the Darr family helped pave the way for construction to begin.

"The Darrs were tremendous parishioners and helped support the church in the early years," said Father Lewis. "Their generosity allowed us to grow into this wonderful community."

Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh dedicated St. Frances of Rome Church in May 1966 in memory of Frances Payne Darr, mother of Ed Darr, one of the original members.

The church continued to be staffed by priests from North Wilkesboro until 1976. During that year, St. Francis of Assisi Church in Jefferson assumed pastoral care of the Sparta church. Priests of the Glenmary Home Missioners also arrived to serve at the churches in Alleghany and Ashe counties.

In the mid-1980s, the St. Frances of Rome family began a fundraising drive to build a multipurpose education building. After again turning to the Catholic Church Extension Society for assistance, the Catholic community in Sparta oversaw the building's construction.

Then-Bishop John F. Donoghue of Charlotte blessed and dedicated the structure in October 1986 at a Mass attended by more than 200 Catholics, friends and clergy, including then-pastor Glenmary Father John Otterbacher.

Glenmary priests served the mission church until 1998, when diocesan priests assumed pastoral care. Fathers Ronald Marecki, Wilbur Thomas, Mark Lawlor and C. Morris Boyd were a few of the pastors to serve Sparta Catholics after the Glenmary priests.

Father Patrick Winslow served the church from July 2004 until July 2006.

Church member Betsy Dillon remembers those early Masses in homes and the shoe factory.

"We've grown so much. We now have a large Hispanic community and a Spanish-language Mass," she said. "We've become an established church in the mountains."

"I'm extremely proud to see what it has become," said Father Lewis. "Bishop Waters and the Darrs had a vision that is being fulfilled. It's a tremendously wonderful feeling."

"It feels great to celebrate 40 years not just of the building, but the Catholic community here that has grown and shows the Catholic faith to people here in the mountains," said Father Dinh.

"A mustard seed was sown here that has grown into a large plant of God's love and faith," he said.

"Alleghany County will be a better place because the Catholic Church is here," said Bishop Jugis.

Teen's garden remembers deceased family, others

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY

EDITOR

SPARTA — During the 40th anniversary of St. Frances of Rome Church in Sparta, Bishop Jugis blessed a Sacred Heart of Jesus statue in the church's Life Garden of Divine Mercy.

The statue was donated by Ruth Stevenson, one of the church's original members, in honor of the anniversary.

The beautifully landscaped garden was a project of Elizabeth Flattery, 18, who was inspired to create it after recently losing family members and friends to suicide.

"With (then-pastor) Father Patrick Winslow's inspiration, prayers and advice, she took it a step further and dedicated it to all babies lost to abortion and miscarriage," said Pat Flattery, Elizabeth's mother.

Elizabeth Flattery raised more than $1,500 to complete the project and, with advice by a landscape architect, performed all of the work — including moving dirt, dead trees and debris; creating and placing steps, rocks and benches, and planting flowers.

Some of her work was done at night by lantern light, as well as during a snowstorm.

Flattery, who will attend the University of North Carolina at Greensboro in the fall, was ranked fifth in her class at Alleghany High School. She was yearbook editor, student council officer, Beta Club officer and played volleyball, basketball and softball.

"She is a high achiever, highly motivated and works hard to accomplish her goals," said Pat Flattery.

Gaston Commissioners' School of Excellence students learn the value of "giving back" at Holy Angels in June. They helped to clean up PUSH Place, an outdoor facility for Holy Angels' residents.

Holy Angels welcomes Commissioners' School of Excellence

BELMONT — Classes let out for the summer in Gaston County in early June, but education continued for 62 rising 10th graders at Holy Angels in Belmont.

The students participated in the Gaston County Board of Commissioners' School of Excellence Program June 19-22.

The program, funded by the Gaston County commissioners and operated by the Gaston County school system in cooperation with local colleges, focuses on developing the students' problem-solving techniques and leadership skills.

Students are selected to attend the summertime program based on their academic achievements, leadership skills and extracurricular activities. Holy Angels was chosen as the location of the program's service project this year.

Bryan Denton, a teacher with the program, says the partnership has been very worthwhile.

"We wanted to restart our community service projects and thought that Holy Angels would be the perfect partner," said Bryan Denton, a teacher with the program.

"Our students have learned more about the ministry of Holy Angels and the services they provide, as well as the importance of giving back to the community," he said.

Founded in 1956 by the Sisters of Mercy, Holy Angels is a private, non-profit corporation providing residential services and programs for children and adults with varying degrees of mental retardation and physical disabilities.

Students participated in empathy training exercises geared toward teaching them about people with disabilities and what it might be like to have a disability.

Service projects included weeding PUSH Place, an outdoor location at Holy Angels for residents, family and staff. Students also cleaned out and re-organized art supply rooms at three intermediate care group homes and assisted with cleaning out additional storage areas.

"Our students learned the value of hard work and how much of a difference, even the simplest of tasks can make," said Denton. "This was a wonderful experience for Commissioners' School that we hope had a very positive impact for Holy Angels."

Girl Scout earns Gold Award for special-needs project

BELMONT — Holy Angels now has a new "Snoezelen room," thanks to one motivated Girl Scout.

Virginia Boyce, 17, chose Holy Angels as the focus of her project for her Gold Award, the highest award in Girl Scouts.

Her project, creating the Polking Snoezelen Room, was showcased during a May 11 reception organized by Boyce at Holy Angels. Invited guests included Holy Angels residents and staff, Boyce's family members and Girl Scout leaders.

Holy Angels made a lasting impression upon Boyce during her first visit several years ago. Working with Holy Angels staff, she began designing a snoezelen room.

The Snoezelen concept originated in Holland in the 1970s and uses primary senses in learning and relaxation activities. The room is filled with moving bright lights and equipment that stimulates hearing, touch and smell.

Holy Angels currently has two other Snoezelen rooms and has been a pioneer of the concept in the Southeast.

Boyce's project included writing a draft proposal with layout, design and fundraising goals for the new room. Working closely with staff members, Boyce attended planning meetings and assisted in selection of the various sensory materials.

After months of planning and more than 70 hours of hands-on work, the Polking Snoezelen Room was completed.

"Virginia is a highly creative and wonderful young lady whose hard work has resulted in a state-of-the-art educational and relaxation room that our residents will enjoy for years to come," said Regina Moody, president and CEO of Holy Angels.

"We were so pleased to have been selected as her Gold Award focus project," said Moody.

The Snoezelen room was named in honor of longtime Holy Angels supporter and board member Paul Polking.

Boyce, a Belmont South Point High School graduate who will major in English at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C., held a 5.0 grade point average and was president of the Beta Club.

In addition to her Gold Award, she also received the President's Volunteer Service Award and an Albert G. Myers Scholarship to Georgetown.

Representatives from the Diocese of Charlotte join more than 2,000 Hispanic young adults, bishops, diocesan coordinators and parish leaders from across the country as they gather June 8 at the University of Notre Dame in Indiana for the first National Encuentro for Hispanic Youth and Young Adult Ministry. The goal of the June 8-11 gathering was to call Hispanic young adults to more active participation in the life and mission of the Catholic Church.

Hispanic youths discuss future at inaugural meeting

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NOTRE DAME, Ind. — Some 2,000 Hispanic youths, young adults and diocesan and parish leaders gathered for the June 8-11 National Encuentro for Hispanic Youth and Young Adult Ministry at the University of Notre Dame.

The “encuentro,” Spanish for “gathering,” focused on their needs, aspirations and contributions relative to the church. It was the first national meeting of its kind and its theme was “Weaving Together the Future.”

Thirty representatives from the Diocese of Charlotte traveled to Indiana for the gathering.

The goal was to develop a common vision and pastoral principles, which will be presented to the U.S. bishops. Some 20 bishops attended the events.

The bilingual event was organized by the National Catholic Network de Pastoral Juvenil Hispana (of Hispanic Youth Ministry). It was co-sponsored by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops’ Committee on Hispanic Affairs, the USCCB Subcommittee on Youth and Young Adults and the University of Notre Dame.

Leading the way

In his June 10 keynote talk, Cardinal Oscar Rodriguez Maradiaga of Tegucigalpa, Honduras stressed the contributions of Hispanics to U.S. society and challenged young Hispanics to respond to the plight of newly arriving immigrants.

“How interesting that at a time when the doors to free trade are being opened the international borders are being closed to immigrants,” said Cardinal Rodriguez. “We can’t allow ourselves to forget that in the face of every immigrant there is a history.”

It is a history complicated by the humiliation and family disintegration suffered by those who choose to migrate to the United States, he said in Spanish.

Young Hispanic Catholics have one of the best chances to build the United States and the church because they are open to new ways of doing things, to new cultures and to dialogue, he said.

They “have a unique capacity to make new relationships,” he said, challenging his listeners to begin by forging relationships with new Hispanic immigrants.

The Hispanic immigrant arriving today needs a partner who will walk with him on the journey of his new life, the cardinal said.

“Love them with the love of God. Look at them with the eyes of God the Father, the one who respects life. Accompany them with humility, putting yourself at the service of others,” he said.

“What I liked the most is to see so many young people respond to the challenge (and) to see their many talents, and their willingness to go on this mission,” said Paola Sebastian, a parishioner at St. Joseph Church in Asheboro.

“What impacted me the most was the trust and responsibility that Cardinal Rodriguez placed in us, and seeing all those needs, which can be addressed if we trust in God,” said Guillermo Razo of Lexington.

The new disciples

San Antonio Archbishop Jose H. Gomez, in a June 8 talk, said that Hispanic youths must become “a new generation of disciples.”

“We realize that many young people are losing faith. ... We must be apostles to the people around us,” the archbishop said.

“God loves us, and he has asked us to proclaim his Gospel. And I think we can,” said Sebastian.

Archbishop Gomez described the contentious national debate over immigration as a “complicated issue” but one that calls Hispanics to be leaders who raise their voices for justice.

Auxiliary Bishop Jaime Soto of Orange, Calif., told the youths that they have important roles to play in the increasingly multicultural U.S. church.

Hispanics’ culture and ethnic makeup “should make us better appreciate the possibility to live in communion” and to help shape “the new mix cultures and people” in the United States, he said.

“At the same time, we must recognize that there are certain barriers and walls that we have raised against other members of the church,” Bishop Soto said.

“Even many of our Catholic brothers and sisters often forget the need to welcome the stranger. We have to remind them that we are all children of God. We need to fight for laws that respect the dignity of human beings,” Bishop Soto said.

earth," speaker Freeman Owle said. "What kind of dominion have we taken: mountain tops sliding away, trees dying."

Owle, a member of the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians and elder in residence at WCU, told Cherokee legends to show how "balance is very important to the Cherokee."

One legend related how the animals captured fire: Some of the larger animals tried to get fire from the other side of the world. They failed.

But the tiny water spider made a clay pot, put it on her back, swam to the fire and gathered the coals into the pot, which she carried to the animals.

This story shows how "we keep the balance," Owle said. "Not only the big people in the village can do things, little people can too."

Humans have lost balance by not properly caring for God's creation, he said.

In the early days, when everything was unspoiled, he said, "Cherokee would go into the river each morning, splash water over themselves, and pray, 'Father who art in heaven, grant us peace and take away anything that keeps me from being closer to you.'

"Can you imagine wading into the Tuckasegee River when it was clean, making that prayer and coming out at the start of your day?" Owle asked.

For the Cherokee, a terrible unbalance happened when thousands of them were forced to walk the Trail of Tears from places like North Carolina and Georgia to Oklahoma. More than 4,000 died on the trek.

"They say 15,000 people walked the Trail of Tears," Owle said, "but I maintain there were 15,001 because they took their Bibles. Jesus was with them. They knew the balance would be achieved again."

It's important to take time to achieve balance, to "slow down" and "see the gifts God has given us: nature's beauty, children, grandchildren."

"Go to Brevard or Highlands," Owle added. "Go down to the waterfalls, take off your shoes. If you're worried about what other people will think, push it away. You're not too old to have some childlikeness.

"Sit quietly, 15 minutes, think about the water, think about God. You will have rested," he said.

Caring for God's creation also involves caring for those who have been displaced because of war and economic conditions.

Speaker Eduardo Bernal, Hispanic ministry coordinator for the Smoky Mountain Vicariate, spoke about trying to escape El Salvador's civil war to join his mother and sister in the United States.

He tried twice to emigrate in 1989. The first time, he was arrested and held for three days with 70 other men in one room with no bathroom, then deported.

He tried again and nearly drowned swimming the Rio Grande. He spent a month in jail with 800 other men. This time, because of the civil war in El Salvador, he wasn't deported, but made it to Flushing, N.Y., where he was reunited with his mother, whom he hadn't seen in seven years.

Bernal is now working to become a U.S. citizen, but the process is difficult.

"To get a visa to come from El Salvador, you have to have half a million dollars in the bank and own your own business," he said. "So they make sure nobody comes here except for tourism."

Bernal minced no words about caring for Hispanic immigrants, most of whom are Catholics.

"We are a Christian community, a Catholic community; jails are not the answer," he said. "We, as Catholics, should be the first advocates. When we come here, the first thing we do is look for a church to thank God we made it."

Bernal said people should welcome the newcomers, regardless of whether or not they speak English.

"If you have neighbors, try to meet them. Bake some cookies and go to meet them," he said.

Language isn't a barrier for Patricia Paton, a parishioner at Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville, and Judy Ross of St. Mary Church in Sylva.

Paton, who speaks little Spanish, often attends Immaculate Conception Church's weekly Spanish-language Mass. She said that Franciscan Father John Salvas, parochial vicar at the church, tells her it's a "wonderful witness."

"They have so enriched my life," said Ross of the Cuban children to whom she taught music for years without ever learning more than a few basic Spanish words.

"We have much more in common with others than differences. If we recognize that, it's easier to approach people," said speaker Terri Jarina, program director for parish social ministry for Catholic Social Service's Office of Justice and Peace in the Diocese of Charlotte.

The office, along with a grant from the Diocesan Foundation, helped co-sponsor the program. Jarina's presentation was on Catholic social teaching.

"We are one human family, whether we live here in Cullowhee or in Charlotte or somewhere else," said Jarina.

Four principles of Catholic social teaching are: life and dignity of the human person; call to family and community; human rights and responsibilities; and dignity of work and the rights of workers.

Jarina chose to focus on the other three: options for the poor; solidarity; and caring for God's creation.

"We have really become a society of 'now'; (indiscriminately) using resources — if it doesn't work, toss it; not taking the time to recycle," she said.

Temperance is needed: prudence, justice, avoiding excessive use of resources.

"In a consumerism society, it's about having things," Jarina said. "That disparity is something we have to constantly address. Your choices in the store have an effect on many, many people and will affect us for many years to come."

And, she said, "Caring for the poor and exploited must be our goal. Can we love the Creator without celebrating and caring for the creation?"

Indonesian Catholics help tsunami victims

Father Andreas Sudarman, pastor of Sacred Heart Church, said his assistant pastor and four laypeople would travel to the mission area to assess the needs of the victims and open an aid center to distribute goods such as medicine, food and blankets that parishioners in Tasikmalaya have contributed.

"Meanwhile, we are collecting other things from this parish as well as from Bandung Diocese and Jakarta Archdiocese to be sent together with a bigger team after the first team reports its observations," Father Sudarman added.

The Indonesian bishops' crisis center also was sending aid.

A magnitude-7.7 earthquake triggered a tsunami on the southern coast of Java Island July 17, killing at least 550 people, displacing 54,000 and leaving hundreds missing, the Indonesian Health Ministry said July 18.

In Pangandaran, about 165 miles southwest of Jakarta, the tsunami damaged about 500 hotels, restaurants and houses, including Sea Star Home, owned by the Oblates of Mary Immaculate.

"The waves did not kill any Catholics there, but they caused a woman working at Sea Star Home to fracture a leg, and two of her children were also injured," Father Sudarman told UCA News.

Vera Venny Soemarwi, secretary of the bishops' crisis center, told UCA News June 18 that the center's coordinator, Jesuit Father Ignatius Ismartono, traveled to the affected areas just after the quake and tsunami hit.

"Besides visiting the location, he will open a communication network and ask Bandung and Purwokerto dioceses for permission to open aid stations," Soemarwi said.

She added that her center had prepared funds to buy blankets, food, medicine and other items to be distributed.

A day after the tsunami, many refugees in Pangandaran Village Hall still had nothing to eat, she said.

Ambrossius Darso, a 55-year-old parishioner of the church in Kroya, reported that four families took refuge in his house.

"When I was cultivating my field, one kilometer (.62 miles) from the coast," he said, "I saw the water higher than the dome of the mosque. It came after me, and I had to run as fast as I could to reach my house, two kilometers from the coast."

Sister Adriana Tentrem Sujatmi, a Precious Blood of Christ nun, told UCA News that many people of Karangmangu village were still panic-stricken and were staying at her convent in Kroya.

"Just after the quake and tsunami, I allowed about 30 people to stay in our parish kindergarten and we distributed mats, drinks and instant noodles to them," the nun said.

Church leaders pray for peace in Mideast

Ecumenical Institute for Theological Studies in Jerusalem, said he did not know why the radical Shiite militia Hezbollah kidnapped two Israeli soldiers and was firing rockets on Israel, but he said the force of Israel's retaliation was "not appropriate."

"I think Israel has to react. They can't tolerate the taking of soldiers, the Katyushas," said Father McGarry, referring to the rockets Hezbollah has been firing into Israel.

"They have to do something in response, but killing civilians is not appropriate," he said.

Lebanese officials said the number of civilian deaths had passed 200 by early July 18, while Israeli officials reported 12 civilian deaths since the cross-border attacks began July 12.

Vacationing in the Alps July 16, Pope Benedict XVI spoke of his "serious concern" for the escalating violence and said that "neither terrorist acts nor reprisals can be justified, especially when there are tragic consequences for the civilian population."

The United States considers Hezbollah, backed by Syria and Iran, a terrorist organization. However, the Lebanese government regards Hezbollah as a legitimate resistance movement fighting Israeli occupation of Lebanese territories.

Israel withdrew from South Lebanon in May 2000, but it did not relinquish the disputed "Shebaa Farms" border area, where the borders of Israel, Lebanon and Syria converge, so Hezbollah kept up the resistance.

In Beirut, Lebanon, July 14, the Middle East Council of Churches urged regional powers to pressure all sides to stop the violence and start dialogue.

The council "raises high its voice, calling on the international community, especially on the (U.N.) Security Council and international powers, for an immediate intervention to cease fire," it said in a statement.

Lebanese Cardinal Nasrallah P. Sfeir, patriarch of the Maronite Catholic Church, was visiting the United States as the attacks began.

Speaking July 16 at a Mass at the Cathedral of Our Lady of Lebanon in Brooklyn, N.Y., he said, "We (Lebanese) have had enough. We need the help and support of all our friends in the world, especially the United States. We are determined to work together through dialogue for peace and justice in the region."

On July 18 he was scheduled to meet with Vice President Dick Cheney and U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice at the White House to discuss the situation in Lebanon.

Fleeing the bombs

Israel blockaded Lebanese ports, repeatedly bombed the Beirut airport and hit cities it considered Hezbollah strongholds. It also bombed major roads and bridges.

At a church rectory in Sidon, Lebanon, a man who asked not to be identified said all Catholic churches were opening their doors to people who needed refuge, but that church officials did not know how long they could hold out.

Rosie Akl, an American married to a Lebanese, e-mailed from Lebanon to let her American family and friends know that her family members were safe but the situation was "extremely serious and critical."

She spoke of long lines for food and groceries and said the Lebanese were moving en masse from the south and from parts of Beirut up into the mountains to seek some semblance of safety.

"The Lebanese have nowhere to go," she wrote. "Soon there will be no fuel. The damage to the roads will prevent food supplies being delivered."

"The Lebanese army is a joke and everyone knows it," she said. "After the (1989) Taif accord," which ended Lebanon's civil war, "they were not allowed to rearm. They have no warplanes."

"The Israelis have the latest F-16s. They have nuclear warheads. They have military satellite capabilities. Lebanon has nothing. What does the Lebanese army have? A few U.S.-built helicopters from the Vietnam era," she said.

Confusion and carnage

Hezbollah sent rockets into Israel, particularly targeting the port city of Haifa July 16 and 17. The attacks sent residents of northern Israel streaming along roads heading south.

On July 17, Hezbollah rockets also hit areas around Nazareth.

Eisam Abu Nasser, a Catholic lawyer from Nazareth, said residents had their eyes glued to the TV and ears glued to the radio.

"There is war and destruction everywhere, and there are innocent civilians (on both sides). The religion and nationality of the person isn't important. We worry about humans," he said.

The Melkite Catholic village of Mi'ilya in Upper Galilee was under a state of emergency. Regional council head Fathi Assaf said the village shelters were ready in case they were needed, and people were told to stay in their homes.

In Washington, Bishop William S. Skylstad of Spokane, Wash., president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, wrote Latin-rite Patriarch Michel Sabbah of Jerusalem to express concern about escalating Holy Land violence.

"The cycle of violence must be broken in order to open up the path to justice and peace in the Holy Land," Bishop Skylstad said.

Documentary on St. Francis Xavier has New York premiere

Filmmakers' 'labor of love' finally complete

BY JULIE BOURBON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — St. Francis Xavier never made it to mainland China. But then again, neither did the two Jesuits who recently finished a film about him.

St. Francis Xavier considered himself a failure for not reaching China. The missionary, who preached in several places in Asia, died on an island off the coast of China before he could fulfill his desire to preach there, too.

The filmmakers, Jeff Johnson and Jeremy Zipple, traveled from Europe to India to Macau on a whirlwind labor of love to complete the film for the 2006 jubilee year of the Society of Jesus.

The Jesuits declared the year to remember three of the order's original members.

Jubilee celebrations mark the 450th anniversary of the death of St. Ignatius of Loyola, founder of the Jesuits, and the 500th anniversary of the births of two of his closest companions, St. Francis Xavier and Blessed Peter Faber.

The documentary, "Xavier," premiered this spring at Jesuit-run Fordham University in New York with more than 300 people in attendance.

"His letters provided the best information on Asia since Marco Polo," said Johnson, who wrote the script. "There's something about him that lends itself to an exciting film."

Johnson and co-creator Zipple are regents of the Jesuits' New Orleans province. Regency is a stage in the formation process to become a Jesuit priest.

The two said they never even considered St. Ignatius or Blessed Peter Faber as possible subjects; they knew they had their man all along and followed his footsteps, from the place of his birth almost to the place of his death.

"While there is some good historical scholarship on Xavier, there are not a lot of background stories," said Johnson, an amateur historian who teaches English at Jesuit High School in Tampa, Fla.

"We're trying to tell them," he said.

The film is not intended just for a Jesuit audience, although a DVD of the film will be distributed to each Jesuit high school, college and university before the fall semester begins.

Johnson hopes that PBS or cable's History Channel would be interested in picking the film up for distribution, allowing a wider audience to come to know the peripatetic saint.

Placing St. Francis Xavier in historical context required much research, interviewing and travel. The crew followed an intense shooting schedule that was condensed into about five weeks of rigorous travel, "which was insane," said Zipple, laughing at the memory.

"I don't recommend it," he said.

The production entailed moving enormous amounts of equipment literally around the world. It was their cameras that kept them out of China.

Once authorities realized how much equipment they were bringing with them, they were prohibited from entering the mainland as well as the island of Sancian, where St. Francis Xavier died in 1552. The island is now a large naval base.

Instead, they shot in and around the Macau region, where St. Francis Xavier landed.

"In a way it was a pilgrimage, too," Zipple said.

That pilgrimage brought them full circle, from Navarre, Spain, the saint's birthplace, to the Far East.

Although they shared St. Francis Xavier's disappointment at not getting into China, it turned out to be a blessing for these Jesuits, in part because it brought them into contact with so many members of the worldwide Society of Jesus.

It was "a grace-filled part of the experience," said Zipple, to hear their subject's story from Jesuits around the world.

For him, it all added up to a deeper knowledge of and love for St. Francis Xavier.

"I came to understand him in a personal, intimate way. I really felt his presence in a profound way. It really changed our experience of the film," he said.

God supplies all that we need

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

For the past five years, my extended family — consisting of my parents, four adult siblings, spouses and eight grandchildren ranging from 12 to 22 — have rented a house and gathered for several days in early July to enjoy water, sun and each other's relaxed company.

Of course, part of the fun is preparing and eating our favorite foods in massive quantities.

This obviously implies grocery shopping on a large scale, so each year during our preliminary stocking up on brisket, vegetables, staples and beverages of various kinds, the question arises, "Have we bought enough food?"

(With five teenage boys thrown into the mix, it's a legitimate question!)

Yet, despite the angst over sufficient quantity, we always wind up carting home leftovers.

You would think we would have learned by now that there is always enough for everyone and that we're never far from a store if we do run out of something important. Nevertheless, there is something about human nature that fears lack and expends a considerable amount of energy ensuring that it doesn't happen.

Perhaps it takes the form of acquiring more than is really needed or selfishly protecting one's possessions against the possibility of someone else depleting or damaging them.

Sometimes it's simply the fear that "there won't be enough left over for me if I share what I have."

Any way you look at it, these grasping and egocentric attitudes reveal a lack of trust in God's ability to provide all that we truly need.

Both the first reading and the Gospel teach the opposite: that fear of lack is always rooted in self-centeredness, that God is generous in ways we can't imagine and that God wants to lead us to that same generosity of spirit.

This is the sort of attitude that St. Paul speaks of as "preserving the unity of the spirit through the bond of peace." When one recognizes that God, with hands wide open, is the source of all that we need, we need not fear lack. There's always more than enough.

'Monster House' worth a visit

Animated characters Chowder (left) and DJ are pictured in "Monster House," a macabre computer-animated fairy tale about a trio of suburban kids who set out to investigate the haunted happenings of an eerie old house that comes to life to terrorize their neighborhood. The film, which is full of wildly imaginative visuals, is a smart and scary thrill ride that, though darker in tone than most children's fare and therefore inappropriate for very young tykes, is more fun than fright.

Some frightening images and sequences, minor crude and suggestive humor and innuendo, theft, and mildly crude language. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested. Some material may not be suitable for children.

EWTN anniversary celebration in Philadelphia draws 4,000

PHILADELPHIA (CNS) — Father Richard John Neuhaus, a speaker at a Philadelphia celebration for the 25th anniversary of the Eternal Word Television Network, called the event a "remarkable occasion" marking a milestone for "a most improbable adventure."

The priest, who is editor of the monthly magazine First Things, called the founding of EWTN by Mother Angelica "a high adventure," and said the nun made herself "a vessel of what God can do beyond our imagination."

The June 24-25 celebration drew more than 4,000 people from the Philadelphia region and from around the country to the Liacouras Center at Temple University.

EWTN was started in the garage of a Birmingham, Ala., monastery 25 years ago by Mother Angelica, a Poor Clare of Perpetual Adoration. It is now seen in 125 million homes and 144 countries, and its radio and Internet service reaches at least 200 million more.

The network, which was built solely from donations, carries programming 24 hours a day and has extensive live coverage of Catholic events worldwide.

EWTN has held anniversary events in five cities over the past year to mark its silver anniversary. One final celebration is planned in Birmingham.

In his address Father Neuhaus talked about what it means to be a Catholic in a world full of scandals, dissension and leadership problems.

In the face of all that, he held out to the crowd the invitation of Pope John Paul II: "Settle for nothing less than moral and spiritual greatness."

"EWTN bespeaks the joy of the high adventure of being fully Catholic — not of being a 'good enough' Catholic, but rather understanding that what it really means to be Catholic is an audacious invitation to adventure," he said.

Mother Angelica, who "personifies what Father Neuhaus called "the holiness of feistiness," was not at the celebration, but she continues to do well, living a life of quiet contemplation in the cloister.

In September 2001, Mother Angelica, now 83, suffered a stroke and in December of that year suffered a second stroke, which partially paralyzed the right side of her body.

Now she spends most of her time praying and resting quietly in her room.

Senate passage of embryonic stem-cell expansion called 'a disservice'

BY NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The Senate's July 18 vote to expand federal funding of embryonic stem-cell research does "a disservice to human life and to the cause of medical progress," said the head of the U.S. bishops' pro-life office.

"No technical achievement is 'progress' if it takes us backward in respect for human life," said Gail Quinn of the Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, following the 63-37 vote on the Stem-Cell Research Enhancement Act.

Quinn expressed confidence, however, that President George W. Bush would follow through with a promise to veto the legislation, approved last year by the House of Representatives, and that he would sign two other bills on stem-cell research "that respect the claims of both science and ethics."

The two bills — the Fetus Farming Prohibition Act of 2006, prohibiting "the solicitation or acceptance of tissue gestated for research purposes," and the Alternative Pluripotent Stem-Cell Therapies Enhancement Act, which would increase federal funding of research into ways to derive pluripotent stem cells without destroying embryos — each passed unanimously in the Senate July 18.

The Stem-Cell Research Enhancement Act, which would permit federally funded embryonic stem-cell research using embryos discarded after in vitro fertilization attempts, takes the focus away from "effective and morally acceptable treatments using adult and umbilical-cord stem cells, which have already begun to treat patients with dozens of illnesses," she said.

"Because it takes resources away from these effective avenues, the drive for embryonic stem-cell research actually threatens to harm patients themselves," Quinn added.

Before the votes, Cardinal William H. Keeler of Baltimore had called on the Senate to reject expanded funding of embryonic stem-cell research and approve the two other bills.

The cardinal, who chairs the USCCB Committee on Pro-Life Activities, said the expansion of federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research "violates a decades-long policy against forcing taxpayers to support the destruction of early human life."

He also criticized the argument that embryos would be discarded by clinics anyway as "morally deficient."

"The fact that others may do harm to these nascent lives gives Congress no right to join in the killing, much less to make everyone else complicit in it through their tax dollars," he wrote.

But when morally acceptable alternatives might be available, "Congress has a responsibility to explore how such research may be advanced," the cardinal said.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said at a July 18 press briefing before the votes that Bush feels "honor-bound to veto" the Stem-Cell Research Enhancement Act, as he has long promised to do.

"The president is not opposed to stem-cell research; he's all for it," the spokesman said. "But there is one kind of research, and that is that which involves the destruction of human life, that he does not think is appropriate for the federal government to finance."

"He's been absolutely clear about that; there is no shading in it," said Snow.

Congress was not expected to be able to muster enough votes to override a Bush veto on stem cells.

'Tomb of martyrs'

Former abortion clinic becomes a Catholic chapel

BUFFALO, N.Y. (CNS) — The site of a former abortion clinic in Williamsville, a Buffalo suburb, has been turned into the chapel of a Catholic radio station, according to a report in the July edition of Western New York Catholic, the Buffalo diocesan monthly newspaper.

The paper said Bishop Edward U. Kmiec of Buffalo blessed and dedicated the Chapel of the Holy Innocents June 1 at the Station of the Cross, a four-station Catholic radio network based in Williamsville.

Jim Wright, co-founder of Holy Family Communications, which owns the network, said he only recently learned from the previous owner of the building that the 330 square-foot chapel was being constructed in the space where abortions were once performed.

"In the tradition of the early church, pagan temples were turned into holy spaces," Bishop Kmiec said. "We have done the same thing here today."

Joanne Wright, another co-founder of Holy Family Communications, called the new chapel "the tomb of martyrs."

For that reason, the chapel was dedicated in memory of all babies who have been aborted.

The chapel is used for private reflection by radio station employees. It is also wired to allow for live broadcasts of the Mass on radio.

The Station of the Cross network includes WLOF-FM radio in Buffalo, WHIC-AM in Rochester, and WQOR-AM and WITK-AM in the Scranton-Wilkes Barre area in Pennsylvania.

Student 'walks the talk' against abortion

BY KATHRYNNE SKONICKI
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ROMEDEVILLE, Ill. — Jamie Racki, a junior at Benedictine University in Lisle, celebrated her 21st birthday July 5.

Instead of celebrating, she continued her 11-week journey of professing her pro-life beliefs by walking across the country.

"I couldn't think of a reason good enough not to do it," she said about participating in the 2006 northern walk of Crossroads, a pro-life initiative started in 1994 by Steve Sanborn, then a student at Franciscan University in Steubenville, Ohio.

On May 20, Racki started the walk in Seattle. During her July 15 interview, she was in Illinois, traveling along U.S. Route 14 from Mount Prospect to Des Plaines.

She planned to continue her trek through Aug. 11.

Each summer, college-age walkers spread the pro-life message as they pray at abortion clinics in cities and towns along their route, attend daily Mass, recite the rosary and pray for a change in culture to bring an end to abortion.

Martha Nolan, national director of Crossroads, said the "physically and spiritually challenging" endeavor is attractive to young adults.

Originally there was one walk with about a dozen participants but interest grew so much that a few years ago organizers decided to put together three walks.

This year a total of 36 young people are participating.

The northern walk starts in Seattle and goes through Billings, Mont., Minneapolis and Cleveland among other places. The central walk begins in San Francisco and some of the cities on the route are Salt Lake City, Kansas City, Kan., and Indianapolis.

The southern walk skirts the bottom of the country, originating in Los Angeles, and stops include Phoenix, Dallas and Atlanta.

All three walks were scheduled to merge Aug. 12 in Washington for a rally outside the U.S. Capitol.

"We know our prayers and sacrifices in blisters and aches from walking make a difference in our culture. ... We might not get national media exposure, but we've seen thousands of people face to face," Nolan said.

In addition to rallying thousands of people to get behind the pro-life cause, the walkers say they have also inspired women to change their minds about undergoing an abortion.

Racki, who has participated in national events such as the March for Life and local life chains, said, "I always wanted to do something big, and I didn't think what I was doing was enough."

College students and a priest, who spent the summer traversing the country with a pro-life message, pray for an end to abortion at the Supreme Court in Washington in August 2002. Each year, Crossroads walkers begin in different states and converge thousands of miles later in Washington.

eliminated Racki's only roadblock to joining Crossroads — finances.

She had planned on earning money for the next semester of college during the summer months and couldn't afford to sacrifice her potential earnings.

After she shared her ambitions with members of the two faith communities during weekend Masses, they donated close to $6,000 to Racki to pay for airfare and supplies and to supplement her lost income.

Racki said her experience has taught her a lot about the generosity and hospitality of Catholics, but she was also learning more about her own faith, the Bible and church teaching.

"It's a good way to spread the Gospel," she said.

Benedictine Brother Richard Poro, assistant campus minister at the Lisle university, said Racki's Crossroads participation exemplifies her determination to fight abortion.

"It certainly takes a special person to do something like that," he said, adding that he hoped her experience will encourage other students to fight for life.

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

It was lost and now it's found

St. Anthony can help us discover many things

"St. Anthony, St. Anthony, turn around, something is lost and can't be found."

I remember when every Catholic old enough to lose his car keys knew this prayer by heart. These days, however, it seems most of us Catholics have forgotten about one of the greatest treasures of the Catholic faith: the communion of saints.

The saints were men and women like us who were faithful to God and received his grace to live out the Gospel in their state of life. Since we Catholics are sometimes criticized for "worshipping Mary and the saints," we have neglected our celestial friends from misunderstandings done in the name of ecumenism.

Saints are excellent ecumenical examples of how to be a Christian.

If devotion to the saints is not an integral part of your spirituality, or you just want to find meaningful lost items, consider establishing a friendship with St. Anthony of Padua as a good start. He listens.

My own friendship with St. Anthony started almost 10 years ago, when on a business trip I lost a chain that held a silver crucifix and two medals that were dear to me. A devout Catholic friend of mine and "client" of the saint told me to "pray to good old St. Anthony and he will find it for you."

At the time, I didn't know much about St. Anthony. My friend gave me the Franciscan saint's holy card with his "unfailing" prayer.

I said the prayer with deadpan enthusiasm, and put it away with no further thought.

Three weeks later, while on a business trip to the same city, I decided to stay at the same hotel and, after checking in, called housekeeping to ask about my chain. One of the housekeepers had found it hanging on the bathroom door and returned it to her supervisor.

That's the day St. Anthony became my friend.

Since then I discovered why St. Anthony has his much-publicized reputation as a lost-object finder.

He had lost a book of Psalms, his most prized and only possession. He prayed fervently to God to return his book. A disgruntled novice had left the

Guest Column

Franciscans a few days prior and had taken the book from St. Anthony, but was moved to return it soon after.

The saint understands grieving the loss of an object because he has been there himself. Besides lost objects, St. Anthony is the patron saint of expectant mothers, the poor and hungry, mail delivery and several other categories.

St. Anthony performed many miracles while he lived on earth. Great crowds of people were drawn to him because he was an eloquent preacher.

When he was exhumed 336 years after his death, his body had decayed, but his "holy tongue" was found incorrupt. His tongue is mounted in a reliquary at the Basilica of St. Anthony in Padua, where hundreds of people venerate it daily.

However, his reputation as a miracle worker, especially in the lost and found department, has dwindled tremendously, particularly in our country.

He was proclaimed a saint in 1232, less than a year after his death. June 13 is the feast of St. Anthony of Padua, priest and doctor of the church, one of the most famous and invoked saints in the history of Catholicism.

Somebody mentioned to me once that we don't choose our devotions to the saints, but that God appoints certain saints to intercede for us. If this is true, by the time we have a devotion to a certain saint, he or she has already been praying for us long before.

In the case of St. Anthony, or any saint for that matter, remember that God is the one who performs the miracles; saints are just the conduits. If we lose sight of that, our saintly devotions would be nothing more than superstitious idolatry.

I'm convinced that God chooses to manifest himself in our lives sometimes in small and large miracles. I believe he does this for the same reason he performed miracles in the person of Jesus Christ; to let us know that he listens and he is with us always.

Now, if I could only find my keys. "St. Anthony, St. Anthony"

All God's people

Miracle of life is evident in those around us

I had five hours at my disposal in Chicago recently before boarding my plane back to Washington. I could think of no better place to do this than Millennium Park, which is bordered by Chicago's magnificent Michigan Avenue and awesome Lake Michigan.

An open bench a few feet from a young woman playing an accordion afforded me the perfect place to view Chicago's life at its best. The tune she was playing bounced with joy, like an Italian tarantella. You just wanted to dance to it!

Around me, husbands were negotiating with wives, wives with husbands, and children with parents on what to see next. At times, all seemed in harmony, and then there were moments when an all-out battle was about to happen.

As one stroller after another passed, so did infants with pacifiers in their mouths, and smiling, laughing babies, and some who had "crashed" and were wailing.

People of all sizes, shapes and ages mingled as one. Some spoke English, of course, but I heard many other languages as well.

Taxis, public buses and tourist buses added a colorful backdrop to the sea of humanity swarming around the carnival atmosphere of Millennium Park.

Added to this was some of the most artistic architecture along Michigan Avenue. I felt I was in a land of wonderment.

A well-dressed man occupied the bench next to me. As he sat and watched the hustle and bustle, he seemed lost in thought. My Italian grandfather would say he had "pensiero," meaning something heavy weighing on the mind.

Perhaps the many youthful people floating by reminded him of his youth, or perhaps they were a reminder of his own family.

As I sat there enjoying the fresh breeze off Lake Michigan and feeling dazzled by the many artfully designed flower gardens, my thoughts turned to heaven. Will heaven have the peace and beauty I was drinking in?

Suddenly I remembered a passage I had read by Trappist Father Thomas Merton, the spiritual writer. He, too, found himself people-watching — in New York.

Suddenly it occurred to him that all these people were God's people. When God first thought of them in eternity, they were created. No matter their size, shape, nationality, age or appearance, they all belonged to God.

When I first read this, I didn't find it too exciting. But as I sat in Millennium Park its impact finally hit me. What a magnificent way to look at people!

When you see them as God's people, you take a second look to find what might be that something extra special that reflects God.

Perhaps it's a beautiful smile or a peaceful countenance. Perhaps it's that an infirm person is carrying his or her cross majestically. Perhaps it is that they are caring parents or grandparents.

Ralph Waldo Emerson once said that the beauty of Christ is that he saw our life as a miracle. To see in those around us as this miracle is truly a miracle — a wonder that is wonderful!

Different perspective on World Cup prayers

I need to reply to the negative feedback regarding the infant Jesus statue dressed in a Mexican national soccer team's uniform ("Mexican Catholics pray for a World Cup," June 23).

There are big World Cup fans in my family; we see the soccer games as high entertainment. For the players the game is a livelihood, and for many cultures it is an expression of nationalism and patriotism. These things are meaningful and important to them, and everything in life is a matter for prayer to, conversation with and guidance from our Lord.

While the outcome of the Cup is not significant in my daily existence, it is not necessarily offending God for someone else to consider it a matter for prayer. I think God is concerned about our hearts and what our intentions are.

God is moved by every care of his children's hearts, no matter how trivial they might be in the grand scheme of things. That is part of what makes our faith so priceless.

Letter to the Editor

Maybe it would be more honoring to our Lord if we regarded the benign desires of our brothers and sisters over the World Cup with respect and gracious delicacy for the sake of our love for them in Christ, rather than sacrilege. We should assume the best of them — that their hearts are turned toward God to meet their needs and that their trust and hope are ultimately grounded in him for all things, even soccer.

If some people are dressing the infant Jesus like a soccer player and asking God to help them do their best to win, then who should rightly forbid it or take offense?

Prayer made joyful

Three basics for freshening prayer, experiencing God's joy

My goal here is to help you freshen your prayer with joy. By simplifying your prayer life you will be better able to laugh at your distractions and overcome spiritual dryness.

Prayer can be a pure joy, once you learn the basics.

Some of the ideas that follow have been taken from Abbot John Chapman, a British Benedictine, who died in 1931. He was a biblical scholar and popular preacher. St. Francis of Assisi also influenced my thinking on prayer.

First let's discuss "pure prayer."

Abbot Chapman taught that pure prayer is not necessarily found in our lofty thoughts or our majestic words. Nor is it found in the intensity of our feelings.

In fact, he says that when it comes to prayer you should never force feelings of any kind.

Abbot Chapman insisted that "pure prayer is found in the will, in the will to give yourself to God." Since the will has only one function, to say "yes or no," you can decide to say yes.

It isn't that difficult.

Even if you feel dry as a bone when you pray or have wild distractions, it is still possible to pray well. Simply say,

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOIR
CNS COLUMNIST

"Lord, I am here, and I give myself to you as best I can."

You can do this at the same time you're saying the rosary, or meditating, or engaging in contemplation, wordless prayer. What really counts is your intention and sincerity.

Next is the secret of sanctity and happiness.

Jesuit Father John Pierre de Caussade, author of the spiritual classic "Abandonment to Divine Providence," taught that "the secret of sanctity and happiness rests in one's fidelity to the will of God as it is manifested in the duty of the present moment."

The key is striving to live in the present moment instead of worrying about the mistakes of the past or dangers ahead.

God lives in the present moment, not in the past or future. Do not let the past drag you down. Do not let your fear of the future upset you.

Laugh at these distractions. Simply give yourself to God as best you can, and enjoy your time with the Lord.

You may never be able to pray as well as you think you ought to pray, but that's OK. As long as you accept your limitations, you will be praying as best you can, and that's all the Lord asks. He accepts you just as you are.

Thirdly, there is the notion of joy.

St. Francis of Assisi used to say, "If you want to lead people to God, teach them how to be happy." This applies all the more when it comes to prayer.

After all, Jesus said, "I have told you all these things that my joy may be in you and your joy may be complete." He set the standard of joy for all of us.

You don't have to wait until you get to heaven to share God's joy. Sanctifying grace gives you a share in his happiness right now.

St. Catherine of Siena said, "All the way to heaven is heaven." Learn how to freshen your prayer life with joy.

Pope says being a disciple means having a relationship with Christ

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Being a disciple of Christ means having a personal relationship with him, being convinced of his love, and being an unshakable witness to faith in him, Pope Benedict XVI said.

At his July 5 general audience, Pope Benedict spoke about the example of discipleship given by St. John, the apostle referred to in the Gospels as "the disciple Jesus loved."

The pope focused on the apostle's close relationship with Jesus and his declaration of faith before the Sanhedrin after Jesus' resurrection.

"This frankness in confessing one's faith remains an example and an admonition for all of us to be ready always to declare decisively our unshakable adhesion to Christ," the pope said.

Jesus' relationship with John, he said, offers "an important lesson for our lives: The Lord wants to make each of us a disciple who lives a personal friendship with him."

It was not enough for the apostles to accompany Jesus as he traveled and to listen to his words; rather, they had to live with him and live like him, the pope said.

"That is possible only in the context of a relationship of great familiarity, pervaded by the warmth of total trust," he said. "That is what happens between friends."

The audience with an estimated 20,000 people in St. Peter's Square was the only general audience Pope Benedict had scheduled for July.

He was to travel July 8-9 to Valencia, Spain, for the Fifth World Meeting of Families, return to the Vatican for two days, then head to the northern Italian Alps for a July 11-28 vacation.

The general audiences are scheduled to begin again Aug. 2, probably with the pope traveling from Castel Gandolfo to the Vatican by helicopter.

At the end of the July 5 audience, the pope reminded visitors in the square that July is traditionally dedicated to meditating on the blood of Christ shed for the salvation of humanity.

"In the world innocent human blood continually is being shed," he said. "In human hearts, instead of Gospel love, hatred frequently dwells; instead of care for others, there is disrespect and exploitation."

Pope Benedict asked people to pray that humanity would experience the power of "the blood of Christ shed on the cross for our salvation."

Making a difference from the margins

Rising to challenges is call for all Catholics

It takes about 20 hours and 10,000 miles to fly from North Carolina to Singapore, a thriving city-state in Southeast Asia. But despite the great span between us, Catholics in both places are closely connected in at least one important way: we are very much in the minority as believers.

In North Carolina, Catholics account for just 4 percent of the state's total population. In Singapore, where Buddhists and Muslims make up the majority of the country's 4.4 million people, the percentage of Catholics is precisely the same.

So, too, are some of the questions we face — particularly, how do we heed the Catholic Church's call to evangelize our cultures when we find ourselves operating on the margins?

During a recent business trip to Singapore, I turned to the historic Cathedral of the Good Shepherd for some clues.

Opened in 1846 during a period of British colonization, the cathedral is the oldest Catholic church in Singapore. It looks the part. Its plaster walls are chipped and discolored in too many places to count. Rusted fans hang from the ceiling.

It's perpetually hot and humid in Singapore, where every day feels like summer in North Carolina. So even at the 7 a.m. Mass, with the windows and doors flung open and the fans spinning full tilt, the church's interior is stifling, a throwback to the age before air conditioning.

Still, beauty abounds here. It's apparent in the stained glass windows, the sparse wooden pews, the simple statue of the Virgin Mary holding vigil on a small patch of grass.

The cathedral itself holds vigil, too. High-rise hotels and office buildings surround it, steel and glass symbols of Singapore's transformation from a trading outpost to a global business hub.

Walking along the street, it's difficult to even see the cathedral until you're almost upon it. Still, it is very much there, standing muscularly in the midst of Goliaths, battle-scarred and unbowed.

The cathedral is simply too small, however, to stand out in any photographs of Singapore's shimmering skyline. Likewise, the church communities there and in North Carolina, though growing steadily, do not seem destined for great things by earthly standards.

They will probably not bring down an empire, as Catholics in Poland did by challenging the Soviet Union. They will probably not produce the martyrs that churches in Latin America have.

Perhaps our communities have another calling instead — to make their mark on the world by doing smaller things and doing them well. And we have reason to take that role seriously: it was Jesus himself who reminded us that those who are faithful in little are also faithful in much.

It is in rising to this challenge that smaller Catholic communities are most intimately linked and most able to influence the world around them.

My parish bulletin attests each week to the wonderful but quiet work being done there — Bible study sessions, meals for the elderly, help for the homeless. At the Church of the Good Shepherd, the bulletin told a similar story of youth programs, liturgical training and weekend retreats.

Across the weeks and years and generations, these modest deeds multiply in power, casting sparks of holiness through our neighborhoods and towns. They shine not spectacularly like a skyscraper in the night but with a softer glow that, like the Cathedral of the Good Shepherd, promises to endure long after the modern giants around it have gone dark.

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI renewed his appeal for an immediate cease-fire in the Middle East, saying nothing could justify the shedding of innocent blood, particularly the blood of so many children.

Three days after an Israeli air raid in Qana, Lebanon, led to the deaths of 56 civilians, including at least 37 children, Pope Benedict asked people attending his Aug. 2 general audience at the Vatican to continue "to pray for the dear and martyred region of the Middle East."

"Our eyes are filled with the chilling images of people's bodies — especially children's — torn apart. I am thinking particularly of Qana in Lebanon," he said.

Mobile clinic gives free health care outside Catholic church

HARTFORD, Conn. (CNS) — A free, mobile health care clinic has begun offering health care one day a week outside a Catholic church in downtown Hartford to help care for the poor and uninsured in one of America's poorest cities.

Hartford Archbishop Henry J. Mansell, who has committed $100,000 a year for three years in support of the project, dedicated the clinic on July 13. It is one of the initiatives that the 2006 Archbishop's Annual Appeal is supporting.

The primary care clinic, called the Malta House of Care, will put an emphasis on prenatal, gynecological and pediatric care, according to J.P. van Rooy, a member of the Knights of Malta who is spearheading the project.

"The Malta House of Care will provide services regardless of clients' race, religious creed or membership in local churches," said Archbishop Mansell.

Van Rooy said all medications are being provided free of charge to patients, adding that they likely will be provided by local hospitals, pharmaceutical companies and foundations, which already are offering in-kind support to the project.

Services and pharmaceuticals will be offered on a first-come, first served basis.

St. Francis Hospital and Medical Center in Hartford, which donated the vehicle, has also pledged its support. The mobile clinic bears a St. Francis logo and the eight-pointed cross of the Knights of Malta.

Patients in need of emergency care will be sent to local hospitals.

The initial clinical staff will consist of volunteer health care professionals from the area, including active and retired staff from St. Francis Hospital.

Van Rooy said the Knights of Malta have a strong interest in helping to improve the health of the people of Hartford.

Statistics show that Hartford, which has a population of about 120,000, is ranked as the eighth-poorest city in the United States. More than 10 percent of the population reportedly is uninsured.

Van Rooy said the Knights of Malta envision a staff of at least one physician, several nurses and administrative personnel.

John Schuster has been appointed as executive director of the newly formed Malta House of Care, which will operate the mobile health clinic. Plans call eventually for a building in which to house central operations supplemented by the mobile health clinic.

Schuster said that as the program grows, the van will spend one day at a time at different parish sites in Hartford to determine how many people will come.

He said, "We will adjust the van's future movements to where services are needed." He added that clinicians and others needed to staff the clinic will be volunteers.

Early Christian manuscript discovery excites Irish museum specialists

DUBLIN, Ireland (CNS) — The discovery of an early Christian manuscript in an Irish bog has been called the "Irish equivalent to the Dead Sea Scrolls" by specialists from the National Museum of Ireland.

Fragments of an ancient church manuscript were found July 20 when an alert bulldozer driver spotted an unusual object in the earth of Ireland's southern Midlands.

The find appears to be a Psalter dating from the early Middle Ages.

"It is impossible to say how the manuscript ended up in the bog. It may have been lost in transit or dumped after a raid, possibly more than 1,000 to 1,200 years ago," museum specialists said July 26.

So far only one page of the vellum is legible, identified as Psalm 83, which refers to God's lamentation when the people of Israel are at war.

Pat Wallace, museum director, called the ancient manuscript's survival and discovery "almost miraculous," saying it was an extremely fragile object.

"It is not so much the fragments themselves, but what they represent, that is of such staggering importance," Wallace said.

"In my wildest hopes, I could only have dreamed of a discovery as fragile and rare as this. It testifies to the incredible richness of the early Christian civilization of this island and to the greatness of ancient Ireland," he said.

When the book has been restored and preserved by the museum's laboratory, it will go on display in the National Museum in Dublin, alongside the Ardagh chalice and the Derrynaflan paten.

Excavations at the discovery site are under way to see if more fragments of the manuscript can be found or if it was buried near other valuable objects.

FROM THE VATICAN

Vatican official: Kneeling expresses meeting Jesus in the Eucharist

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Kneeling during the consecration at Mass is the most appropriate way to express the fact that in the Eucharist one meets Jesus, who was bowed down by the weight of human sin, said an article by a Vatican official.

"The Lord lowered himself to the point of death on the cross in order to encounter sinful man, freeing him from sin," said the article in "Notitiae," the bulletin of the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments.

"If the Eucharist represents the sacramental memorial of the death and resurrection of the Lord, it seems appropriate that those for whom the Lord bowed himself down would bow down before this supreme mystery of love," wrote Msgr. Stephan Hunzeler, a congregation official from Germany.

The late-July article said that Christ's self-emptying "reaches its climax when the Lord Jesus Christ takes on himself, as the lamb of God, all the sins of the world."

When people kneel during the consecration, it said, they not only are assuming a position of humility, but are bowing down to meet Jesus where Jesus has bowed down to meet them.

"Kneeling during the consecration of the Eucharist, therefore, becomes one of the most eloquent moments of meeting Christ the Lord," the article said.

The 2002 General Instruction of the Roman Missal, which provides guidelines for the Mass, said the faithful "should kneel at the consecration, except when prevented on occasion by reasons of health, lack of space, the large number of people present or some other good reason. Those who do not kneel ought to make a profound bow when the priest genuflects after the consecration."

The U.S. bishops' adaptation of that section of the instruction reads: "(The faithful) should kneel beginning after the singing or recitation of the Sanctus until after the amen of the eucharistic prayer, except when prevented on occasion by reasons of health, lack of space, the large number of people present, or some other good reason. Those who do not kneel ought to make a profound bow when the priest genuflects after the consecration. The faithful kneel after the Agnus Dei unless the diocesan bishop determines otherwise."

Cardinal says commission to review alleged apparitions at Medjugorje

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Cardinal Vinko Puljic of Sarajevo, Bosnia-Herzegovina, announced a commission would be formed to review the alleged Marian apparitions at Medjugorje and pastoral provisions for the thousands of pilgrims who visit the town each year.

"The commission members have not been named yet," Cardinal Puljic told Catholic News Service in a July 24 telephone interview. "I am awaiting suggestions from the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith" on theologians to appoint.

"But this commission will be under the (Bosnian) bishops' conference" as is the usual practice with alleged apparitions, he said.

The cardinal said he did not expect the commission to be established until sometime in September because of the summer holidays.

He said the primary task of the commission would be to review a 1991 report from the region's bishops that concluded, "It cannot be affirmed that these matters concern supernatural apparitions or revelations."

In addition, he said, the commission would be asked to review pastoral provisions that forbid official diocesan and parish pilgrimages to Medjugorje, while at the same time allowing priests to accompany groups of Catholics in order to provide the sacraments and spiritual guidance.

When asked if the new commission was the idea of the doctrinal congregation or of the bishops' conference, Cardinal Puljic said, "I would rather not answer that question."

Cardinal Puljic announced the future formation of the commission during the bishops' July 12-14 meeting in Banja Luka.

On June 25, thousands of pilgrims converged on Medjugorje to mark the 25th anniversary of the first alleged apparition to six young people.

The Vatican continues to monitor events at Medjugorje, where the apparitions apparently continue, but it has not taken a formal position other than to support the bishops' ban on official pilgrimages.

Officials from the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith were not available July 24 for comment.

Helping make 'Room at the Inn'

Volunteers sort donations, assist program's efforts

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — At Room at the Inn, expectant mothers have a welcoming place to stay.

And thanks to the generosity of strangers and the efforts of young Catholic volunteers, those mothers have clothes for themselves and their babies.

A dozen members of Compass organized donated clothes and other items at Room at the Inn's Outreach Center in Charlotte July 22.

"It was a huge help. Unless we have someone to go through the donations, they just sit there," said Jennifer Gareis, an intern with Room at the Inn.

"We need to get the clothes and other items out into our store because there is a constant need for them," she said.

Room at the Inn is a Catholic maternity home that offers pregnancy assistance for unmarried pregnant women and their babies, both born and unborn. The outreach center features a store, Fay's Family Boutique, which provides free clothing, shoes and other accessories for new and expectant mothers and their babies.

"We want the mothers to feel welcome and leave with a sense of dignity ... and maybe have some fun while shopping," said Gareis.

Compass, a Charlotte-area group of Catholics in their 20s to 40s, organizes social, community service and faith formation events monthly. The group has previously volunteered at Room at the Inn.

"We wanted to help Room at the Inn reach more women, because we have a strong desire to spread the word that this is the true choice — to have your baby — and that there is help out there if you need it," said Jennifer Schumacher, chair of Compass' community service committee.

At Room at the Inn, the Compass volunteers sorted donated clothing, performed yard work around the facility and assembled "Shower in a Bag" packages — baby shower items such as blankets, bibs, clothes and toys for new and expectant mothers.

"For some expectant mothers, it may be the only time they have a baby shower," said Gareis. "It's also a way to welcome the babies and their mothers, and to help introduce them to the program."

Help from the community is vital, according to Cindy Brown, Room at the Inn's executive director.

"Volunteer help is vital to the success and ability of our program to reach women," said Brown. "We have a small staff but a big response from the community with donations, so volunteers are key to help manage and organize the distribution of items."

More than just a place to live, Room at the Inn offers a Christ-centered rehabilitation program based on education, personal responsibility and spiritual direction punctuated with mental-health and adoption counseling services.

Transportation to medical and social appointments, work and school is provided, as is training in parenting, nutrition, budgeting, chastity and job skills. Mothers often work to pay off past creditors and to restore credit ratings.

Since opening its doors in December 1994, Room at the Inn has served more than 300 women and their children through its residency program.

The outreach center opened three years ago to assist mothers who had delivered their babies. Eight women and eight babies were helped the first year.

The next year, the center was opened to all mothers in need. Fifty individuals were served the second year.

"More than 400 women were served this last fiscal year," said Gareis.

Room At The Inn recently received a $50,000 two-year grant from the Sisters of Mercy of North Carolina Foundation, Inc. to provide support for its Pre-Natal Counseling and Extended After-Care and Outreach Program. This newly established, non-residential program has served more than 200 pregnant mothers and 350 newborns/infants/toddlers in the last two years.

As a response to research showing that 37 percent of all pregnant college-age women have abortions, Room at the Inn is launching a program to provide the organization's professional services to pregnant students on area college campuses.

"For many, they have to choose between continuing their education or having their babies," said Gareis. "We don't want them to have to choose."

As such, Room at the Inn announced last fall that it will open a new maternity home on property owned by Belmont Abbey in Belmont. The plan is to help expectant mothers give birth to their babies while continuing their education, either at Belmont Abbey College or another local college.

While the project is not a part of Belmont Abbey College, it will offer its students with volunteer and internship opportunities.

"We're excited because we'll be able to serve more pregnant women and their babies," said Brown. "The women who are at the highest risk to have abortions ... will see that they do have a choice and the resources to stay in school and have their babies."

Room at the Inn is in the process of conducting a planning study to accurately assess the potential for success of a capital campaign to fund the proposed new facility, according to Brown.

In the meantime, volunteers help sort the donated items and help provide assistance and dignity to expecting mothers.

"It was a positive experience for all involved," said Schumacher. "We'd love to go back, and probably will."

Parish's Habitat project builds home, hope

BY SUSAN DEGUZMAN
CORRESPONDENT

WINSTON-SALEM — A 26-year-old mother of two has a new home, thanks to parishioners of St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem.

Under the supervision of the Habitat for Humanity of Forsyth County, approximately 200 volunteers erected walls, installed shingles, painted rooms and planted shrubs to make the family's dream come true.

"There was a lot of enthusiasm for the project," said Beth Hoeing, who coordinated the volunteers.

"St. Leo's got involved in a house many years ago and I have been waiting all these years to do it again," said Dave Harless, who helped with the construction.

The recent undertaking began more than a year ago, according to Bill Green, who helped initiate the project along with fellow parishioners Grover and Rene Myers.

They approached Father Thomas Kessler, pastor, with the idea for the parish to take on a Habitat house of its own. With Father Kessler's blessing, a steering committee was formed to get the project off the ground.

Habitat for Humanity is an ecumenical Christian ministry that operates worldwide to provide affordable housing to low-income, working families living in substandard conditions. The Forsyth County chapter had completed construction of its 200th home when St. Leo the Great Church began its project.

The stipulation for taking on a Habitat house is that the sponsoring group raises $50,000, which covers the cost of the hard materials. In November 2005, Father Parishioners from St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem, including Patsy Hudson (standing), help construct a Habitat for Humanity house in April.

Kessler approached the parish to determine the level of interest, both financially and physically, to undertake the project.

"The project was initiated, supported and executed in a very enthusiastic manner by our parishioners," he said.

"In response to a simple pulpit announcement at all the Masses one weekend, 22 individuals or families offered to donate $2,500 each to raise the $50,000 needed. When it came to volunteers to actually do the labor, once again the response was more than necessary," he said.

Father Johnathan (Hanic, parochial vicar) and I were inspired by our parishioners' zeal to put their faith into action by performing yet another corporal work of mercy — to shelter the homeless," said Father Kessler.

Building the house

Construction began April 1 with a four-day work blitz. Approximately 20 people showed up each day, along with members of the parish Bible study group and Boy Scout troop, who prepared and served lunch and snacks to the workers.

The Habitat crew, who worked onsite with the volunteers, was impressed with the amount accomplished in such a short time.

Construction continued in the weeks following, Tuesdays through Saturdays, with eight to 10 people showing up each day, and tapering off slightly as the house was close to completion.

There was never any difficulty getting volunteers, according to Hoeing.

"We got ahead of schedule; the volunteers who signed up showed up and worked really hard," she said. "The Habitat crew was also very enabling."

Habitat for Humanity carefully scrutinizes its applicants. Qualifications for prospective homeowners are that they have a consistent history of employment and currently live in substandard housing.

The homeowner pays $68,000 for the home and is provided a 20-year, interest-free mortgage. They must complete extensive "homeowner" education, which includes courses in personal finance and home maintenance.

Another criterion is that owners must be able to provide a certain number of "sweat equity hours" in the construction of their homes and that of other Habitat homes.

A 'faith-based initiative'

The new homeowner, her 7-year-old son and 5-year-old daughter were grateful to the parishioners of St. Leo the Great Church. She is happy that her children now have a safe neighborhood in which to play, that her family will have a chance to develop friendships with the neighbors.

Parishioner Bill Green worked alongside the mother on several occasions, including the first day she saw the house.

"She was not prepared to talk and completely broke down with emotion, feeling so joyful and appreciative," said Green. "She said, 'I can't thank all of you enough for giving me this opportunity.'"

The labor was beneficial to the parishioners, as well.

"You do outreach to help other people, but in doing so, you find out how much your own parish community benefits from it. The sense of satisfaction ... that we get from working together ... is amazing," said Green.

"You learn the technical skills of building a house, but you also learn a lot about how to work with other people," said Harless. "You get a very good feeling from this. I would do it again in a heartbeat."

Not only did the project help give a home to a family, but it drew "attention to the issues out there in the community," said Green. "So many people live in substandard and overcrowded housing."

Approximately 50 people, including many of the key volunteers, attended the Habitat house's dedication by Father Kessler in late June.

"Verse 1 of Psalm 127 says, 'Unless the Lord builds the house, their labor in vain who build it,' he said. "St. Leo's Habitat for Humanity house was certainly a faith-based initiative."

Pope repeats calls for Mideast cease-fire, cites children's deaths

"I want to repeat that nothing can justify the spilling of innocent blood, no matter which side does it," the pope said.

"With a heart filled with affliction," he said, "once again I renew a pressing appeal for an immediate cessation of all hostilities and all violence."

Pope Benedict again asked the international community "and those most directly involved in this tragedy" to move quickly to create the conditions needed for a "definite political solution of the crisis," a solution "able to give a more serene and secure future to the generations to come."

The pope's appeal came the morning after Israel began a major ground incursion into southern Lebanon in what was seen as an attempt to severely weaken and root out Hezbollah guerrillas from the border region before a cease-fire is called.

Pope Benedict's appeal at the general audience echoed an appeal he made July 30 before reciting the midday Angelus prayer with visitors at Castel Gandolfo, site of his summer residence south of Rome.

Appealing for peace

In a front-page editorial Aug. 2, the Vatican newspaper said that rather than avoiding photographs of the "dirt- and blood-covered corpses" of the children, people should look at them and allow themselves to be horrified and outraged.

Ignoring the reality of such violence will make it more difficult to stop the killing, said the newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano.

"As the pope implored, there is a need to stop immediately this senseless spiral of violence, breaking the chains of vengeance and reprisals before our humanity itself dies," L'Osservatore said.

Israel, which maintained Hezbollah guerrillas were using civilians as human shields, promised an investigation into the incident at Qana and later declared a 48-hour suspension of aerial bombings.

However fighting resumed hours later.

Asking those gathered in the courtyard of his summer residence to increase their prayers for peace, Pope Benedict said the situation in Lebanon, Israel and the Palestinian territories was becoming more and more "serious and tragic" with "hundreds of dead, many injured, an enormous mass of homeless and displaced (and) houses, cities and infrastructure destroyed."

As of Aug. 2, since fighting began in mid-July, 532 Lebanese had been killed, including 461 civilians, 25 Lebanese soldiers and at least 46 Hezbollah guerrillas.

Hezbollah rocket attacks had killed 54 Israelis — 36 soldiers and 18 civilians.

At the same time, he said, "in the hearts of many people, hatred and the desire for vengeance seem to grow."

"These facts clearly demonstrate that you cannot reestablish justice, create a new order and build an authentic peace by turning to the instrument of violence," the pope said.

"More than ever we see how prophetic and, at the same time, realistic is the church's voice when, in the face of wars and conflict of every kind, it indicates the path of truth, justice, love and freedom," Pope Benedict said.

"This is the path humanity must follow today in order to achieve the desired good of peace," he said.

Reaching out

Pope Benedict asked the leaders of governments around the world to do everything possible to achieve a cease-fire and "begin building, through dialogue, a lasting and stable coexistence among all the peoples of the Middle East."

The pope also appealed for continued donations for humanitarian aid for the suffering and displaced.

"But, most of all, may there continue to rise from every heart a confident prayer to the good and merciful God so that he would give his peace to that region and the whole world," the pope said.

Formally encouraging the Israeli government to take concrete steps toward a long-term cease-fire, Archbishop Giovanni Lajolo, Vatican foreign minister, had a telephone conversation July 30 with Tzipi Livni, Israel's foreign minister, reported Vatican Radio.

The Vatican did not release further details of the conversation.

Nazareth's streets empty as tourists retreat to safer southern Israel

BY JUDITH SUDILOVSKY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NAZARETH, Israel — Things were just starting to look up for the city of Nazareth: Tourist buses crammed the streets and new restaurants and coffee-houses opened their doors to gladly receive the influx of visitors.

But when the Hezbollah-Israeli violence broke out in mid-July, the tourists packed their bags and made a hasty retreat to southern Israel, where they could avoid rocket attacks and life was still fairly normal.

At Nazareth's darkened, cavernous Basilica of the Annunciation July 25, two cleaning ladies rhythmically washed the floors while Eva Waisser, 60, and her family — Jews from Mexico — were the lone visitors.

"We are in Israel visiting friends and family and are visiting different sites. There are robberies and kidnappings all over the world," said Waisser, noting that Nazareth was as far north in Israel as they were willing to go.

In two weeks of violence between Israel and the militant Islamic group Hezbollah, based in Lebanon, two rockets fell on Nazareth, killing two children July 19.

However, the Franciscan superior of the basilica, Father Ricardo Bustos, said he did not think it would happen again, and he had not taken any special precautions to protect the basilica.

"There is no need to alarm anyone," Father Bustos said. Hezbollah's leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, "said there was a miscalculation. It was only that one time."

At the Franciscan-run Casa Nova pilgrim hostel next door to the Nazareth basilica, a man who identified himself only as Sami sat chatting with a friend at the front desk. Their voices echoed through the empty room.

"This month all the groups completely canceled. In August we usually have 90 percent occupancy, and now 70 percent of the groups have canceled and 30 percent have not confirmed. We hope it will be better in September," said Sami.

"We only need peace. Without peace, we can't do anything. There is enough land for everybody," he said.

The only traffic on Nazareth streets was local residents, and shop owners sat dejectedly in their darkened stores. By midafternoon, everyone closed up shop and went home.

Hurling bombs and blame

"This is a very difficult situation. People didn't think this would happen," said Shadi Boutrous, 42, as he watched news of more Katyusha rocket hits in Haifa, Israel.

"There is no work, and people are starting to have problems with the banks," he said.

The Casa Nova pilgrims' hostel across the street from the Basilica of the Annunciation in Nazareth, Israel, is devoid of tourists as the fighting between Hezbollah and Israel continued July 25. Tourism had picked up in Israel prior to the start of the conflict.

Boutrous, who is Catholic, said his wife works in elderly care in Haifa, and they are constantly on the phone to one another. When she has time off, he said, he goes up to Haifa to be with her.

For more than two weeks, Haifa was the main target of Hezbollah missiles, which "are very scary," Boutrous said.

"I am not religious, but I do believe that God gave us religion to love one another, not to kill each other," he said.

Launching Katyushas is not an exact science, and missiles have fallen in other nearby Arab villages as well, killing at least two people, including a 15-year-old Muslim girl who died July 25 when a Katyusha landed on her house next to a mosque in the village of Maghar.

Still, many Muslims in Israel find it difficult to openly criticize Hezbollah.

Amal Esa, 20, a Muslim, initially said both sides are to blame and differences should be settled through talks, but as the discussion progressed he commented: "Hezbollah are not terrorists. They are fighting for their religion. Lebanon doesn't do it, so Hezbollah has to."

Joseph Pavlo, 35, his friend and business partner in the new Casanova Restaurant they opened in May, gave him a sidelong glance. The two invested half a million dollars in the restaurant, and all 48 groups they were set to serve from July 22 to the end of the month had canceled.

"With this war they have pushed us back 10 years. You can't change history. This will be this way forever," Pavlo, a Greek Orthodox, said angrily.

"If Nasrallah goes, there will be another person in his place," he said.

Hope and prayers

Despite the Hezbollah-launched missiles and warning sirens, Christians in villages throughout the north have tried to continue with their regular lives since the July 12 start of the violence. As they attend Mass on Sundays, amid their prayers and the tolling of the church bells they hear the sound of Israeli artillery and Katyusha rockets in the distance.

"We pray to God to stop this war," said Wakim Abu Faris, 73, a Catholic.

Katyushas landed on his property in the village of Gush Halav and killed six of his goats. Luckily, he said, he had taken his family to visit his wife's family in another village at the time.

"They have to solve the problem in another way. Not like this with all the people killed and property destroyed," said Abu Faris.

CSS office director retires after 13 years

WINSTON-SALEM — David Harold, a longtime advocate for peace and justice, has retired as director of Catholic Social Services' Piedmont Triad Regional Office.

After 13 years of service, Harold was honored at a farewell party held at Our Lady of Mercy School in Winston-Salem July 17.

"David is known in the community as a strong advocate of peace and a tireless worker for justice," said Elizabeth Thurbee, executive director of Catholic Social Services in the Diocese of Charlotte.

Harold, who received a master of divinity degree from Yale Divinity School in Connecticut, helped to position the Piedmont Triad Regional Office as an important service agency in the Triad area, said Thurbee.

During Harold's tenure, the office established Youth Empowerment Support Services (YESS), which provides services to young people to help prevent sexual activity before marriage; Casa Guadalupe, which offers comprehensive services to Triad-area Hispanics; the Latino Family Center in High Point, which offers services to Hispanic families in High Point; and a counseling office in Greensboro, which provides faith-based counseling services.

to hold training events for the N.C. Area Health Education Centers Program in the fields of psychotherapy, crisis intervention, personality disorders, neurolinguistic programming and case management.

He is also a practitioner of Tai Chi Chuan, a soft style martial art.

"David has added a richness and diversity to the programs offered in the Piedmont-Triad area. We will miss him," said Thurbee.

Director retires after 15 years at Host Homes

New award named in Stevenson's honor

WINSTON-SALEM — After 15 years as director of Catholic Social Service's Host Homes, Mable Stevenson has retired from the program she helped double in size.

During her farewell party June 17, Stevenson learned her efforts to promote respect for diversity would be fostered with an award named the Mable Stevenson Culture of Respect Award.

The Southeast Network of Youth and Family Services, a non-profit membership organization of youth service agencies in eight southeastern states, will give the award annually in her honor to a person or agency in the network that strives to foster a culture of respect.

Stevenson will present the first award this fall at the network's annual conference.

Host Homes is an outreach program of Catholic Social Services in the Diocese of Charlotte. It works to restore and maintain healthy family relationships and promotes the well-being and safety of children and youths.

In addition to serving as Host Homes' director, Stevenson served on the network's board as president and area representative, and chaired its Cultural Respect Committee.

"Mable has left her mark through dedication and achievement," said David Harold, Catholic Social Services' director of its Piedmont Triad Regional Office.

"CSS is very grateful for her untiring service to youths and families here in Forsyth County," said Harold, who also retired in July.

Host Homes services include individual and family counseling, temporary shelter to youths facing family crises, a mentoring program and a hotline.

Serving the community

CSS office to expand services in Greensboro

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

GREENSBORO — Residents of Greensboro and surrounding areas will soon have easier access to affordable counseling services, thanks to Catholic Social Services in the Diocese of Charlotte.

Two part-time counselors and a social worker/office manager have been hired to staff the Greensboro Satellite Office of the Piedmont Triad Regional Office of Catholic Social Services. Previously, CSS services at the satellite office included outreach by the Casa Guadalupe program, which provides Hispanic and immigration services.

"This office will greatly expand Catholic Social Services' presence in Greensboro," said Gerry Carter, interim office director of the Piedmont Triad Regional Office.

The new office is due in large part to the generosity of the late Aurelia Guffey, who left a generous bequest to Catholic Social Services.

Guffey's bequest provided the majority of the funding for the new outreach, Carter said.

The Greensboro Satellite Office will work closely with parishes to offer individual, family and marriage counseling. Other services will include parenting classes, marriage enrichment and other services.

Providing counseling services will be Carol Wolf and Daniel Rhodes.

Wolf holds a bachelor's degree in history from Duchesne College in Omaha and a master's degree in theology from the University of San Francisco. She earned her master's degree in counseling after moving to Greensboro and has been in private practice since 1987.

Wolf also worked for 16 years as a school counselor in the Guilford County school system. She is a licensed professional counselor in North Carolina, as well as a nationally certified counselor.

Rhodes received his master's in social work from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill in 1996 and his clinical license in 1999. He has been practicing clinical social work for the past 10 years, primarily in crisis and emergency services, as well as with therapeutic foster care.

Rhodes is currently working on his doctorate in cultural studies at the University of North Carolina at Greensboro.

Darlene Stanley, office manager and social worker for the Greensboro Satellite Office, received a bachelor's degree in sociology/psychology with a minor in religion from Greensboro College. Currently she is pursuing a master's in counseling at Webster University and will seek her professional counselor licensure.

Multicultural worker retires, leaving legacy

Efforts will 'continue to bless,' says priest

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

WHITTIER, N.C. — "If you live (in a community), it's important to be involved," Mary Herr said. "Don't just be deadwood."

Herr, 65, retired June 30 as regional faith formation consultant and Native American multicultural worker for the Diocese of Charlotte's Smoky Mountain Vicariate.

"From one perspective, Mary's retirement brings to a close many, many years of service to a wide range of people in far western North Carolina," said Father George Kloster, vicar of the Smoky Mountain Vicariate and pastor of St. William Church in Murphy and Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in Hayesville.

"While it is easy to identify the many positions she has held, church-related as well as with other agencies, there is no way to calculate the depth and breadth of the lives she has touched," Father Kloster said.

Herr grew up in a Catholic family on a farm near Staunton, Ill. In 1967, she signed on with VISTA (Volunteers in Service to America).

"It was one of those turning points in my life," she said. "I was 27. I'd been doing a lot of things I had wanted to do and felt like it was time to give back."

VISTA sent her to Virginia and West

Virginia. She did community organizing, learning about and addressing people's needs, and providing training in such skills as how to approach legislators.

Next she got involved with FOCIS (Federation of Communities in Service), which brought health and legal services and other programs to communities throughout Appalachia. She was FOCIS president in 1975.

Herr's FOCIS involvement garnered her recognition in the book "Mountain Sisters: From Convent to Community in Appalachia."

The book states that "during this time, Mary, who had a natural interest in 'legal stuff' became increasingly aware of a lack of legal resources."

"That was when all those people were trying to get their black-lung benefits and miners' pensions, so we got Greg O'Connor, a lawyer, to come to Clairfield one day a week," Herr is quoted in "Mountain Sisters."

"So we got together and eventually I applied for a Ford Leadership Development Grant to get training as a paralegal and open the legal services in that area Greg O'Connor would come up one day a week and I would be there the other times."

Other communities began to seek

Jan Valder Offerman (left) of St. Peter Church in Charlotte compare notes with Mary Herr during the Bishop Begley Conference in October 2005. Herr recently retired as regional faith formation consultant and Native American multicultural worker for the diocese's Smoky Mountain Vicariate.

Herr's paralegal expertise. Through a grant from CORA (Commission on Religion in Appalachia), she went to communities in Tennessee, Kentucky, Virginia and Cherokee, N.C., to train paralegals.

"When the CORA grant ended, Mary coordinated and taught most of the courses for a program through the University of Tennessee and Manpower to give unemployed people paralegal training," says "Mountain Sisters."

"I moved (to Cherokee) in 1978 when the legal services program (on the Qualla Boundary, the Cherokee Indian reservation) offered me a job as a community educator and paralegal supervisor," she said. "I guess my interest went back to knowing I had some Cherokee ancestry and wanting to know more about that."

Federal government cutbacks in social services programs ended that position in 1981.

"Every time something ended something else came along, so I figured God must want me to stay here," Herr said.

She continued her community-educator work as a staff member of Our Lady of Guadalupe Church on the Boundary from 1981 to 1991, then spent a year as pastoral assistant at Our Lady of Guadalupe Church and at St. Joseph Church in Bryson City.

According to "Mountain Sisters," in 1993 alone "Mary helped more than 300 people obtain over $98,000 in retroactive disability benefits."

Her paralegal experience allowed her to become the Qualla Boundary's first Guardian ad litem, a children's advocate. While doing that, she also volunteered in administration, RCIA and adult faith formation at St. Joseph Church.

Through a grant from Glenmary Home Missioners, Herr assumed the position of Native American multicultural worker while assisting with administrative work at Our Lady of Guadalupe and St. Joseph churches.

The Glenmary grant ended, but through a grant from the Office of Black and Indian Missions in Washington, D.C., Herr continued as a part-time Native American multicultural worker, with Father Kloster as her supervisor.

In 2000, she added another part-time position as regional faith formation consultant for the Smoky Mountain Vicariate.

"This lady is a no-nonsense-approach lady," Dr. Cris Villapando, director of diocesan faith formation programs, said. "She will do whatever it takes — evening sessions, weekends, whatever — to get the job done."

Herr's greatest joy, she said, has been teaching people: "It's a good feeling to be able to share my skills and see others put them into practice. Doing the catechist recognition process has caused me to learn more about my own faith."

She has also tried to help people learn more about Native American culture. She and Father Kloster developed the "Catholics and Cherokees" conference held for three years in the Smoky Mountain Vicariate to help the two groups learn more about each other.

"In a quiet, determined, unassuming way Mary has been a messenger of healing and hope," Father Kloster said. "She has wonderful gifts, both of vision of what needs to be done and how to develop the process needed to accomplish the vision. One of our priests has referred to her as a 'star' and surely she is."

Herr received the Governor's Award for Volunteer Service in 1991, the Spirit Award 2000 for Volunteer Service from Catholic Social Services Office of Justice and Peace, and twice has been nominated for the Nancy Reynolds Award for Personal Service.

Herr plan is to stay involved, but first she's traveling. Then she'll return to become more involved at St. Joseph Church as a lector, taking Communion to the sick and working in other parish ministries.

On the Qualla Boundary, she'll continue to work with organizations of which she was a founding member.

"The good news is that from another perspective Mary's presence will still be felt in the mountains," Father Kloster said. "She may have 'retired' from her official positions, but it is not in her personality to walk away and leave the people, projects and programs that she has loved so dearly and deeply. She will continue to bless us, and we are grateful."

Helping hearts

Catholic Heart Workcamp offers teens camaraderie, chance to help

CHARLOTTE — Teens from the Diocese of Charlotte and beyond recently put their hearts into helping others.

The Catholic Heart Workcamp program provides teens with a chance to clean up communities in a weeklong camp centered on faith-powered mission work.

The campers carry out service projects, giving them eye-opening experiences and showing adults there are good teens doing good things in the world.

Participants from the Diocese of Charlotte included a group from St. Aloysius Church in Hickory, who attended a camp in Louisville, Ky., and a group from St. Paul the Apostle Church in Greensboro, who attended a camp in Pittsburgh, Pa., in July.

Meanwhile, St. Paul the Apostle Church and Charlotte Catholic High School hosted camps comprised of hundreds of teens from other states.

"It was wonderful to see so many young Catholics taking time out of their summer vacations to do God's work," said Timothy Mainhart, a parishioner of St. Paul the Apostle Church who attended the Pittsburgh camp.

"We saw God in the many faces of the people we went to serve and in each other," he said.

"Our youths experienced what it was like to be working side by side with more than 300 Catholics, recognizing Jesus in everyone they met along the way," said Jen Stickle, youth ministry director at St. Aloysius Church.

Nine teens and six adults from St. Aloysius Church spent a week in July with teens from other states making home improvements, doing landscaping and building handicap-accessible ramps and decks around Louisville.

Many of those whom the youths helped said they felt blessed by the work done to their homes.

"We are grateful for the opportunity to serve. We know that we also are blessed by this experience," said Stickle.

The Orlando, Fla.-based Catholic Heart Workcamp was founded in 1993. The first camp in Orlando drew 100 participants. Today, there are hundreds of parishes and thousands of teens involved in the camps held from June to August each year.

Not only do the teenagers sacrifice a week of their summer to help others, but they pay for the experience. The fee goes toward their food and housing.

The campers are responsible for making transportation arrangements to get to the host location, and many drive across the country with their church youth groups.

A group of campers staying at Charlotte Catholic visited Holy Angels, a nonprofit corporation in Belmont providing programs and services to children and adults with mental retardation.

The teens washed Holy Angels' vehicles, cleared and organized storage areas, and cleaned and polished residents' wheelchairs July 3-7. Teens also assisted with various service projects at Holy Angels' Cherubs Café and Candy Bouquet in downtown Belmont.

"We truly look forward to this program every year," said Regina

Moody, Holy Angels president and CEO.

"They bring a wonderful energy and reminder to everyone about what volunteerism and service are all about," she said.

The camps aren't all work for the teenagers. The evenings showcase skits put on by the campers as well as prayer, reflection, videos, talks given by the staff and worship music. There is a different theme each night, as well as a free day during the week to explore the host city.

This year many of the camps for 10th- through 12th-graders were Hayesville parish celebrates 50 years of faith

Church's 50th-anniversary celebration.

Father George Kloster, pastor of Immaculate Heart of Mary Church and of St. William Church in Murphy, celebrated the Mass, with Father Dean and retired Glenmary Father Robert Bond concelebrating.

Current and former parishioners packed the church for the Mass, and the reception in the parish hall.

"I just find it one of the warmest, most active parishes I've ever been in," said Pat Ryan, who began attending as a seasonal resident in the 1990s before moving permanently to the area in 2001.

Parishioners were invited to write their names and thoughts on leaves that were then glued to a picture of a tree in the parish hall. The leaves, along with photos, a DVD about the parish and other mementos, will be placed in a time capsule in early 2007, to be opened on the church's 100th anniversary in 2056.

Father Bond was pastor of Holy Redeemer Church in Andrews and Prince of Peace Church in Robbinsville until he retired several years ago. The last Glenmary priest to actively serve in the Smoky Mountain Vicariate, he now lives in Burnsville.

Father Dean, 85, still serves as a substitute pastor in Mount Pleasant, Texas; and Oklahoma.

Coming back to Immaculate Heart of Mary Church was a "wonderful experience," he said. "I was so glad to see all the parishioners and the improvements (to the church)."

Pitching the tent

Immaculate Heart of Mary Church can trace its roots to 1914, when Msgr. Louis Bour was appointed pastor of an Asheville parish serving all of western North Carolina.

Then the Glenmary Home Missioners began coming to the area for tent revivals.

"One of the means that Glenmary used in the early days was to set up a tent in a field and invite people in to hear us sing and preach," Father Bond said. "They would never come into a Catholic church, but they'd come into a tent."

At the July 28 reception, Fathers Bond and Dean and a few parishioners passed out song sheets and invited everyone packed into the parish hall to join them for a taste of tent-revival singing.

In 1954, Father Dean became the first resident Catholic priest in Cherokee, Clay and Graham counties.

He started out by visiting people in their homes and recalls chatting with James Lance, a Methodist deacon, on the front porch of his house in Lance Cove.

The first Mass in the Hayesville area was in a tobacco barn. Lance offered his home for Mass and invited family and friends to the services. So, it could be said that the first lay evangelist for Catholicism in Hayesville was a Methodist.

Lance and some of his family and neighbors eventually became Catholic.

"When he saw the Eucharist, he saw it was the real thing," Father Dean said.

Revisiting the past

As part of the anniversary celebration, parishioners planned to visit the Lance house and the former motel (now the Sister Loretto John Meehan Center) in Hayesville, where Mass was also celebrated when it was a convent for Glenmary sisters.

Glenmary priests staffed many of the parishes in far western North Carolina, turning them over to the diocese when they became self-sufficient.

Father Kloster spoke of "how deeply grateful (Immaculate Heart of Mary) is to the Glenmarys. From Waynesville on, these parishes were served by Glenmarys. We owe them a huge, huge debt."

David Hains, director of communications, and Bishop Peter J. Jugis record the first podcast for the diocesan Web site at the Pastoral Center in Charlotte July 28.

You may be asking, "What is a podcast?", "Does it cost anything?", "Why is the diocese investing in a podcast?" and "What does 'docPod' mean?"

That last question is the easiest: "docPod" has nothing to do with doctors; "doc" stands for Diocese of Charlotte.

"What is a podcast?" To put it simply, it is an audio program, similar to a radio show that is available on the Internet.

Podcasting has a big advantage over radio and other forms of broadcasting because the programs are available when you want them. You don't have to be in front of a radio at a specific time to listen to your podcast. You can also pause, fast forward or rewind a podcast.

And podcasts give listeners the ability to subscribe to a program. Once you sign up, new editions are automatically downloaded to your iPod when you plug it in to a computer to recharge the battery.

The diocese created "docPod" in order to spread the Good News of our faith to believers and seekers. Podcasting is perhaps the least expensive communications media since smoke signals.

The diocese invested in a high quality microphone and a piece of equipment to translate the spoken word into a digital signal, and that's about it. Editing software, the program listing in iTunes and other directories, even the music on "docPod," are all free.

"Does it cost anything?" No, there is no charge for "docPod." If you don't own an iPod, you can listen to the program on any computer by visiting the Diocese of Charlotte's Web site at www.charlottediocese.org.

You can subscribe to the program by downloading the iTunes software, which also is free.

Since it is free, the next question is, "Where can I get it?" Most of the millions of people who download podcasts do so through the iTunes software program. The "docPod" Web page has one-click links to iTunes.

But if you don't want the iTunes program, you can listen to the program at the diocesan Web site. Click on the "docPod" icon that can be found on the Web site's home page.

The first episode of "docPod" features an interview with Bishop Peter J. Jugis, who will be a regular speaker on the program; music; a Scripture reading; an interview with Lori Fox, director of counseling services for Catholic Social Services; and a look at the news affecting Catholics from The Catholic News & Herald Staff Writer Karen Evans.

Future programs will focus on upcoming events, such as the Eucharistic Congress. We'll also explore the way our church is an instrument of the Lord's will through the ministries that address issues of social justice and education.

There is always something interesting happening in the Catholic faith. Hopefully, every episode of "docPod" will give you something to think about.

We are part of an ancient church with traditions that stretch back over centuries. Podcasting represents a new way for us to deliver an old, but still vibrant, message.

And who knows — the pope uses an iPod; maybe he will be a subscriber to "docPod."

Tuning in faith

Catholic radio growing in size, scope and audience

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Twenty-five years ago, a pop group called the Buggles had a hit on a new cable channel, MTV, called "Video Killed the Radio Star."

Since then, numerous obituaries have been written for radio. It seems, though, that Catholic broadcasters have ignored those obituaries.

Catholic radio comes in virtually every size and shape, as does any other radio format. And the number of these stations is on the upswing. While dwarfed by the thousands of U.S. stations that identify themselves as Christian, the number is estimated at anywhere between 83 and 120.

There is one expanding network of Catholic stations. There is a global shortwave service that later decided to turn its gaze toward the States, offering its programming to anyone free, no strings attached.

There are producers of syndicated programming. There are a growing number of low-power radio stations striving to fill the spiritual needs of Catholics in remote areas. Podcasts are in vogue.

Early this fall, there will be a new channel on a satellite radio service devoted to the Catholic Church. The next step is high-definition radio, giving stations the technology to broadcast multiple channels simultaneously to listeners with the latest generation of radio receivers.

Relevant Radio owns 16 stations — nine in its home state of Wisconsin — and has affiliation agreements with 19 others, billing itself as the "largest Catholic talk radio network in the United States."

Even though Relevant is noncommercial, it still has to pay today's prices for precious radio-dial real estate. Thanks to generous contributors, sponsors and pledge drives, it can.

"Catholics are the principal focus, but we appeal to other denominations as well — but we don't hide the fact that we're Catholic," said CEO Dick Lyle.

While the Eternal Word Television Network is known as a cable television channel, one less-noticed aspect is its growing radio service.

According to EWTN radio marketing director John Pepe, it started as a shortwave service in 1992 to reach the far corners of the globe. Four years later, the network decided to offer the service's programming free of charge to any and all takers.

The first one to accept was KBVM, a Catholic FM station in Portland, Ore.

"There's no bartering, there's no spots," Pepe said, citing two common radio industry terms that allow program suppliers to sell commercials on their shows rather than receive cash from a radio station for the right to air those shows.

"It's a great opportunity to talk about divine providence," he added.

Rather than merely simulcast EWTN's cable offerings, the radio service, following a programming overhaul this winter, is heavy on call-in shows, although the daily Mass is still simulcast — and repeated.

Pepe estimates there are "in excess of 80" stations carrying EWTN's radio feed 18 or more hours a day.

One that carries EWTN radio across the clock is Sirius Satellite Radio, the subscription radio service.

Early this fall, once the technical adjustments are all in place, Sirius will also carry the Catholic Channel, programmed by the Archdiocese of New York.

"We'll be emphasizing on our channel a lot of live two-way talk ... to make it sound, in terms of format, like the best of popular radio," Joseph Zwilling, New York archdiocesan communications director, said.

"We will be completely Catholic in terms of content in what our hosts say on the air," with an eye on "the issues that are in the news," he said.

"We do hope to market the channel through the Catholic press, through the (Sirius) Web site. We hope that when people learn about the Catholic Channel on Sirius, they'll buy the radios and give us a listen," Zwilling said.

Listeners need a satellite radio receiver to get Sirius.

"Where appropriate," he added, "Sirius will promote the Catholic Church on some of the (program breaks)."

Catholic radio, by and large, doesn't sell commercial time. If you don't sell commercials, you don't need to subscribe to ratings services that demonstrate who's listening to your programming as a method to convince advertisers to buy time.

KLUX-FM in Corpus Christi, Texas, doesn't sell ads, but it subscribes to a ratings service, which says KLUX is second in the Corpus Christi market for adults ages 35 and up, and sixth for listeners ages 12 and up.

"We follow the model of Our Lord, who walked among the sinners and the tax collectors," said KLUX general manager Marty Wind. "Four times an hour, we have someone teaching about the Catholic Church, or the bishop teaching, or the Angelus, or a prayer from a priest."

The U.S. bishops' Catholic Communication Campaign's "Catholic Radio Weekly" airs on about 70 stations, both Catholic and secular.

It begins its sixth season this fall and carries regular features on the Vatican, film and popular culture, reports from Catholic Relief Services field representatives, a forum on life issues, chats with Catholic authors and a Catholic Church Extension Society "Hidden Hero of the Month" on the home missions.

The CCC funds four other weekly radio programs, each reaching 30-70 stations, with plans for the shows to be downloadable via podcasts and MP3 players.

The Bread of Life sustains us

BY BEVERLY CORZINE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

One February morning snow and ice began to make Fort Worth commuters think twice before heading out. Nevertheless, this was the day our pastoral staff had chosen months ago for a day of recollection at the Catholic Renewal Center.

As part-time Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults director and full-time high school teacher, I had looked forward to the rare opportunity to join my colleagues in this day of prayer or, as someone had characterized it, a minivacation with the Lord.

We had asked our friend Dan Luby to design a day with the Eucharist as its central theme. As we embarked on our journey in the relaxed warmth of a comfortable room, the world outside grew quiet while the temperature plummeted.

During some individual quiet time, I made a trip to the kitchen for a cup of coffee. I found Dan with shirt sleeves rolled up, kneading a substantial ball of dough.

I whispered, "Are you really making yeast bread for us?"

He nodded his head with the understanding that this secret would eventually have its own way of announcing itself.

As the day progressed, the smell of rising dough and then the glorious smell of baking bread permeated the air. Once the secret of the bread was out, a new spirit of joy filled the room. The discussion topic of Jesus as the Bread of Life took on a new dimension.

Later we gathered in the chapel, where our celebration of the Eucharist and the smell of baking bread rose together in thanksgiving. When we returned to our meeting room, loaves of warm bread, butter and jam greeted us.

Like giggling children, we feasted on authentic homemade bread, dripping with butter and jelly.

When Jesus describes himself as the Bread of Life in today's Gospel, his listeners understand the importance of bread in their meager diets because in their world there was no life without bread.

Looking back through the cross, we recognize there is no life without the Bread of Life to sustain us.

Ignatius stops sale of Charlotte Church works after singer's TV pilot

BY SIMON CALDWELL
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

LONDON — The U.S. publishing company Ignatius Press has refused to sell any works by singer Charlotte Church after she called German-born Pope Benedict XVI a Nazi and mocked the Catholic Church.

The directors of Ignatius Press said they were offended when the Welsh singer mocked the church in the pilot of a proposed eight-part television chat show.

Church, dubbed the "Voice of an Angel" before she turned her talents to popular music, also dressed up as a nun and pretended to hallucinate while eating "communion" wafers imprinted with smiling faces signifying the drug Ecstasy.

She smashed open a statue of the Virgin Mary to reveal a can of hard cider inside, said she worshipped "St. Fortified Wine," and stuck chewing gum on a statue of the child Jesus.

Ignatius Press announced that Church's products have been withdrawn from its Web site and catalogue.

"It is with regret that we do this," the company said in a statement to its customers on its Web site.

"Miss Church possesses a great gift from God, and in the past she has used her talent often to offer praise and glory to Our Lord," the statement said.

"We cannot stand by a young woman who uses her stature in the media to mock the Eucharist, slander the Holy Father, and denigrate the vows of religious women," it continued.

"Therefore, our catalogues and Web site will immediately withdraw all compact discs, cassette tapes, DVDs and VHS tapes that feature Miss Church. Please join us in praying for this troubled young woman," the statement added.

Church declined to comment.

Church, 20, was raised a Catholic and sang for Pope John Paul II at the Vatican at the age of 12.

The pilot for her show was filmed before a live studio audience July 12.

Ignatius Press was founded by Father Joseph Fessio, a California Jesuit who studied under the future Pope Benedict in Germany in the 1970s and who continues to be a close friend.

Pope Benedict, the son of a German policeman opposed to Nazism, was forced into the Hitler Youth movement as a child, and during World War II he served briefly in an anti-aircraft battalion.

Former owners deny claim that chapel replaced abortion facility

WASHINGTON (CNS) — It made a nice story: A building where abortions used to be performed in a suburb of Buffalo, N.Y., becomes a Catholic chapel dedicated to the aborted children.

The trouble is the building's only previous owners adamantly deny they ever rented space to anyone who performed abortions.

In mid-July Catholic News Service picked up and distributed a story about the chapel that originally ran in the Western New York Catholic, the Buffalo diocesan newspaper.

The story said a local independent Catholic radio station, WLOF-FM, had recently celebrated the dedication of a chapel in a building where abortions used to be performed.

On July 31 The Buffalo News, a local daily, reported on the story but quoted the building's first owners, William and Mary Jane Howard, as saying there had never been an abortion provider in the building.

Mary Jane Howard told CNS they owned the building from 1975 until they sold it to the radio station in 2003 and she was the building manager.

She said she thinks the abortionist story arose from an "innocent misunderstanding."

William Howard said that while the building was up for sale, one person who came to look at it was someone who they later learned was looking for a place to rent out as an abortion clinic. That person visited the building once and never returned or made a purchase offer.

Howard told CNS he had never said there had been an abortion practice there. He said Jim Wright, co-founder of WLOF, may have misconstrued a comment he had made that he was glad the station bought the building instead of someone who wanted to set up an abortion clinic.

The 330-square-foot worship site, called the Chapel of the Holy Innocents, is intended as a place of meditation for the station's employees and is wired to allow live broadcasts of the Mass on radio.

Following Howard's denial, Wright told CNS, "I wouldn't make up a story like that. I remember him telling me there was an abortionist down there."

Mary Jane Howard said the building had housed medical practices over the years but never anyone who provided abortions.

The suggestion that they once rented space to an abortion provider "has caused all sorts of consternation in our family," which is strongly Catholic.

Fighting a global problem

Program sheds light on human trafficking

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

BELMONT — Trafficking in humans — whether for slave labor, the sex industry or domestic servitude — is a global problem, affecting an unknown number of men, women and children from Thailand to North Carolina.

"It's a justice issue, it's a human rights issue. It's a mission that belongs to all of us," said Sister Mary Ellen Dougherty of the U.S. bishops' Migration and Refugee Services (MRS).

A member of the School Sisters of Notre Dame, Sister Dougherty is coordinator for education and outreach for MRS' human trafficking program.

She was a featured speaker at a daylong program addressing human trafficking — its causes, scope and prevention — sponsored by the Sisters of Mercy in Belmont Aug. 4.

According to Catholic Relief Services, there are between 700,000 and 2 million victims of human trafficking around the world, primarily women and children.

Sister Dougherty said the U.S. State Department estimates that 16,000 people are trafficked into the United States each year. The United States is one of only 17 countries that have enacted specific laws against human trafficking.

Many victims agree to be smuggled into the United States, Sister Dougherty said.

"The trafficking comes not in the act of smuggling, but in the fraud in that they expect to be liberated or have a job of their own choosing," she said. "Sometimes, they are brought here by people who they think love them and will marry them."

Instead, they find themselves enslaved in a job they can't extricate themselves from, or in "debt bondage" from which they can never escape.

"We are broadening our search (for human trafficking) and finding that the problem is much vaster than we realized," she said.

What was formerly considered, by cultural attitudes, to be child labor is now considered slavery. For example, 10 years ago, using child labor in African fishing industries was commonly accepted, but no longer, said Sister Dougherty.

Contrary to what many people may think, the majority of human trafficking victims are not brought to the United States for work in the sex trade, said Sister Dougherty.

Vietnamese girls, one as young as 8, sit in a Cambodian brothel in this March 2002 photo. Human trafficking has become a global problem, with as many as 2 million people living and working in bondage.

Although 70-80 percent of victims are female, "there is almost a 50-50 breakdown between sexual exploitation and labor," she said.

When underage victims are forced into the sex business, she said, the U.S. mentality about juvenile delinquency often prevents their being recognized as victims. They are seen as teenage prostitutes, or criminals, rather than as the victims of commercial sex with a minor, which is a crime throughout the United States, she said.

If minors caught up in prostitution are viewed as victims rather than criminals, the response will be quite different, she said.

Sister Dougherty said people can help victims of human trafficking in a variety of ways — by notifying authorities of trafficking activities, by lobbying social service agencies to help victims and by raising awareness about the widening scope of human trafficking.

In the Diocese of Charlotte, CSS employees have been trained to identify the signs and symptoms of human trafficking and how to assist victims.

Often, the only contact trafficking victims have with the outside world is through religious ministers, as weekly Mass might be the only activity that the trafficker allows them to do alone.

Memoirs of a Congress

Part 1 of a 7-part series on the second Eucharistic Congress

After several long months of preparation, the day finally arrived. And over the next several and quickly passing hours, the day came to a close. What remained? Did the Diocese of Charlotte's first Eucharistic Congress make an impact? Had it been worth the effort?

Friday, Sept. 23, 2005 —
Charlotte Convention Center

After the stage was set, which took a host of volunteers — including priests, seminarians and laity — and after a turbulent choir rehearsal, the moment arrived. The congress opened with a 100-voice choir concert, which explored our rich Catholic musical tradition in chant and song.

The choir elevated the hearts and souls of thousands of eager congress participants and set the stage for a mystical two-day event. As the final notes resounded through the ballroom and as the uproarious applause ended, the stage was then vacated for one solitary voice — one man, an actor, who would then fill the hall with his voice alone, at times gentle and at times commanding.

Jim Caviezel, most famous for his role as Jesus in "The Passion of the Christ," led the faithful through an opening night Catholic "pep rally" that defined Charlotte's first Eucharistic Congress.

But Caviezel did not conclude the night. Jesus did. Congress participants were invited to St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte for nocturnal adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. For nine consecutive hours throughout the night, faithful from throughout the diocese kept vigil with the Lord as the Knights of Columbus stood guard.

Early the next morning, the priests of the diocese spent a final hour with the Blessed Sacrament before departing for the eucharistic procession.

Saturday, Sept. 24, 2005 —
St. Peter Church, Charlotte

History continued to unfold as thousands of faithful Catholics arrived to participate in Charlotte's first-ever eucharistic procession through uptown Charlotte. This moving display of Catholic faith involved every characteristic of the church's life: clergy, laity, seminarians, religious; adults, youth, children.

As the procession entered the convention center, the faithful enjoyed a Holy Hour and Benediction to complete the morning devotions. The day had begun.

Over the next few hours, participants listened to inspired talks given in "tracks" for adults, teens, children in English and Spanish. The day also offered time for fellowship, shopping for books and religious articles from vendors, and the opportunity for confession and adoration of the Blessed Sacrament throughout the day.

The event reached its spiritual culmination with the celebration of the holy sacrifice of the Mass in the evening. Bishop Peter J. Jugis surprised us with the announcement of Charlotte's second Eucharistic Congress, which met with thunderous applause.

In retrospect, I think the faithful had already begun to taste the fruit produced by the Eucharistic Congress and were eager for more.

Was it worth the effort? Indeed. That is why we are preparing now for the Diocese of Charlotte's second Eucharistic Congress to be held at the Charlotte Convention Center on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 6-7, 2006.

Come and taste again the fruit of God's grace.

Pope tells 42,000 altar servers they are all Jesus' friends

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Although billed as his weekly general audience, Pope Benedict XVI's Aug. 2 appointment in St. Peter's Square was mainly an audience for 42,000 European altar servers.

And, in fact, there was a special focus on the 35,000 altar boys and altar girls from Germany.

"Because most of the servers gathered in this square today are German-speakers, I will address them first in my mother tongue," the German-born pope explained at the beginning of the audience.

Instead of giving his main audience talk in Italian, as is customary, the pope delivered his speech in German, then offered short greetings in Italian, French, English, Spanish, Polish and seven other languages.

Including the altar servers, about 55,000 people had gathered in St. Peter's Square on a hot, humid day for the audience.

The pope explained to the altar servers that he was in the midst of a series of audience talks about the Twelve Apostles.

"The apostles were friends of Jesus," he said. "He himself called them that during the Last Supper."

"They were apostles and witnesses of Christ because they were his friends, united to him by a bond of love enlivened by the Holy Spirit," the pope said.

Pope Benedict told the young people that Jesus also calls them his friends and wants to transform them into courageous witnesses of the Gospel.

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

The pope asked them to listen to Jesus' voice and to be open to his call, particularly if he is calling them to "give yourself without reservation" in the priesthood.

"Dear friends, in reality you already are apostles of Jesus," he said. "When you offer your service at the altar, you give a witness to all. Your attitude of prayer, your devotion that comes from the heart and is expressed in gestures, song and responses, all this is apostolate."

Pope Benedict asked the altar boys and altar girls to be on guard against becoming too used to serving at the altar and, instead, to let themselves marvel again and again at the love of Christ who sacrificed himself on the cross and sacrifices himself on the altar.

"That love which you receive in the liturgy, carry it to everyone, especially to those places where you see love lacking," he said.

Catholics have many means of expression

Recent letters to the editor expressed dismay and disdain to see Mexican Catholics praying for a World Cup victory and dressing a statue of the child Jesus in a soccer uniform ("Mexican Catholics pray for a World Cup miracle," June 23).

It made me smile, just as I smile when I see our local Hispanic Catholics paint icons to Our Lady of Guadalupe on their work trucks or hang rosaries from their rearview mirrors.

And when athletes make the Sign of the Cross to celebrate a touchdown, good for them — what a lovely way to express our thanksgiving in all things.

Hooray for scapulars, holy cards, icons and other Catholic distinctives that set us apart. I say, enjoy being Catholic! Viva Jesus del futbol!

Eucharist: Bread of Life

Jesus can satisfy our hunger

There are many hungers in our human life that cry out for nourishment. As we gather together in these hot summer weeks to celebrate the Eucharist, we are challenged in our Scripture readings to consider all these hungers.

Through the various accounts, believers are reminded that God wants to satisfy every human hunger and that we are to reflect on what we receive and who is the giver. Some examples of this process can be found in Elisha feeding 100 people (17th Sunday), the manna in the wilderness (18th Sunday), Elijah being fed by an angel (19th Sunday) and Jesus multiplying the bread for many (20th Sunday).

Not by accident, the Catholic Church brings to the attention of the faithful chapter 6 of John's Gospel for five Sundays in a row. This chapter has 71 verses and all of them speak about the Eucharist as the bread of life.

The people were drawn to Jesus at the seashore and in the wilderness because their lives were as dry as the sand of the shore and as lost in the wilderness of unsatisfied hungers.

The story of the multiplication of bread is so important that it is reported six times in the four Gospels. In each account, we find some common denominators: large crowds, a remote setting, the estimated cost of buying food for such a crowd (200 denarii = $9,000), the seating of the crowd, the menu (bread and fish) and the leftovers are more than they started with.

The story beyond the story is far more important than the Gospel's pericopae. Actually, Jesus says to you and to me today, "Bring me your barley loaves and your dry fish and see what I can do with them." Don't wait until you are perfect to act, because you never will be. Giving something is always better than giving nothing.

It would be unfair to understand the Eucharist only in terms of "transubstantiation" as adopted by the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 or similar words.

The reality is that "any reference to the Eucharistic species as bread and wine is wrong. They are properly called the Body and Blood of Christ," as quoted in "Our Sunday Visitor's Catholic Encyclopedia" (see Transubstantiation on ps. 940-941).

The Eucharist is the food for the journey, and Jesus is the magnet drawing us to this bread and drink of life. Our hunger is not so much for bread that we buy at the supermarket — the hunger for God is definitely more striking.

Today's world finds itself in a paradoxical situation: We are thirsty, but we don't go to the fountain, which is God; and most of the time, we expect the fountain to come to us.

We want to be happy, but we run away from happiness. On our spiritual journey, we sometimes pay attention to so many minutiae that we lose ourselves in the details and forget the cornerstone, which keeps the structure together.

In this land of plenty, would it not be ironic to die of spiritual starvation?

Finding self-esteem through God's eyes, and our own

In this day and age, it's no wonder so many of us find ourselves lacking in the "self esteem department." Just consider the messages that bombard us in our daily routines.

When was the last time that you received a pat on the back for a job well done? When did someone you love look you square in the eye and tell you, "I think you are amazing."

Have you turned on the TV lately and thought, "Wow, those thin, beautiful, rich people are just like me?"

Unfortunately, we're more likely to hear when we have missed the mark at work, done something to disappoint someone at home or angered someone by an unintended maneuver on the freeway. We humans are conditioned to look outward and feed our hunger for approval by what we see reflected there.

Self-help books tell us to stop relying on others to build our self-esteem. We need to look within and feel great about our lives no matter what anybody else has to say about us.

This is easier said than done.

But what if the love and appreciation we crave were right before us all along?

Of all the gifts the life of Jesus has brought to mankind, one of the greatest was the chance for us to experience the unconditional love of God as a father in a very human way.

In turn, Jesus allowed God to experience a father's love for his child. When Jesus is baptized, we hear God speak of his Son in words all children long to hear: "This is my beloved Son, with whom I am well-pleased" (Matthew 3:17).

What would it mean to you to hear those words coming from God's lips?

Would you feel that even in your imperfections, God loves you and has a father's boundless pride in you?

Would you feel more at peace about your life and the choices you have made?

Would you feel like what you do is recognized and matters?

Would you feel so full of love for yourself that you would try to help others feel this same self-acceptance?

These questions beg to be answered because it happens to you every day. A father rests his hand on his child's precious head and he calls you by your name, "Beloved."

Re-entering the world

A grieving mother's compassionate journey

It is almost impossible to comprehend the horror that shattered Elaine Stillwell's life in 1986.

In her own words, she tells what happened: "In an instant my life changed forever when my two oldest children, 21-year-old Denis and 19-year-old Peggy, were killed in a freak car accident Aug. 2, 1986, not far from our home on Long Island."

I could relate, having suffered the sudden deaths of two sons myself less than three years apart. Small wonder that I would want to read what Stillwell wrote about her new "journey" in a book titled simply "The Death of a Child, Reflections for Grieving Parents."

Like her, my immediate reaction to this unbearable loss was to ask as she asks: "Where do we go from here? How do we get up in the morning?"

But unexpected healing and learning was to come from her grief, bringing her to live a "meaningful life" again.

This happened because she had a faith in the Lord that would, as she says, "light up" her life.

This trust led her to see the work she now could do precisely because of what grief had taught her.

"I was armed with three solid reasons to get up each day. I didn't want my children to be erased from peoples' minds. I wanted to keep doing everything I could to make them proud of me. And I didn't want to waste the special love I had for them," she said.

She "re-entered the world," asking the Lord to design a new path that would lead her to live a "meaningful life" again.

The work Stillwell has done since then is astounding. She began to work with Compassionate Friends, a self-help group for bereaved parents and siblings, and founded a chapter of this organization in her own Rockville Centre Diocese on Long Island.

She then became New York state regional coordinator for the group, serving on the board of the National Catholic Ministry to the Bereaved.

She has chaired grief seminars and conferences, written for national magazines and authored books and pamphlets for the bereaved.

All this work is in the name of her children, and all royalties and stipends she receives go to the "Peggy and Denis O'Connor Memorial Scholarship," established at the University of Dayton, Ohio.

This summer marks the 20th anniversary of their deaths, and Stillwell planned a "big Aug. 5 affair" for the scholarship fund on the grounds of Bishop Kellenberg High School on Long Island.

"This is one of the ways I share

Peggy and Denis with the world," she said, acknowledging that everything she does "is connected with them," giving her energy and keeping her feeling "really close to them."

Yet, she also has met people "who can't let go of their pain and are stuck" in their agony and anger.

"I think they just crumble because they have no anchor in a religion," Stillwell writes.

"I could never have imagined the array of joys that would light up my life after suffering the deaths of Peggy and Denis. I did not have a master plan, but the Lord did!"

A truly God-connected woman, she can say, "When I envision heaven, I see Peggy's and Denis' beaming faces and the faces of my babies lost through miscarriage.

"My heart is overwhelmed with tears of joy as I patiently await our glorious reunion. Every day we are one day closer!"

CHARLOTTE — There are special people in many parishes who need friends and support on their faith journeys.

To address that need, St. Matthew Church in Charlotte has implemented SPRED, a program of religious education specifically designed to meet the spiritual needs of persons with developmental disabilities.

SPRED (Special Religious Development) is a network of services that assists those people with developmental disabilities to realize their own giftedness and dignity and become more integrated into their parishes.

Teresa Duff, 99 (right), chats with fellow parishioner Jane Campbell following Mass in late July at Immaculate Conception Church in Westhampton Beach, N.Y. Duff still goes to church every day, arriving at 7:30 a.m. to pray the rosary before Mass.

At 99, Long Island Catholic woman remains vital part of her parish

WESTHAMPTON BEACH, N.Y. (CNS) — At 99 years old, Teresa Duff still cleans her own house, shops for groceries and goes to Mass every day.

She is practically part of the furniture at Immaculate Conception Church in Westhampton Beach.

"The sixth pew back, on the left," Duff said, noting her usual spot. "This is what I live for. God has been so good to me. I owe him this debt of gratitude. Since I am able to go, I go."

When Father Joseph Mirro, pastor at Immaculate Conception Church, announced Duff's 99th birthday from the pulpit at Mass July 14, the congregation gave her a standing ovation.

Duff drives to church every morning, arriving at 7:30 to pray the rosary before Mass. On rainy or snowy days, a neighbor takes her. On the rare occasions she can't make it to church, Duff watches Mass on television.

She has attended daily Mass nearly all of her adult life. An Irish immigrant, she lived in Manhattan with her now-deceased husband, Angus, and her two sons. During that time, she worked at various department stores, attending Mass each afternoon on her lunch break.

When she moved to Quogue on Long Island 45 years ago, she started attending morning Mass at Immaculate Conception Church.

She credits her mother's example for her strong faith and love of the Mass.

"It doesn't surprise me that she comes to Mass every day," Father Mirro said. "It does surprise me that she is more active than a lot of younger people."

"We celebrate Teresa not because she is 99 but because she is a loving, caring person and a regular volunteer; she is always there to help in whatever way possible," he said.

Duff is part of the parish's mailing ministry and still bakes her famous Linzer tortes and other baked goods for church occasions.

"I am really blessed," Duff said. "I don't know what I did to deserve this. I have had a comfortable life. I am part of a good church. I am just so grateful and I tell God I am grateful."

Group works in churches to bring awareness of, tips on energy cuts

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Interfaith Power & Light sounds like the name of a public utility, complete with monthly bills. But it's not.

Interfaith Power & Light, active in 21 states and the District of Columbia, works at educating churches and their members about how to make a dent in global warming. It's part of the organization's way of caring for God's creation, and the work is done on many fronts.

"The focus is ... making congregations the model of behavior for individuals through conservation, new technologies; making congregations more energy-efficient, and then having it filter down to the individuals to make changes in their lifestyles and make their lives more energy-efficient," said Tim Kautza, education specialist for the National Catholic Rural Life Conference, a member of Iowa Interfaith Power & Light.

Michigan Interfaith Power & Light operates on several levels, said its director, Father Charles Morris, pastor of St. Elizabeth Church in Wyandotte, Mich.

One is a Web site where customers can order compact fluorescent lights and power-saving appliances at a discount.

St. Elizabeth Church spent $5,000 on an energy audit in 1997 and recouped the expense within a year by implementing the audit's energy-saving recommendations, according to Father Morris.

"We can save money as well as make a sacramental witness of our deepest values, with our care of creation," Father Morris said.

At St. Elizabeth, "we have four solar (power) systems in the rectory," Father Morris said: a solar thermal unit for the hot water, cutting natural gas usage in half; a 1.1-kilowatt photovoltaic unit; a 400-watt solar-wind hybrid turbine; and a solar attic fan.

"You can finance on-site renewable (energy) to reduce your ecological footprint," he noted.

Next secretary of state says Vatican warnings on Iraq were prophetic

ROME (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI's choice as the next secretary of state, Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, said the current situation in Iraq demonstrates that the Vatican's warnings against the war were "prophetic."

At the same time, the cardinal said he has argued against a precipitous pullout of Western forces from Iraq because it would leave local Iraqis exposed to dangers.

Cardinal Bertone, archbishop of Genoa, Italy, made the comments in the Italian magazine 30 Giorni (30 Days), published Aug. 9.

Cardinal Bertone, who takes up his new duties Sept. 15, also said he had been following the fighting in Lebanon and was praying every day that the country be spared further "useless massacres." He expressed support for the strongly worded appeals of Pope Benedict and the outgoing secretary of state, Cardinal Angelo Sodano, both of whom called for an immediate cease-fire in Lebanon.

On Iraq, Cardinal Bertone said he had agreed with the Vatican's position against the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003 and added, "The current situation in Iraq shows how prophetic that judgment was."

Although not a diplomat by training, Cardinal Bertone has traveled extensively and has been involved in global issues, including economic relations between the world's poorest and richest countries.

Regarding Islam, Cardinal Bertone said that as archbishop of Genoa he had not opposed the construction of a mosque in the city, because he believes it is important to protect the human dignity of Muslim believers.

At the same time, he said, it would be good if "a certain reciprocity" were shown to Christian minorities in Muslim countries.

Archbishop Gabriel Montalvo, former nuncio to U.S., dies at age 76

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Colombia-born Archbishop Gabriel Montalvo, who served for seven years as the Vatican's nuncio to the United States, died Aug. 2 in Rome in a hospice run by the Sisters of Mercy of Alma, Mich.

Cardinal Angelo Sodano, Vatican secretary of state, presided over his Aug. 5 funeral Mass in St. Peter's Basilica.

Archbishop Montalvo, 76, was reported to have been suffering from lung cancer.

A career Vatican diplomat, the archbishop arrived in Washington in January 1999 after six years of service as the president of the Pontifical Ecclesiastical Academy, which trains priests to become Vatican diplomats.

Conversant in Spanish, French, English, Italian and German, his background included service in countries torn by violence and in nations where church-state tensions were high.

Before stepping down this past

February as nuncio to the United States, Archbishop Montalvo had traveled throughout the country, not simply participating the liturgies marking the installation of new bishops — including that of Bishop Peter J. Jugis in the Diocese of Charlotte in October 2003 — but also getting to know U.S. Catholics and the situation of the church in the country.

His tenure in the U.S. included a period of great challenges to the Catholic Church in the U.S. In addition, the United States and the Vatican had serious differences over the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

The archbishop first gained attention as a Vatican diplomat in 1982 when Pope John Paul II appointed him assistant mediator in Argentina and Chile's dispute over the Beagle Channel. The Vatican's mediation efforts, which began in 1979 when Argentina and Chile were on the brink of war, ended successfully with Archbishop Montalvo's help in early 1984.

PASTORAL ASSIGNMENTS

Bishop Peter J. Jugis announces the following pastoral assignments:

Effective July 10, 2006: Capuchin Father Remo DiSalvatore, as pastor of St. Thomas Aquinas Church in Charlotte.

Effective Aug. 1, 2006: Father Joseph Kelleher, as chaplain of Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville.

CORRECTIONS

Figures need correcting from the Room at the Inn article ('Helping make Room at the Inn,' Aug. 4):

— Since December 1994, the residency program has served 400 mothers and children, not 300;

— In its second year, the outreach center served 113 mothers and children, not 50 individuals; — In the last fiscal year, the outreach center served 437 mothers and children, not more than 400 women. The Catholic News & Herald regrets the errors.

The Columbiettes, the women's auxiliary group of the Knights of Columbus, hold annual fundraisers to help support those considering or pursuing religious vocations.

On June 28, Grand Knight Lance Cancro of Knights of Columbus Council 8509 presented Cheryl Gilreath with a donation toward her education and training.

Gilreath's interest in the religious life grew while attending Franciscan University in Steubenville, Ohio. Currently she is in Sabinov, Slovakia, as part of a mission trip to assist the poor in other countries. She was interested in assisting in the Sudan.

Program welcomes developmentally disabled into parish life

"We hope it catches on in the Diocese of Charlotte. It is like a second family for our developmentally disabled friends," said Jan Clemens, SPRED coordinator at St. Matthew Church.

"SPRED is an inclusive, not exclusive, ministry. It prepares them to share in the life of their community and parish," said Clemens.

Founded in the Archdiocese of Chicago more than 40 years ago, the program now has more than 200 SPRED groups throughout the United States and overseas. St. Matthew Church is the first area parish to establish a SPRED program.

The two dozen members of SPRED and their families celebrated the end of the program's first year at St. Matthew Church with a banquet and Mass May 20.

Msgr. John McSweeney, pastor, celebrated and Father Carmen Malacari, then-parochial vicar, concelebrated the Mass in which SPRED members participated with their "catechist helpers," volunteers who receive special training in SPRED methods.

Clemens was involved with SPRED in northern Virginia before coming to Charlotte. In 2004, she asked Pat Tomlinson, St. Matthew Church faith formation director, about bringing SPRED to the parish.

"She said 'we don't have one, but we need one,'" said Clemens.

They approached Msgr. McSweeney about the program and he was "very enthusiastic," said Clemens.

The parish's pastoral plan included identifying ways to welcome and include persons with developmental disabilities, said Msgr. McSweeney.

Clemens was even more inspired to pursue the initiative after hearing Bishop Peter J. Jugis' Thanksgiving homily at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte in 2004.

"He said there is room for everyone at the Lord's Table," she said.

St. Matthew Church's SPRED program is for both youths and adults, with six participants per group. Each participant is paired with a catechist helper.

"We identified parishioners who were interested in serving as catechists and sent them for training (at the SPRED headquarters) in Chicago," said Msgr. McSweeney.

This year, a catechist training day will be held at St. Matthew Church Aug. 26.

"You need committed, trained people," said Msgr. McSweeney. "This is a ministry that requires time and preparation for each time they come together."

For those people with developmental disabilities, the Word is proclaimed and the message internalized through activities, gestures, songs and other symbolic methods, with ritual being an important factor. Much of SPRED activity draws heavily on the work of Maria Montessori, the famed Italian educator and devout Catholic.

Through one-on-one and group relationships, persons with disabilities are better able to celebrate the sacraments and participate in the sacramental life of the church; also, they discover a place where they can belong and enjoy meaningful relationships in which can realize their dignity.

The SPRED program has been accepted with great enthusiasm at St. Matthew Church, according to Pat White, parish coordinator of volunteers and communications.

Parents of SPRED participants have expressed their gratefulness for a program that provides the spiritual development, friendship and dignity that their children so richly deserve, she said.

France Robinson's son, Kevin, is blossoming in St. Matthew Church's adult SPRED group.

"It's the first time Kevin has been a part of his faith, being an active member of the parish," she said.

"It's a lonely world he's in. Now he has some reason to go to church. He's really enjoying SPRED," said Robinson.

"Persons with developmental disabilities are unique individuals," said Msgr. McSweeney. "To see their smiles and their participation in the special liturgies we've had for them let's me know this is a worthwhile endeavor for them."

Beginning in fall 2006, St. Matthew Church will establish a support group for parents, family members and friends of persons with disabilities. It will be an opportunity to hear special education experts, obtain valuable information on community resources and share ideas.

"Parents can give no greater gift than to put their children in an environment where they can feel comfortable, have friends and worship God together as a community," said Clemens.

Local Lebanese Catholics mindful of conflict

Lebanon. While they still have electricity, the fighting has cut off many parts of the country and they have begun rationing supplies for fear of shortage, he said.

Many communities have no or limited access to electricity, fuel and food.

"There are few bridges left, and many of the roads have been destroyed," said Lucille Moses, a parishioner of St. Gabriel Church.

Moses, a Maronite Catholic raised Roman Catholic, is the daughter of Lebanese immigrants. Her husband is of Lebanese descent and she has cousins living in Lebanon.

The recent fighting that claimed more than 1,250 lives and wounded thousands forced Moses' family to take refuge in the mountains outside of Beirut.

"The entire infrastructure is gone. There's more destruction in Beirut than from the 15-year-old civil war," she said, relaying what her cousins told her.

A month ago, Moses could call and e-mail her cousins easily. Now, contact with them is sporadic and difficult.

Catherine El-Khoury, a parishioner of St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte, visited family in Lebanon last summer.

"It breaks my heart to look at the photos (of my trip) and think of all the internal destruction," said El-Khoury, 45. "It's hard to get through to (my family), but we're trying to keep in touch. If we're lucky, we talk once a week."

A few hours before the U.N. Security Council adopted the cease-fire resolution Aug. 11, Archbishop Silvano Tomasi, Vatican representative to the U.N. Human Rights Council in Geneva, decried the loss of life and destruction caused by the fighting.

The archbishop told the council that during the fighting little was done to ensure the safe conduct of relief supplies for "the suffering populations whose right to life, food, health, water (and) housing" was being denied.

"The Holy See is deeply convinced that no just and durable solution can be reached by recourse to terrorism or armed conflict, and only dialogue is the way to peace and to the safeguarding of human rights," said Archbishop Tomasi.

"My attention is certainly on the situation in Lebanon, but my heart goes out to all those who are affected," said Kadri.

Precarious peace

The Security Council's resolution called for a cease-fire and for sending a 15,000-member international peacekeeping force into southern Lebanon.

Under the terms of the resolution, Lebanon also would send 15,000 of its own troops to the area to disarm the Hezbollah militias, and Israel would withdraw its troops from the Lebanese territory it invaded in an attempt to stop Hezbollah from firing rockets and mortars into Israel.

Although Israel, Lebanon and Hezbollah accepted the cease-fire agreement, each did so with conditions.

Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah said Aug. 14 that his guerrillas achieved a "strategic, historic victory" against Israel — a declaration that prompted celebratory gunfire across the Lebanese capital.

Israel's prime minister, however, maintained the offensive eliminated the "state within a state" run by Hezbollah in southern Lebanon.

From Castel Gandolfo, south of Rome, Pope Benedict XVI prayed that the cease-fire agreement would hold and that humanitarian aid quickly would reach those in need.

"Recent developments let us hope that the clashes will cease and that humanitarian assistance for the populations will be assured quickly and effectively," the pope said during his Angelus Aug. 13, about 17 hours before the cease-fire went into effect.

"Everyone hopes that finally peace will prevail over violence and the force of weapons," said the pope.

Like many people watching the situation, Kadri is hopeful for the ceasefire to work.

"It's possible, but it will require help from a lot of places, in particular the United States," he said.

"It will take a long time for things to get back to normal," said El-Khoury.

MIDEAST CONFLICT

threat to the peaceful coexistence among Lebanese Muslims, Christians and Druze.

"The violence of these weeks is destroying a promising model of national conviviality, built over centuries, where a plurality of communities, even of very different religious convictions, learned that the only way to live in peace and security and to use their human resources in a creative way is dialogue and close cooperation."

"That land is for everyone — Christians, Jews, Muslims — and nothing gets solved from war and constant killing," said Kadri.

Christians have religious ties to the areas of conflict, said Kadri, and the fighting affects more than just Jews and Muslims.

"There are a lot of Christians over there, many of whom are Catholic or Greek Orthodox," said Kadri, who comes from a "strong Catholic family," including an ancestor who was martyred in Syria for his faith.

"People forget that Christianity started in the area around Jerusalem," he said. "There are Christian families there who go back to the time of Christ."

"(The conflict) is having a huge effect on the small but very Christian community in Lebanon," said El-Khoury. "People don't understand how the Christian community in the Holy Land is dwindling because of everything that is going on over there."

Her father left Lebanon in his early 20s; he, along with her mother (a first-generation Lebanese American) helped to found Holy Redeemer Church in Andrews, N.C. Her father donated the land next door to their house.

"The two biggest things in our lives were our church and our culture — it's what made us different but special," said El-Khoury.

A number of sites in Lebanon are significant to Christian history, said Kadri. The Shrine of Our Lady of Lebanon is located in Harissa, 17 miles north of Beirut.

Lucille Moses feared the shrine would get hit, as the Israeli army was striking targets with no apparent military significance, including a resort town and a lighthouse, she said.

If any religious sites were destroyed, it "would be devastating to future generations," said El-Khoury.

Kadri wished more people would learn about the region's history and significance, and discern the information they get from the media.

"Lebanon is beautiful. Beirut is known as the paradise of the Middle East," he said. "The Lebanese people are very caring, giving and hospitable."

"People should read up on and be knowledgeable of the people who are over there," said El-Khoury. "Not every Muslim aligns with radical terrorists."

Yet years of conflict have left deep marks upon the country and its people.

"It's the children who suffer. They grow up to hate because all they know is violence," said Kadri.

"Every time Israel tries to stamp out a terrorist group, it creates another one, and those groups engrain a hatred of Israel in their children," said El-Khoury. "How to break that cycle, I don't know."

Power of prayer

Cardinal Nasrallah P. Sfeir, patriarch of the Maronite Catholic Church, told Vatican Radio Aug. 12 that the Lebanese were feeling both "desolation" and hope.

While everyone hoped for a quick end to the fighting, the destruction created in a month of bombardments and the displacement of hundreds of thousands of Lebanese will make recovery difficult, the cardinal said.

"I hope that all those who were forced to flee can return soon, but unfortunately they will not find their houses because everything has been destroyed. I think that initially we will have to shelter them in prefabricated houses or in tents until we can help them rebuild their houses," he said.

Moses said she hopes her family will be able to return to Beirut, if there is anything left of the city.

"The only thing that is going to save Lebanon is prayers," she said.

Prayer is a big part of El-Khoury's family.

"We are always saying extra prayers for what's going on over there," said El-Khoury. "Every day I try to take a moment to pray, if not to stop the fighting, at least to help make it less of a constant for my family."

"People should continue to pray for peace and all the people there, and that the children grow up to become agents of change," said Kadri.

"We are all part of God's family. We need to look out for each other," said El-Khoury.

"None of the problems get solved by war," said Kadri. "It will take time, but peace will rise again."

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW ORLEANS — The long haul is here.

Every day, teams of counselors and social workers with Catholic Charities of the Archdiocese of New Orleans visit hurricane-devastated neighborhoods and go door-to-door asking people simple questions related to complex problems.

Behind every door is a Katrina survivor with his or her sobering story.

The stories haven't changed much since Katrina hit nearly a year ago, and that is perhaps the saddest indicator of a community in the midst of a collective mental health crisis.

By early July, social workers and counselors with Catholic Charities' Louisiana Spirit outreach program had personally visited 65,000 people and reported spikes in domestic violence, child abuse, substance abuse, depression and suicidal tendencies.

Now the program is in danger of elimination because the Federal Emergency Management Agency is refusing to pay for certain previously approved and budgeted services, leaving Catholic Charities with a $20,000 daily shortfall and an uncertain future.

Daunting indicators

A recent report by The New York Times noted that the annual suicide rate in New Orleans tripled in the four months after Hurricane Katrina — from fewer than nine a year per 100,000 residents to 26 per 100,000.

Dr. Elmore Rigamer, medical director of Catholic Charities in New Orleans, said he isn't in a position to contradict the apparent threefold increase in the suicide rate, but he does know from the firsthand evidence gathered by his team of 140 Louisiana Spirit workers that the community's mental health is teetering.

"The level of anxiety and people feeling overwhelmed and saying 'I don't know if I can take this' is up," said Rigamer, who is a psychiatrist.

Many people have been "stymied by the insurance companies and by the hopelessness of the hoops they have to jump through to get funds. It's sort of an urbanwide malaise," he said.

Taking it to the streets

The Louisiana Spirit program is changing lives the old-fashioned way — by reaching out to people instead of waiting for them to come forward for help.

Every day Louisiana Spirit regional director Heidi Nuss colors in a map with a yellow marker to indicate where a team has been. Social workers provide an empathetic ear and emotional support, and then leave the person with an updated resource list for agencies that can provide needed services.

If during the conversation the person looks distraught, Louisiana Spirit can send a counselor to the person's home within 24 hours for up to five visits.

The Diocese of Biloxi, Miss., was hit hard by Hurricane Katrina Aug. 29, and steps have been made toward recovery, but full-scale recovery is still a long way off.

"No other program sends a licensed counselor to your door to come to see you," Nuss said, adding that there is no eligibility criteria to get the counseling.

"All you have to do is say, 'I want to talk to somebody.' That's the eligibility," she said.

Tracy Cormier, the children's team clinical manager, said she has witnessed an increase in nightmares and "regressive" behavior such as children wanting to sleep with their parents.

But she said there is a critical lack of psychiatric resources in New Orleans: Only 10 beds are available for adolescents needing psychiatric help, and there is no "respite" program that would allow children to get away from angry parents.

"We are seeing an increase in domestic violence, which transfers to kids," Cormier said.

Catholic Charities also has two related programs to help people deal with post-Katrina realities. Counseling Solutions — which was in place before Katrina — provides counseling, paid through insurance coverage or on a sliding-scale basis, at five locations throughout the archdiocese.

Director Bill Swann is attempting to set up group sessions of the program at local churches.

Another program is Katrina Aid Today, which offers long-term case management for Katrina victims. The program is funded through a grant provided by the United Methodist Church and Catholic Charities USA.

"It's very individualized help that will help someone get on the road to recovery," said director Joseph Mahoney, noting that clients may need help with Katrina-related paperwork or they might need referrals to other agencies or counseling and support services.

The program has helped 1,000 clients since January and is expected to run through next October. Because there is a waiting list, only people over age 55 or who have a disability are currently being advised.

According to Rigamer, not everyone who is depressed needs to see a medical professional, but he advises those with depressive moods to "connect with someone."

Another key to recovery, he said, is to have a plan.

"You can't get out of depression if you remain passive and you can't get moving," said Rigamer.

Providing help. Creating hope. Changing lives.

A year after hurricanes, Southern dioceses still trying to recover

The coastal area of the Archdiocese of Mobile, Ala., is also in the midst of recovery. Church structures have been repaired, but residents of the small fishing village of Bayou La Batre, Ala., are still living in trailers and trying to salvage what they can from destroyed homes and fishing livelihoods.

Farther west at the Texas-Louisiana border, the impact of Hurricane Rita, which slammed the area Sept. 24, is evident in ongoing repair work.

In the dioceses of Beaumont, Texas and Houma-Thibodaux, La., there has been a flurry of repairs of homes, schools and churches, but in the Diocese of Lake Charles, La., repairs are only just beginning.

"The needs are still as great as ever," said Margaret Dubuisson, communication director for Catholic Charities in New Orleans. "If anything, the needs are greater as people come home or attempt to come home."

The agency continues to provide immediate relief with food, medical care and shelter, but it is also inundated with long-term recovery needs from counseling to housing. The agency has been involved in gutting destroyed homes, remodeling apartments for the elderly and helping establish new communities.

"We don't build levees, but if we did, we'd be right out there," Dubuisson said.

By the numbers

The New Orleans Archdiocese was hit with $120 million in uninsured losses alone and is in the midst of the arduous process of repairing wind- and flood-damaged schools and churches. Six churches have been permanently closed and 23 have closed temporarily.

A number of churches are still undergoing repairs, and 24 churches and one mission that sustained extensive flooding damage have reopened. Sixteen schools are still closed and 21 have remained open while being repaired.

Although the archdiocese has filed paperwork with the Federal Emergency Management Agency in the hopes of being reimbursed for costs associated with the rebuilding of schools and other nonworship facilities, it is unclear how much the archdiocese will eventually receive. FEMA will not pay to rebuild church buildings.

The Biloxi Diocese suffered property damage of $70 million and only half of the damage is covered by insurance. Thirteen churches were damaged, and three of them will not reopen.

The future of one church is currently undetermined. Five are using temporary locations until their buildings can be repaired and four have been in use while undergoing major repairs.

Katrina also destroyed five schools and damaged 10. The diocese consolidated six schools into three and has been doing repair work on 10 schools that remain open.

The new school year in the Biloxi Diocese started in early August.

According to Mike Ladner, diocesan superintendent of schools, crisis management plans have been finalized, buildings have been modified and school officials have been advised to take school records with them to a dry place in the event of another hurricane.

In Biloxi and other areas, many are considering what they would do differently in the face of a hurricane, but they are also hoping just to get their lives back to where they were prior to the storms.

Rita's wrath

Although Rita was overshadowed by Katrina, its destruction can't be dismissed by local residents now accustomed to the ever-present blue tarps marking signs of repair.

In Beaumont, one church closed because of hurricane damage and five closed temporarily for ongoing repairs. One Catholic school closed but will reopen for the upcoming school year.

Just prior to Hurricane Rita, the Louisiana dioceses of Houma-Thibodaux and Lake Charles were busy assisting Katrina evacuees. Although Katrina inflicted minimal damage on the Houma-Thibodaux Diocese, Rita flooded more than 10,000 homes.

As a result of both hurricanes, seven Catholic schools and eight parishes were damaged, but have since been repaired and are currently functional.

In the Lake Charles Diocese, Rita caused severe damage in several counties and its strong wind and storm surges essentially flattened the civil entity of Cameron Parish, a region that includes five parishes and five mission churches, nine of which had been temporarily closed because of storm damage.

Currently, three damaged churches are in the very early stages of repair, after gaining approval from the local government, the Army Corps of Engineers and FEMA.

For the past several months, the mission chapel of St. Patrick has been the only church in the civil entity of Cameron Parish safe enough to have Masses on a regular basis.

"It's still a very difficult time for many people," said Morris LeBleu, director of communications for the diocese and editor of its diocesan newspaper, The Southwest Catholic.

He noted that only about 5 percent to 6 percent of the residents of Cameron Parish have returned.

On July 23, for the first time since Hurricane Rita, a Sunday Mass was celebrated at Our Lady Star of the Sea Church in Cameron. Parishioners brought their own chairs and prayed together in the empty shell of the church.

"It was good to see the church and be in it and worship," LeBleu said, even if it will be a long time before parishioners will actually be inside the church as it once was.

Generous in spirit

Charles Shelton leaves more than $1 million to diocese

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — In the small town of Newton, Charles Shelton is remembered for his devotion to his church and to his community.

Because of some careful planning, he will be remembered for years to come for his generosity, not only by residents of Newton and parishioners of St. Joseph Church, but also by the entire Diocese of Charlotte.

In January 1995, when Shelton wrote his final will and testament, he notified the diocesan development office of the bequest in his estate plans. Shelton passed away Nov. 12, 2000 of Alzheimer's disease.

Shelton's estate bequeathed more than $1 million to the Diocese of Charlotte. In addition, Shelton left $100,000 to his parish, St. Joseph Church in Newton, a portion of which was used to establish an endowment in his name. Also, he left $100,000 to the church he attended as a child in Springfield, Ill.

Shelton's endowment marks the second $1 million estate gift in the past year, said Jim Kelley, diocesan director of development. Last year, Aurelia Isle Guffey left $1.4 million to the Foundation of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte, Catholic Social Services and two parishes.

The foundation is a non-profit organization established to provide endowments for the diocese and its parishes, schools, agencies and organizations.

An endowment is a permanent fund placed in the diocesan foundation that earns income over time. The original amount is not spent, but the income can be used in a manner stipulated in the person's estate plan or in an endowment agreement, according to Kelley.

Shelton made his living as an engineer and consultant for General Electric, a job that included traveling the world. He was an active member of his parish and the parish's Prime Timers, a group for adults over 50.

Shelton spent his final years at The Little Flower Assisted Living Residence in Charlotte, and later at Carolinas Medical Center as his Alzheimer's developed.

"He was very devout in his faith," said Father Richard Hanson, former pastor of St. Joseph Church. "The Mass and the Eucharist meant everything to him."

Shelton was a generous member of his parish, Father Hanson said. He would often make anonymous donations, preferring to avoid any fanfare.

"Like Mr. Shelton, more people are giving not only of their current assets, but taking the additional step of designating a portion of their assets for the foundation in their estate plans," said Kelley.

Currently, the diocesan foundation has 140 endowments.

"Charles Shelton left a legacy in his estate to what he valued in his life," said Kelley.

WAYS TO GIVE

A gift through a will can stipulate that the foundation or named endowment receives a specific amount, a percentage of your estate, or remainder after other bequests are filled. In addition to a bequest in a will, there are five other primary ways to donate an endowment to the diocese, according to Judy Smith, diocesan director of planned giving.

They are:

— Gifts of cash, securities or real estate.

— Gifts of life insurance, which allow you to make a gift that might be larger than if you were to give an asset outright. You can donate a paid policy that you already own or you can purchase a policy to donate.

— Life income arrangements, which allow you to make a gift during your lifetime while retaining and even increasing your income from those assets for the remainder of your life. These include trusts and charitable gift annuities.

— Gifts from retirement plans, which allow you to designate your endowment as the remainder beneficiary of an IRA, 401K, or annuity to receive what is left in your retirement plan after your death.

— A gift of life estate in real property, which allows you to enjoy your home or vacation property during your lifetime, while giving you the satisfaction of knowing your church will benefit from the gift after your death.

Deacon Vallandingham remembered for kindness

SALISBURY — Deacon Patrick Malone Vallandingham's kindness and service to the church will be remembered for a long time to come.

Deacon Vallandingham, permanent deacon at Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury, died Thursday, July 6, at Rowan Regional Medical Center. He was 67.

A prayer service was held at Sacred Heart Church July 9, and a Mass of Christian burial was celebrated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis July 10. Burial followed at the U.S. National Cemetery.

Deacon Vallandingham was born July 12, 1938, in Carrollton, Ky. He graduated from Charleston Catholic High School in 1956 and attended West Virginia State University and Stonier Graduate School of Banking at Rutgers University in New Brunswick, N.J. Deacon Vallandingham served in the 150th Armored Cavalry in Fort Meade, Maryland.

Deacon Vallandingham was ordained in the Diocese of Charlotte's first diaconate class in 1983 and began his ministry at his home parish, Sacred Heart Church.

"I have always had very positive experiences working with the permanent deacons of the diocese, and this was certainly true where Deacon Pat was concerned," said Father John Putnam, pastor of Sacred Heart Church.

"When I arrived as pastor in the summer of 2000, he was one of the most helpful people in the transition," said Father Putnam.

Deacon Vallandingham went to work for First Union National Bank of Charlotte in 1970, in the building where the original diocesan pastoral center was located. In fact, his old office later belonged to then-Bishop Michael J. Begley.

While in Charlotte, he was instrumental in developing the local charismatic renewal movement. After moving to Salisbury, he attended Sacred Heart Church, where he held various church positions, including parish council, finance council and membership in the Knights of Columbus.

"God had done so much for me, and it became more important for me to walk in my faith," said Deacon Vallandingham in a

Deacon Patrick Vallandingham

March 2001 interview with The Catholic News & Herald. "I wanted to tell the Lord that I was appreciative for all he had done for me and my family and a way to show that was to respond to the call of service in the church."

After joining the permanent diaconate, he served as the first diaconate president and later served as regional vicar. He also was an advocate for the diocesan tribunal, which handles requests for marriage annulments.

Deacon Vallandingham retired from banking in 1994 and began full-time work for the church.

"Aspects of my faith are paramount in my life; it really means something to me internally," said Deacon Vallandingham in 2001.

"Deacon Pat was a man who loved life, loved people and loved the Catholic Church," said Father Putnam. "He always exhibited a genuine concern for people and their relationship with Jesus Christ. This was evident in his interaction with parishioners, his attentiveness to the sick and his desire to bring Jesus to the faithful through word and sacrament."

"He was, in short, a Catholic gentleman, a Godly man," he said.

Deacon Vallandingham is survived by his wife, Ann Ashe Vallandingham; one son and three daughters, and their families; two sisters; and three brothers, and their families.

Forming the faithful

Parish faith formation director retires after 16 years

HAMLET — Ann Peters, faith formation director at St. James Church in Hamlet, recently retired after 16 years of service.

Peters was honored by her fellow parishioners during a farewell gathering June 14.

During the gathering, Peters was presented with a "circle of life" pendant necklace representing the lives that were touched by her work and dedication. Children and young adults from the parish also presented her with flowers.

Eric Duncan and Colleen Lindstrand spoke about how the parish's faith formation program had impacted their lives and how Peters had nurtured and influenced them as they participated in the program.

"Mrs. Peters has been a great influence on all of us and she will be truly missed," said Lindstrand.

"She has been a great support to my own children and I have watched them grow in their own faith because of the opportunities that they were given," she said.

Peters taught at a Catholic school in Wisconsin before relocating to North Carolina and accepting the faith formation director position at St. James Church.

During Peters' tenure, 41 people have been welcomed into the church as Catholics, and the adult and children's programs have enriched the parish's faith life.

Ann Peters

When the Hispanic community began to grow in the area, Peters worked to expand classes and unite the English- and Spanish-speaking communities. St. James Church now celebrates four bilingual children's liturgies a year and offers Family Learning Days, a youth group and a children's choir.

More than 50 children come from different cities and churches to attend the parish's Vacation Bible School each summer.

"The faith formation program has flourished and grown. One thing has remained constant — the dedication and tireless energy of Ann Peters," said Lindstrand.

Food, fun and faith

Approximately 60 priests, transitional deacons and seminarians enjoyed food and camaraderie for the second annual priest and seminarian cookout at Bishop Peter J. Jugis' residence in Charlotte Aug. 8.

The event began with evening prayer at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte, followed by the cookout with Knights of Columbus from St. Mark Church in Huntersville manning the grills.

In spring 2005, the diocesan Presbyteral Council suggested a get-together to allow the priests and seminarians of the Diocese of Charlotte to get to know each other. The event gives the men a chance to pray together as well as socialize.

Transitional deacons Cahill, Toole and Hoare will be ordained to the priesthood in June 2007.

Day of discernment

COURTESY PHOTO

Bishop Peter J. Jugis (second from left) stands with diocesan priests, seminarians and high school and college students from around the diocese for the annual vocations day of discernment, held at St. Joseph Church in Newton Aug. 11. The event was to provide a chance for male students to discern what God is asking of their lives and to explore their possible callings to the priesthood.

In addition to attending Mass celebrated by Bishop Jugis, the students spent the day in prayer, eucharistic adoration and talks with priests and seminarians on discerning a call to the priesthood. The day also included sports, games and a panel discussion with a question-and-answer session about life in the priesthood and seminary.

Music ministers urged to focus on unity, not their own agendas

SACRAMENTO, Calif. (CNS) — Music ministers should focus on building bridges and creating unity, speakers said at the National Association of Pastoral Musicians' Western Regional Convention in Sacramento Aug. 1-4.

The principle that all are one in the body of the Lord is more important than cultural, ideological, musical or liturgical differences, they said.

"We need to resist going down the black hole of anger regarding how we translate our texts, what we will sing, or which musical styles are most appropriate for our Masses," said liturgical composer David Haas in an opening keynote Aug. 1.

"We still have something wonderful to sing about: God is still here, calling all of us to receive what we have been given from God as gift and give it back lavishly in service to the Lord and one another," he added.

About 600 people, mostly church musicians but some liturgists and clergy as well, attended the convention. They came from California and more than 30 other states and several other nations.

The Sacramento convention was one of three regional events held this year by the association, which has about 9,000 members. Sacramento Auxiliary Bishop Richard J. Garcia referred to the convention theme — "What You Receive, Give As Gift" — in his remarks welcoming the attendees.

"You breathe in life-giving air and transform it into song. God blesses this whole community through the work you do, sharing your God-given gifts in the service of his people," he said.

Haas, one of the country's most noted liturgical composers, said the "full and active participation by all the people" called for by the Second Vatican Council involves something much deeper than getting worshippers to join in singing.

"The primary focus of all liturgical and catechetical mission-based service is Jesus Christ, who never wrote a document himself but who did call us to love one another," said Haas. "That is common ground we should look for. Everything we do as musicians must point to Christ, must deepen our relationship with him."

Haas lamented the tendency in some parishes to develop "red state/blue state" mentalities where, he said, the attitude is often, "You not only cannot disagree with me, but there is something wrong with you and I have to stop you."

"We have to stop fighting, put down our swords, truly love one another — intentionally and unconditionally — and listen to one another in love," he said, "because these debates are tearing us apart."

Composers Pedro Rubalcava and Peter Kolar led a workshop on the difficulties of building bridges between parish communities that have different languages and cultures. They invited their audience to reflect on terminologies used in planning celebrations — multicultural, multilingual, cross-cultural, intercultural — and on how the parish's composition compares with the parish leadership.

A true intercultural liturgical celebration is not achieved simply by using a song or reading from another language, the presenters said. They said it must begin by connecting with parishioners outside of liturgy and genuinely learning to know and appreciate the ethnic communities apart from their own.

"Seek first to understand, then to be understood," said Msgr. Raymond G. East of Washington, D.C., in the conference's closing keynote talk Aug. 4.

He urged music ministers to "synergize. It isn't about my way or your way, it's about our way. It's about solving problems, celebrating the other, honoring the other."

Auxiliary Bishop Jaime Soto of Orange, in a workshop following his keynote talk Aug. 2, noted that hospitality is a key to promoting genuine unity and participation by all.

Understanding our faith only enhances it

BY DANY LUBY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

For someone so prominent in the Gospels, to whom Jesus gives so much responsibility, whom the church honors so highly, St. Peter sure gets a lot of things wrong.

When the Lord proclaims his messiahship as a humble path of redemptive suffering rather than a prideful march of triumph, Peter objects loudly. He boastfully promises loyalty only hours before publicly denying Christ, not once but three times.

Even after Pentecost he draws the wrong conclusion in an early dispute with Paul over the Mosaic law.

But in Sunday's Gospel Peter couldn't have gotten it more right.

When everyone else grumbles at the "hard sayings" of Jesus (about eating his flesh and drinking his blood), when other followers are returning to the superficial logic and familiar comfort of the old ways, Peter speaks on behalf of all those who are committed to Jesus, even without fully grasping the mystery of who he is.

"Master," he asks, "to whom shall we go?"

In that simple, heartfelt question all his false arrogance disappears. He understands from his core that even though he makes mistakes, misinterprets things and gets dazzled by his own agenda, his highest hopes and deepest yearnings will find their fulfillment only in Jesus.

It is important for us to work at understanding the doctrinal expression of our faith in Christ. Our mission to proclaim his love in what we say and do can be enhanced through a fuller appreciation of our theological tradition.

We can help others understand such "hard sayings" when we give ourselves to the discipline of study and learning.

But in the end, all of us come to a threshold beyond which our intellect cannot go, a mystery that logic and science and history cannot penetrate. May all of us, when we approach that point, embrace the humble wisdom of Peter and say, "Master, to whom shall we go?"

'Zoom' not worth the rush

Michael Cassidy, Kate Mara, Spencer Breslin, Ryan Newman and Tim Allen star in "Zoom," a lively but lightweight comedy about a washed-up superhero, Captain Zoom (Allen), dragged out of retirement by a top-secret military agency to train four young misfits with incredible powers to save the world from the destructive wrath of Zoom's brother, a supervillain.

Based on the Jason Lethcoe children's book, the zippy film is entertaining if your expectations are kept low, though its kid-friendly themes of family and teamwork are handicapped by bland performances and a skeletal, only fitfully funny script, padded with strained slapstick humor and tedious musical montages.

Some mildly crude humor and unnecessary gross-out sight gags, a few rude expressions and some comic-book-style violence.

The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested. Some material may not be suitable for children.

European religious leaders criticize Madonna's use of religious symbols in act

ROME — Christian, Jewish and Muslim leaders in Europe have criticized the pop star Madonna's latest world tour, in which the singer is bound to a shimmering cross while wearing a crown of thorns.

"Madonna is exploiting Christian symbols ... and attempting to mix human passions, including her own personal ones, with something sacred," said a spokesman for the Russian Orthodox Church, which has urged people to stay away from the singer's concert in Moscow Sept. 11.

Madonna's performance in Rome Aug. 6 drew disapproval from an Italian cardinal, an official of the Italian Muslim League and a spokesman for Rome's Jewish community. They called the use of the religious symbols offensive.

Several local pastors in Rome also criticized the stage act in the days leading up to the concert.

Although the Vatican ignored the controversy, the criticism was frequently characterized in the media as "Vatican opposition." That led a spokeswoman for Madonna to extend an "open invitation" to Pope Benedict XVI to see the show.

During the performance, images of the pope were flashed on a giant screen along with those of other international figures past and present, including Adolf Hitler, Benito Mussolini, Saddam Hussein and George W. Bush.

In Rome, Madonna performed to a sellout crowd of about 70,000 people. Tickets to the Moscow performance reportedly were selling briskly.

Educator experiences culture, faith in Turkey

EPHESUS, Turkey — It was an eye-opening experience.

Mike Streich, history department chair at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville, was among 18 U.S. and Canadian educators on a cultural and educational tour of Turkey.

The July 18-30 trip was sponsored by EF Educational Tours, which organizes tours around the globe for teachers and students as a way to bring the classroom experience to life.

"It is a way for teachers to learn more about a particular culture, as well as to share with each other how we apply those experiences in the classroom," said Streich, who serves on EF's education council.

Also on the trip was Richard Valitutto, Bishop McGuinness' 2005 valedictorian and a rising sophomore at the University of Cincinnati.

In Ephesus, they saw the site where St. Paul proclaimed the message of Jesus.

Outside of Ephesus, the group visited the House of the Virgin Mary, where it is believed she was cared for by St. John in her last days.

"The site was an oasis of peace and deeply inspiring," said Streich.

The experiences helped break down many cultural stereotypes, said Streich, and also enriched his faith.

The experiences will help make "the ancient world come alive for my students. Yet they also challenged me to renew my faith so that, in the spirit of St. Paul, I can proclaim Christ through my daily life," he said.

Streich has taken students and groups on foreign trips for 15 years and plans to continue doing so.

"Having journeyed through Turkey, I hope at some future point to take students and parents there so that they also can experience this rich culture and spiritual heritage," he said.

Bishop Burbidge installed as head of Diocese of Raleigh

Vianney served, we are called to ongoing conversion and transformation," Bishop Burbidge said.

"May we use this day to renew our commitment to build upon the great foundations that have been established in this diocese and rededicate ourselves to responding to the challenges St. John Vianney preached to his people," he said.

Bishop Burbidge, formerly an auxiliary bishop for the Archdiocese of Philadelphia, was installed at the Meymandi Concert Hall in Raleigh to accommodate a crowd of more than 1,700.

Archbishop Wilton D. Gregory of Atlanta installed Raleigh's new shepherd. Also in attendance were Cardinals Justin Rigali of Philadelphia and William H. Keeler of Baltimore; Cardinals Anthony J. Bevilacqua, retired archbishop of Philadelphia, and Theodore E. McCarrick, retired archbishop of Washington; and 30 other archbishops and bishops, including Bishop Peter J. Jugis of Charlotte.

Bishop Burbidge has relatives living in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"We renew the commitments conveyed in the mission statement of the Diocese of Raleigh, to use our time, talents and resources to: advocate the worth and dignity of the human person from the moment of conception to natural death; eradicate the causes of division and polarization; and promote greater social justice in the cause of peace," Bishop Burbidge said in his homily.

"We could easily be overwhelmed

"I plan to take with me only a keen awareness of all that God has done for me, a profound gratitude for all his blessings ... to proclaim his Gospel."

by these challenges. However, we must remember that the transformation St. John Vianney's village experienced was not overnight," he continued.

"It happened slowly and steadily, required patience and perseverance and demanded that people work together calmly and consistently," he said.

Bishop Burbidge said he had received a warm welcome from the people of the Diocese of Raleigh since his appointment was announced June 8.

In a July 28 farewell prayer service in Philadelphia, Bishop Burbidge told those assembled, "With the Lord's help, I plan to leave behind the anxiety and even fear that can be part of a journey into the unknown.

"Instead, I plan to take with me only a keen awareness of all that God has done for me, a profound gratitude for all his blessings, a deep and lasting trust in his divine assistance, and a renewed commitment to proclaim his Gospel," he said.

"I was delighted to participate in Bishop Burbidge's Mass of installation, and welcome him to North Carolina," said Bishop Jugis. "The bishop has relatives who live in the Diocese of Charlotte, so I look forward to welcoming him when he comes to visit family in our area."

Summer's depression

Bread of Life can sustain us in dark times

Depression often strikes during the winter holidays — when everything is glittering and shining — or when the Christmas season makes all cash registers ring joyfully in every department store and supermarket.

When we see the beautiful white snow covering the barren trees and the busy highways, ironically, some of us experience real depression, sadness and loneliness.

There are many explanations for this. I believe that when we intend to place our fulfillment and our happiness in what's out there, we end up empty-handed and depressed. Fulfillment and happiness are not out there, but inside of us and in God; and if they are not in us and in God, they are nowhere to be found.

Similar depression is experienced in summertime — when we take our vacations, when schools are closed. We experience this depression for the same reasons mentioned above.

We learn from the Hebrew scriptures that depression is not something new; it is as old as the creation of the world and it will be with us until we die. We all get discouraged from time to time, but few of us get as discouraged as Elijah — to the point of wanting to die (cfr. 1 Kgs.19:4).

However, in spite of discouragement and darkness, the Lord is more powerful than our depression.

He says: "Get up and eat, else the journey will be too long for you" (Kgs.19:5).

No matter how gloomy the situation may appear, we can still "taste and see the goodness of the Lord" (Ps.19). St. Paul gives us a good advice, when he says: "All bitterness, fury, anger, shouting and reviling must be removed from you, along with malice" (Eph.4:31).

To make this advice more powerful and personal, imagine that St. Paul is writing to you personally, rather than to the Ephesians.

The prophet Elijah doesn't seem to be suffering from chemical depression, but rather from situational depression.

Guest Column

As we all know, chemical depression requires professional help and fortunately there are medications that can help the problem.

Situational depression is totally different. We all get it — when we fail a test; when a boyfriend or girlfriend leaves us; when we get sick; when our car breaks down; when a loved one dies.

In dealing with situational depression, professionals often use the acronym HALT to describe the four basic steps: never get too Hungry, too Angry, too Lonely, too Tired.

In this case, let us not forget that the prophet Elijah deals with depression in a different way than we usually do. When we get discouraged, how many of us speak to God?

Is it not true that we usually turn in to ourselves, close the windows and doors of communication, build stronger walls around us? And our sense of guilt grows stronger to the point of destruction of self-esteem.

Elijah instead opens up to God, who saved him and saves us. The teaching of the prophet is very powerful indeed: Whether these are the worst of times or the best of times, these are the only times we have.

How, then, might we make the present count?

By feeding ourselves with the Bread of Life — Jesus — who emptied himself in order to fill our emptiness.

Capuchin Father John C. Aurilia is pastor of Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville.

Mel Gibson's revelation

Media, public should practice fairness, forgiveness

What did Mel Gibson do recently that was so extraordinary? He drove a car after drinking. That unfortunately happens every night. He got caught, good.

He then flew into an anti-Semite rage at his arresting police officers; like ice clinking in an empty glass, drunks often say stupid, vile things. But it is no surprise that the media had a field day when it learned of Gibson's tipsy tirade. No, the extraordinary thing was it showed us how truly heartless the American media is.

Gibson has rugged good looks, on-camera charm and the ability to self-produce a blockbuster film, "The Passion of the Christ." He has an Academy Award for directing "Braveheart" and, undoubtedly, a bank account that would make King Midas feel like a hobo.

But he has his flaws. Most notable is an admitted problem with alcohol. News reports say he was undergoing treatment for alcohol dependency when he was arrested and has since signed up for more.

So, a well-known actor gets drunk and flies into a rage. For the media, that is a genuine story, especially when the subject of the actor's rage, Judaism, is a sensitive topic. In a world that is being torn asunder by war and in a country where a broken ankle means financial ruin if you are uninsured, the Gibson outburst was worth a news cycle or two at best.

But in this age of 24-hour cable news, blogs and chat rooms that tend to care more about Paris Hilton than Paris, France, we have coverage that lasts weeks and weeks.

Coverage of a drunk driving arrest doesn't make the media heartless. But when you consider that Gibson has apologized not once, but twice, and in both cases has specifically asked for forgiveness, heartless does describe the continuing coverage.

We are a mostly Christian nation and Christianity, not to mention Judaism — "our older brothers in faith," as Pope John Paul II so eloquently stated — exalts the act of forgiveness.

Forgiveness is mentioned more than 100 times in the books of the Bible. In Chapter 17 of Luke, Jesus says, "If your brother sins, rebuke him, and if he repents, forgive him" (Lk: 17-3). Christ is the greatest forgiver of all time and if he can forgive us every time we humbly seek a pardon, then who are we to deny the same to Mel Gibson?

Forgiveness is the hard work of our faith. When we forgive, we look in the face of an immense wrong, a monumental injustice, and we say, "Forget about it, let's move on to something better." Our faith requires forgiveness when someone asks for it and Gibson has asked.

Forgiveness also means "forgetness." OK, I made that word up, but you catch my drift.

If we don't practice forgetness, we carry around anger and pain that puts us right back on the starting line of injustice. We haven't really forgiven if we haven't forgotten.

Gibson should answer for his crime. But that is between him and a court of law. The rest of us don't really have a part in this drama.

News organizations, pundits and gossip television dutifully reported what Gibson said in his statements of contrition. That is what they are supposed to do. But if the media really wanted to be fair, they would drop the story and perhaps focus on Madonna, who has taken to having herself crucified on a mirrored cross during her show, an act that is sorrowful on so many levels.

But the Gibson story hasn't been dropped. Reporters and editors continue to dream up new angles in their search for spicy quotes from people who are oblivious to the concept of forgiveness.

At some point the media has a responsibility to simply shut up. As people of faith, we should demand more from the incessant roar that is the media.

As for me, for the next couple of months when I see or hear a story about Mel Gibson's problem, I'm changing the channel or turning the page.

Hey Mel, "forget about it."

What impels us?

Part 2 of a 7-part series on the second annual Eucharistic Congress

Why do we do what we do? What motivates us to do the things that we do? What impels us?

In the first century, the apostle St. Paul answered this fundamental question in his second letter to the Corinthians: "The love of Christ impels us ..." (5:14).

Centuries later, a contemporary apostle, Bishop Peter J. Jugis, concurred with St. Paul's response by accepting the apostle's inspired words as his episcopal motto: "Caritas Christi Urget Nos."

Those who have become acquainted with the shepherd of the Diocese of Charlotte have indeed heard these words echoed in his teaching and preaching. But recently, this response has found a new venue: it has become the theme of the Diocese of Charlotte's second Eucharistic Congress to be held Oct. 6-7 this year.

What relevance does this theme have to the Eucharistic Congress?

Last year, the diocese's first Eucharistic Congress, which providentially occurred during the Year of the Eucharist, took for its theme, "Come, Let Us Adore Him." The events and talks of the congress focused our attention on the true presence of Jesus Christ in the holy Eucharist and the building up of the Catholic Church by means of the eucharistic sacrifice.

Last year, the congress emphasized the nature of the holy Eucharist and, therefore, highlighted the necessity of praising, worshipping and adoring the Lord, truly present in the Blessed Sacrament.

This year, however, the theme focuses our attention not so much on the nature of the holy Eucharist but on its effects, its missionary appeal. What impels us? The love of Christ, experienced profoundly in the holy Eucharist.

The love of Christ urges us to preach and teach the truths of our faith. The love of Christ impels us to receive the sacraments faithfully, to attend Mass and to receive the mercy of God in reconciliation.

The love of Christ motivates us to serve the poor, defend the unborn, promote chastity, work for justice, console the sorrowful, etc. Indeed, the love of Christ received most profoundly in the holy Eucharist impels us toward every missionary effort of the church, bringing the light of Christ to a world darkened by evil, sin and death.

St. Josemaría Escrivá commented, "We are urged on by the charity of Christ to take upon our shoulders a part of this task of saving souls. It is impossible to live according to the heart of Jesus Christ and not know that we are sent, as he was, 'to save sinners'...."

What impels us? The same thing that impelled St. Paul and, indeed all the saints of the Catholic Church, continues to impel every aspect of life in the church today: the love of Christ.

Father Buettner is pastor of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton.

Life is full of struggles, but believers survive, pope says

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

Openness to 'mystery of God' adds value to life, pope says

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

CASTEL GANDOLFO, Italy — Life is full of struggles and difficulties, but believers survive and even thrive by always keeping in mind the fact that life on earth is simply a prelude to eternal life, Pope Benedict XVI said.

With only 4,000 people requesting free tickets to the Aug. 16 audience, Pope Benedict was able to hold the gathering in the courtyard of his summer villa at Castel Gandolfo, rather than return to the Vatican for the morning.

The pope told his guests he wanted to continue focusing on the assumption of Mary, celebrated the previous day.

"The assumption evokes a mystery that interests each one of us," he said, because the fact that Mary lives with God in heaven is a reminder that God created each person for eternal life with him.

Unfortunately, he said, people often are so overwhelmed by the daily events of their lives that they forget "this consoling spiritual reality, which constitutes an important truth of faith."

"There are those who live today as if they will never die or as if everything will end with death," the pope said.

"Some behave as if human beings have total control over their destinies, as if God did not exist, sometimes going so far as to deny that there is any space for him in our world," he said.

However, Pope Benedict said, such thinking leads to a sense of confusion and emptiness, because the meaning of life becomes too limited.

"Only openness to the mystery of God, who is love, can assuage our hearts' thirst for truth and happiness; only the prospect of eternity can give authentic value to historical events and, especially, to the mystery of human fragility, suffering and death," the pope said.

Contemplating Mary's assumption and knowing that we, too, are destined for eternity fills believers with peace and serenity even when life becomes difficult, he said.

Star-spangled revolution

National anthem should define past and future

What I am about to write is almost guaranteed to generate some "hate mail," but I'm going to say it anyway.

The United States should drop "The Star-Spangled Banner" as its national anthem.

It's hard to sing, especially that high note near the end. It has been butchered so badly and so publicly (think comedian Roseanne Barr a few years back), that it is more interesting to listen for how badly the performer sings it than to listen to the song itself.

How many young baseball fans think the last two words are "Play ball!" or that the last line is "O'er the land of the free and the home of the (Atlanta) Braves?"

After hearing the national anthems of both the U.S. and Canada during hockey's Stanley Cup playoffs, my 12-year-old nephew noted how violent our anthem is, with its "rockets" red glare, the bombs bursting in air."

In its short history, America has fought a lot of wars. Some to ensure the freedom of its citizens, some for the freedom of people in far-off lands.

But do we need, do we want, a national anthem — the one song that defines who we are to the rest of the world — that speaks only of our flag surviving a battle?

I propose having an anthem that encapsulates all that is America: hard-fought freedom and prosperity, the rich diversity of its peoples and lands, gratitude to God for its many blessings. How about a couple of lines that speak to the future: the nation we want to be, not what we were or even what we are?

The Catholic Church values peace above war, creation above destruction, love above all else.

I hope that all Catholics, and Americans, share similar values. If they do, shouldn't they have a national anthem to reflect those values?

I heard this quote recently: "What you think, you become."

What if, at every sporting event, school assembly and political gathering, we sang about peace and unity? Maybe Americans would start valuing those qualities, and strive to instill them in their own lives, and in their world.

If you're a hard-core Francis Scott Key fan, would you settle for replacing the first verse of the poem with the last? You didn't know the original poem has four verses? Me neither.

So you don't have to look it up, here is that last verse:

O thus be it ever when free-men shall stand

Between their lov'd home and the war's desolation;

Blest with vict'ry and peace, may the heav'n-rescued land

Praise the Pow'r that hath made and preserv'd us a nation!

Then conquer we must, when our cause it is just,

And this be our motto: "In God is our trust!"

And the star-spangled banner in triumph shall wave

O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave!

SHARING THE LIGHT OF FAITH

Volunteers Jessica Hensle (left) and Laura Cartagena of A Simple House show Hakeem Alston, 14, how to light a prayer candle following Mass at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington Aug. 15. A Simple House is an outreach program in Washington whose volunteers serve the poor by proclaiming the Gospel through acts of faith, love and charity.

A Simple House is a spiritual, material outreach to poor

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Relying on divine providence and the charisms of Sts. Francis of Assisi and Alphonsus Liguori, volunteers with A Simple House adhere to a lifestyle of Christian poverty and practice what they call “friendship evangelization” among the poor in Washington.

According to the mission statement of the Catholic lay missionary apostolate, its volunteers “wonderfully and radically fall upon the cross of Christ for grace and support” and serve the poor by “proclaiming the Gospel through acts of faith, love and charity.”

They observe Franciscan poverty “with an Alphonsian love for the poorest of the poor.”

Clark Massey, director, said there is a “wonderful living in the moment” aspect of the ministry.

“I’ve quit worrying about the whole course of my life and now focus more on the last five minutes,” he said.

A Simple House — which has two locations in the District of Columbia — serves adults living in subsidized housing. Most are single mothers with a number of children. Others, including drug abusers, prostitutes and homeless people, come to the door for help.

According to the apostolate, it is different from most charities because volunteers focus on people’s spiritual needs, not just their material needs. Through friendship evangelization, they create personal relationships with those they serve.

They bring groceries to people, take them to church and to medical appointments, and visit their homes, where they counsel them, pray with them and invite them to participate in Bible studies.

Massey said some people don’t leave their houses because they are depressed, so volunteers go to them.

Out of the visits, relationships grow, according to Laura Cartagena, a full-time volunteer. Some families have the volunteers over for dinner or invite them to family reunions, graduations and birthday parties.

She said little things happen every day that are “constant reminders that what we’re doing is important,” whether it be taking a group of youths to the movies or to Mass, or seeing a mother of 10 children get a job and move out of a dumpy apartment into a real house.

Full-time volunteers make a 10-month commitment, receive missionary training, participate in morning and evening prayer and attend daily Mass. Part-time volunteers make weekly or monthly commitments, and others volunteer occasionally.

Four times a year A Simple House delivers items to houses: school supplies in the fall and food baskets at Thanksgiving, Christmas and Easter.

Founded in 2003, A Simple House is funded by donations.

“We want to continue begging and relying on God’s providence,” said Massey.

Cartagena said the outreach A Simple House does would seem “pretty silly” if prayer was not involved.

“My spiritual life has definitely improved,” she said. “It’s helped me to focus on praying and relying on God’s providence all the time, not just some of the time.”

FDA permission to sell Plan B over the counter called unacceptable

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The Food and Drug Administration’s Aug. 24 decision, with the apparent support of President George W. Bush, to allow over-the-counter sales of Plan B, the “morning-after pill,” to women 18 and older defies common sense and is “completely unacceptable,” according to a pro-life official of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Deirdre McQuade, director of planning and information for the bishops’ Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities, urged pharmacists “not to confuse FDA approval with a right to access” and said they should “refuse to stock this potent drug for distribution on demand.”

Plan B uses large doses of birth-control pills to prevent conception up to 72 hours after unprotected sex. Over-the-counter sales of the drug were expected to begin before the end of the year.

In its Aug. 24 announcement the FDA said that, “when used as directed, Plan B effectively and safely prevents pregnancy.” But McQuade said that ignores the “potentially abortifacient” effects of the drug.

“While Plan B can prevent fertilization, the manufacturer admits it may also prevent a newly conceived embryo from implanting and surviving in the womb,” she said. “This is properly understood as causing an early abortion.”

“Without the benefit of a doctor’s supervision, many women will be unaware of this abortifacient action and the other risks posed by Plan B,” McQuade added.

McQuade said Plan B “is a powerful dose of the artificial hormone levonorgestrel — 40 times the amount found in comparable prescription-only birth-control pills.”

“Making the more potent dosage available to women upon request simply offends common sense, especially when the drug is not designed to treat a disease or pathological condition,” she said.

Vox Clara reviews U.S. bishops' proposals for wording in Mass prayers

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — A Vatican-appointed committee of English-speaking bishops has reviewed the amendments and adaptations approved by the U.S. bishops in a new translation of the main prayers for Mass.

Archbishop Alfred C. Hughes of New Orleans, a member of the Vox Clara Committee, said members reviewed each of the U.S.-proposed changes to the text prepared by the International Commission on English in the Liturgy.

The Vox Clara Committee, which met July 17-21 at the Vatican, advises the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments on English-language translations. The congregation must approve translations adopted by a national bishops' conference before they can be used in parishes.

Archbishop Hughes said Vox Clara spent a significant amount of time on the translation approved in June by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops because it was the only conference to have approved the text with amendments and adaptations.

The Order of the Mass contains the main, constant parts of the Mass, including the penitential rite, Gloria, creed, eucharistic prayers, eucharistic acclamations, Our Father and other prayers and responses used daily.

Currently, the United States is the only English-speaking country that does not use the phrase "consubstantial with the Father" in describing Jesus in the creed, Archbishop Hughes said. The U.S. bishops proposed to continue using the phrase "one in being with the Father."

The Vatican has encouraged English-speaking bishops' conferences to work closely with ICEL to perfect an exact translation of Mass texts from Latin into an English text that could be used everywhere in the world.

Exorcist says demonic influence is strong in today's world

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — An Italian exorcist said demonic influence is strong in today's world, affecting individuals and sometimes entire societies.

While it is very rare for a person to be possessed by a demon, history reveals some likely examples — including Adolf Hitler and Joseph Stalin, said Pauline Father Gabriele Amorth.

Father Amorth, who works as an exorcist in the Diocese of Rome, made the comments on Vatican Radio Aug. 27.

Father Amorth said every culture in history has shown an awareness of the existence of evil spirits. With the Bible, he said, these spirits were identified as rebellious angels who "tempt man to evil out of hatred for God."

"The devil can possess not only individuals but also entire groups and populations. If one thinks of what was committed by people like Stalin or Hitler, certainly they were possessed by the devil. This is seen in their actions, in their behavior and in the horrors they committed," he said.

"Therefore, society also needs to be defended against the devil," he said.

Father Amorth said he thought one reason why the devil's influence was high today is that Christian faith has weakened, replaced in many cases by superstition and an interest in the occult, which he said "open the way to demonic influences."

He said the church teaches that the devil is a pure spirit; he is not seen, but his effects can be seen, he said.

Exorcism, he said, is a prayer made in the name of the church to liberate people stricken by the devil or by his evil influences.

Father Amorth gained notoriety in 2000 when he revealed that Pope John Paul II had performed an impromptu exorcism on a young woman who flew into an apparent rage at the end of a general audience at the Vatican.

In 1999, the Vatican issued a revised Rite of Exorcism, cautioning that cases of actual possession by devils were probably very rare. The church also has emphasized that before an exorcism is performed, it is important to make certain one is dealing with the devil and not a psychological or other illness.

MAKE BETTER HEALTH CARE COVERAGE ELECTION PRIORITY, SAYS NUN

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Improving health care insurance coverage should be a major campaign priority in November's elections, said the head of the Catholic Health Association, noting that 46.6 million people in the U.S. are uninsured.

"We hope that as the midterm election approaches, people across the country will demand that their candidates for office explain how they will work to expand coverage and access," said Sister Carol Keehan, a Daughter of Charity.

Sister Keehan was commenting on 2005 figures released Aug. 29 by the U.S. Census Bureau. The bureau reported that 46.6 million people in the U.S. are uninsured. This includes 8.3 million children.

Belmont Abbey breaks ground for adoration chapel

Structure will be first new building on campus in nearly 20 years

BELMONT — Belmont Abbey College recently broke ground for a new eucharistic adoration chapel.

The groundbreaking ceremony for the adoration chapel was led by Abbot Placid Solari and college president Bill Thierfelder Aug. 22. Bishop Peter J. Jugis, as well as other clergy from the Diocese of Charlotte and monastery, were in attendance.

By unanimous vote of the monks, the chapel was named for St. Joseph.

Belmont Abbey's first new building since 1989 and part of its overall strategic plan, the adoration chapel will replace the current one on the campus located behind the monastery and will provide a larger place for the college and community to pray.

"How appropriate that our first groundbreaking in so many years is for an adoration chapel," said Thierfelder. "We're locating this chapel in the middle of the dormitories with the hope students will stop by daily to give thanks for what we have here."

Completion of the wood-and-glass chapel is scheduled for 2007.

"The building shows the progress of the college," said Abbot Placid. "It's one of the tangible signs of the advances the college has made."

Founded in 1876, Belmont Abbey College was named one of the best comprehensive colleges in the Southeast by U.S. News and World Report and The Princeton Review. The College welcomes anyone, from any religious background, who wishes to pursue academic excellence through a liberal arts curriculum.

Order of chivalry brings new members, service to diocese

CHARLOTTE — The Equestrian Order of the Holy Sepulchre of Jerusalem is growing in the Diocese of Charlotte.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis, a member of the order, celebrated the order's annual scroll Mass at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte Aug. 13.

During the Mass, two new members were recognized and others, including Bishop Jugis, received promotions.

The order, which dates back to the 11th century, is dedicated to preserving Christ's tomb in Jerusalem as well as supporting Catholic schools, hospitals, orphanages and churches in the Holy Land.

It is the only order of chivalry under the patronage of the Holy See. Members, also known as Knights and Ladies of the Holy Sepulchre, are leaders in their parishes and communities.

Membership is considered one of the highest papal awards conferred upon clergy and laity alike, according to Alice Cella, the order's regional representative for the Diocese of Charlotte.

Members are invested during a centuries-old ceremony and each receives a scroll imprinted with the seals of the Vatican secretary of state and the cardinal grand master.

Bishop Jugis and John Piuono of the order's Middle Atlantic Lieutenantcy (which includes the Diocese of Charlotte) presented scrolls to new members, Peter Asmer Jr. and Rita Maria Jimenez Witt, who were invested in 2005.

Promoted to the rank of Knight Commander with Star were Bishop Jugis and Cleatus Tate.

Promoted to Knight Commander were Father Paul Gary, rector of St. Patrick Cathedral; Father John Putnam, pastor of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury; James Beckert and Robert Potter.

Promoted to Lady Commander were Alice Cella and Mary Potter.

On the local level, members lend their presence in support of their bishop by participating in ceremonies of the diocese.

The goal of each knight and lady is to make a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, for which they are awarded the prized Pilgrim's Shell by the Patriarch of Jerusalem.

Our Lady of Guadalupe Church celebrates 40 years

"Mary carried within herself the sweet, gentle gift of God," Bishop Peter J. Jugis said in his homily. "How appropriate that just as the Gospel was read we have the sweet, gentle gift of God from above to renew the earth."

Parishioners and visitors at the Mass celebrated not just the feast day but also Our Lady of Guadalupe Church's 40th anniversary.

"Our celebration today allows us to rededicate ourselves to Jesus' mission — salvation — the reason Jesus was sent into the world," Bishop Jugis said.

"In order for us to be effective in bringing Jesus' message, we have to remain rooted in Jesus," the bishop continued. "That's the goal of all our sacraments, to become one with him. He is the God-man, who came into the world to show us what it is to live a full life."

A 40-year mission

On Aug. 15, 1966, Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh dedicated the church, with its seven-sided construction to honor the seven Cherokee clans. Cherokee artist Watty Chiltoskie designed the mosaics, inlaid in the church floor, to represent those seven clans: Deer, Long Hair, Paint, Wolf, Bird, Wild Potato and Blue Panther.

Goingback Chiltoskie, another Cherokee artist, carved symbols of the seven sacraments into the altar railing. Later, Cherokee carpenter T.J. Dupree moved the altar-railing panels to stand in front of the 5,000-piece stained-glass window, which is the first thing most visitors see when entering the church.

The window depicts Our Lady of Guadalupe, "patroness of captive nations." Sequoyah, inventor of the Cherokee alphabet and written language, kneels on the left in front of a Cherokee village.

The Basilica of Our Lady of Guadalupe in Mexico City is on the right, along with a rose bush, which bloomed in winter on nearby Tepayac Hill to indicate that Mary wanted a church built there.

Our Lady of Guadalupe Church, also built on a hill, has always been a mission church — first of St. John Church in Waynesville, then St. Margaret of Scotland in Maggie Valley.

When Bishop Michael J. Begley became the first bishop of the Diocese of Charlotte in 1971, he established St. Joseph Church in Bryson City in 1972; Our Lady of Guadalupe Church then became its mission.

At first, Glenmary Home Missioners — Father Donald Levernier, Father Frank Gardner, Father Tom Field — pastored the churches. In 2000, the Glenmarys returned administration of the two parishes to the diocese.

Fathers Ray Williams and Frank Seabo preceded Father O'Neal as diocesan pastors.

Franciscan Sisters of Tiffin, Ohio, including Sisters Roberta McKinnon, Jane Schmenk, Marcella Keefe and Virginia Gase, provided a pastoral presence over the years.

"There was no limit to the sisters' diverse involvement in religious, cultural, and social activities," according to the church's historical notes. "They took part in interfaith studies with local ministers, ecumenical gatherings and promoting cooperation among denominations. ... They initiated various social programs and served on numerous boards."

"Spiritual lives were enriched by incorporating Indian rituals into Mass and prayer services at Our Lady of Guadalupe," the history states.

The continuing mission

Bishop Jugis reminded attendees that the mission continues: to tell others about Jesus, to work for social justice, to welcome newcomers from other countries.

"The Second Vatican Council talked about lay people being a leaven in the world," he said. "If you're united with Christ, you're going to make a difference."

"It is a grand mission, a beautiful vocation. If we're not doing that, we're not fulfilling Bishop Waters' purpose for which this mission was established," he said.

At the end of Mass, Father O'Neal presented an eagle feather, given by Eastern Band of Cherokee member Maxine Studer, to Mary Herr for her many years of involvement with the church.

Herr recently retired as faith formation consultant and Native American multicultural worker for the Smoky Mountain Vicariate. It is legal to own an eagle feather, Herr said, as long as it is given by a Native American.

Father O'Neal asked that "we never forget the Franciscan Sisters of Tiffin, the Glenmarys, and other pastors who have served the church. He also thanked the bishop and everyone who attended Mass, many of whom were visitors."

"We will always welcome you as we would welcome Jesus," he said.

A reception followed in the parish hall, the Kateri Center, named in honor of Blessed Kateri Tekakwitha, a member of the Mohawk tribe, who died in 1680 at the age of 24. Pope John Paul II beatified her in 1980.

Mothers helping mothers

Peer ministry shares faith, experience

CLEMMONS — Women wading through the demands of motherhood often could benefit from the experience and faith of other mothers.

A group of mothers at Holy Family Church in Clemmons are hoping to help mothers in their parish and beyond by sharing the knowledge, support and faith they've gained through the Ministry of Mothers Sharing (MOMS).

"Becoming a mother after many years of wanting children has been a life-altering experience, and I longed to understand how this change called for adjustments in my spiritual life," said Gretchen Solomon, a MOMS facilitator at Holy Family Church.

The women in MOMS look to Mary and Elizabeth as the first role models of mothers supporting mothers.

"I wanted to relate to other mothers of faith and to exchange stories of triumphs and trials in daily life as well as in our spiritual journeys," said Solomon.

Through MOMS, Solomon found a strong connection with the other mothers in the group.

"I also gained a renewed appreciation for making my spiritual life a priority," she said.

MOMS is an eight-week parish-based peer ministry founded by the Benedictine Sisters of St. Paul's Monastery in St. Paul, Minn. Since 1992, MOMS has reached more than 500,000 women and their families in more than 100 dioceses, according to the monastery's Web site.

The weekly MOMS sessions begin and end with a prayer ritual designed to enhance the Christian perspective on a number of topics, including self-esteem and self-acceptance, anxiety, spirituality, setting goals, friendships and spiritual gifts.

Women taking the course keep journals and share their thoughts and experiences. Mothers of all ages and stages of life are encouraged to participate.

Solomon met her MOMS co-facilitators, Michelle Goldy and Kelly Hines, through Holy Family Church's mothers' support and play group. They realized that their daily busyness had disconnected their religious lives from the many tasks that filled their time — working, cooking, doing laundry and caring for young children.

The women shared a desire to make a stronger connection between their daily routines of caring for children and their faith, and they launched the MOMS program.

Going through the program has helped Goldy reflect on many aspects of her life.

"Recognizing that being a mother is my calling at this point in my life has been such a gift," she said. "It has changed my perspective on all the day-to-day dealings I have with my husband and children, as well as how I approach maintaining the household."

"I am able to recognize those grace-filled moments that before seemed to go unappreciated, and that inspires me to be the best mother and wife I can be," said Goldy.

Hines said MOMS has helped her appreciate "moments of ordinary holiness."

"There is an element of spirituality in even the simplest tasks as a mother, wife and friend," she said. "It has also helped me take time to nourish my spirituality, which is something I think gets overlooked when we're so busy with everyday life."

MOMS courses were offered at Holy Family Church to coincide with Advent and Lent in the last year. Now, with the support of Father Brian Cook, parochial vicar, the facilitators are planning a MOMS retreat in September themed "Mary, Our Sister and Spiritual Model," led by Benedictine Sister Paula Hagen, co-founder and director of MOMS.

During the retreat, participants will take time to recognize and celebrate the sacredness of Mary as mother/sister/friend and see her come alive in her relationship with the Holy Spirit, Joseph, Elizabeth and her son, Jesus, from a mother's perspective.

opportunities for education and growth within the Catholic schools," said Father James Hawker, vicar of education for the Diocese of Charlotte and pastor of St. Luke Church in Mint Hill.

"At the same time we never cease to realize that this graced environment is founded upon the person and message of Jesus Christ," he said.

At Immaculata School in Hendersonville, new math programs have been adopted, as well as a new writing program for grades one through eight and the Handwriting Without Tears program for pre-kindergartners.

theLEAP (Learning Enrichment Activities Program) will offer more to students, as the teacher is employed full-time.

Beginning this year, the 132 students at Our Lady of the Assumption School in Charlotte can join the choir, dance, drama and Spanish clubs.

St. Ann School in Charlotte has instituted a Gifted and Talented program and introduced an outside classroom, where vegetables and flowers are grown for Samaritan House, a local ministry that provides a recuperative care home for the homeless when they have been discharged from the hospital.

Dominican Sister of St. Catherine of Siena Mary Seldita Tiorosio, the new principal at Sacred Heart School in Salisbury, welcomed 190 students — an increase of 20 since 2005-06 — as well as fellow Dominican Sisters Enriqueta Arnaiz and Elizabeth Arnaiz.

Sister Tiorosio and Sister of St. Joseph Helene Nagle, principal of St. Ann School, are the only two women religious serving as school principals in the diocese.

Graduates of diocesan schools seem to remain loyal to their Catholic educations: seven the teachers at St. Matthew School are graduates of Charlotte Catholic High School, including a graduate of All Saints School (now St. Matthew School). At St. Ann School, many of the current students' parents also attended the school, according to Sister Nagle.

"It is necessary that the vision, values and virtues lived and proclaimed by the Lord himself are cultivated and exemplified within the Catholic school community," said Father Hawker.

"Therefore, all who are involved will witness to the presence of Jesus in that graced environment and in their lives."

IMPROVED SCHOOLS

Students, teachers and staff returned to upgraded facilities at most schools, as 59 capital improvement projects were completed over the summer months.

Among the projects: The administration building at Holy Trinity Catholic Middle School in Charlotte now has a new central air conditioning system and roof, and a new water pipeline now serves the entire school.

St. Mark School in Huntersville has a new walking track and improved athletic fields.

At St. Ann School in Charlotte, central air conditioning was installed, the parking lot was resurfaced and new ceiling tiles and lighting were installed in the multipurpose room.

Asheville Catholic School also benefited from capital improvement, including a new roof for the gym, a resurfaced playground and air conditioning in the first- and second-grade classrooms.

Classrooms in most schools were re-painted.

GOING HI-TECH

Technological improvements were made at several schools as well.

Voice and data carriers were changed from ALLTEL to Bellsouth's Metro-E product, increasing Internet and bandwidth at each of the MACS schools to 10 mb bandwidth.

St. Gabriel School received a new wireless computer lab setup and a newly designed server room.

St. Ann School received a new computer lab, a newly designed server room and new cabling and wiring infrastructure throughout the entire school, including wireless.

St. Patrick School received a new computer lab.

St. Matthew School is in the implementation stage for a wireless network for the entire school.

Charlotte Catholic High School is in the implementation stage for new cabling and wiring infrastructure throughout the entire school including wireless. A new IP address scheme to accommodate more computer equipment on the system for students was implemented.

'Da Vinci Code' author sued for plagiarism

BY STEPHEN KILTONIC
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

HOLYOKE, Mass. — Claiming that Dan Brown, author of the phenomenally successful fictional thriller "The Da Vinci Code," plagiarized his book, "The Vatican Boys," Catholic author Jack Dunn filed a $400 million lawsuit Aug. 16 in the U.S. District Court in Springfield.

Dunn, a Holyoke native, named Brown; Random House, Brown's publisher; Columbia Pictures; Imagine Entertainment; Sony Releasing; and Sony Pictures, producer of the screen version of the book, in the lawsuit.

Dunn said extensive portions of his book appear in Brown's book and that there are many similarities in the text, the characters and plot points of "The Da Vinci Code" that closely parallel the characters and plot points in "The Vatican Boys."

Dunn's historical novel was written and copyrighted in 1997, while "The Da Vinci Code" was released in 2003.

In a press release, Dunn said he had alerted Random House and Sony Pictures April 26 that he "felt there were problems with the content of both books and possible copyright infringement." He received a letter from Random House saying it had received his complaint, but did not get a response from Sony.

In the last five months, Dunn has received "several oral and written credible preliminary reports from literary and/or linguistic experts confirming that substantial similarities in many constituent elements" between the two books are present "and would be readily apparent to reasonable lay readers of both books," according to the lawsuit.

"The Vatican Boys" is about church corruption and delves into the world of international money, the Opus Dei personal prelature, and the Shroud of Turin.

Dunn said he spent four years researching and writing the novel, traveling to Europe and Jerusalem.

Dunn told The Catholic Observer, newspaper of the Diocese of Springfield, that the similarities between "The Vatican Boys" and "The Da Vinci Code" were first brought to his attention at book signings by readers who noticed that the story in Brown's book looked "an awful lot" like the story in his book.

Intrigued, he finally sat down last January to read "The Da Vinci Code" and immediately saw the connection.

"I was shocked that someone would so closely copy a book and then try and disguise it by putting in what I call all the fluff around the book, by creating scenes, by just moving characters around a little bit, or changing the scene," said Dunn, who claims there are "virtually hundreds" of similarities between both books.

Dunn, working with scholars and other experts, has nearly 40 pages of flow charts to identify specific instances of the copying of terms and phrases as well as the introduction of the characters in the plots and the scenes in the book.

Earlier this year the writers of the 1982 nonfiction book "Holy Blood, Holy Grail" sued Brown in London for plagiarizing their "bloodline" theory, which claims that Jesus married Mary Magdalene, fathered a child and produced a royal bloodline and that evil forces within the Catholic Church protected these secrets for centuries.

The London lawsuit ultimately failed because of lack of sufficient evidence.

"If you (take) out everything that he took from my story to get to the bloodline theory, there's nothing left of his book. He needs everything that he took from 'The Vatican Boys' in order to get to the bloodline," including the historical information and characters, Dunn said.

Like many Catholics who call "The Da Vinci Code" blasphemous, Dunn feels Brown must be challenged and ultimately discredited because fiction passed off as history undermines Christianity.

"As a Catholic, as a Christian, I'm very offended by what Dan Brown has done. I'm twice as offended since he used my story to do it," he said.

"I think all of us have a responsibility right now to take very seriously what Dan Brown is doing in promoting this bloodline theory and work together to show other information which refutes his allegations," he said.

Streams of faith, friendship

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Crossing Terlingua Creek in Big Bend National Park to get to the trail that leads up the side of Santa Elena Canyon can be a harrowing experience.

It was late-July a couple of years ago when I was making my way across the cobblestone streambed. Contrary to weather patterns in our part of Texas, this was at the end of the rainy season in the Big Bend, and the creek was running quite strong.

With the current lapping a few inches above my knees, I found it necessary to keep my eyes fixed on the far shore to which I was headed. Eyes on the goal, I inched my way across.

It wasn't lost to me that this was a spiritual lesson about dealing with trying circumstances. Eyes on the problem: panic. Eyes on the goal: calm resolve. I got the message.

And that seems to be the lesson in the Isaiah reading today: "Say to those whose hearts are frightened: Be strong, fear not! Here is your God, he comes with vindication."

I had followed in the footsteps, almost literally, of a young man with a walking staff who had gone before me, taking off up the trail on the other side about 20 minutes earlier.

After I'd made my way across the stream and up the side of the canyon, following the trail in the 110-degree heat a couple of miles and back, I found the fellow still on the far side of Terlingua Creek. He said he'd been swimming, but his clothes were dry.

I suspected he'd kept an eye out for my welfare, and once across the creek again I invited him to share some lunch with me. Unsought protection like that should not go unrewarded, I thought.

He turned out to be a Danish architecture instructor, teaching at a Virginia university. He brought forth a bottle of blueberry juice to share along with the sandwiches and grapes I provided.

We had a nice meal and visited over a broad range of topics here where a stream of friendship had indeed burst forth in the desert.

'Lassie' a fine family film

Jonathan Mason and a collie star in "Lassie," a handsome adaptation of Eric Knight's original novel, "Lassie Come Home," about an impoverished Yorkshire mining family in World War II that reluctantly sells its beloved dog to a rich nobleman (Peter O'Toole) who takes the dog to Scotland where the collie escapes and attempts the impossibly long trek back home.

Writer-director Charles Sturridge has assembled a fine, mostly English cast. The scenic vistas are breathtaking and the story appealing, making this fine family viewing, though discerning adults may be bothered by a disjointed narrative, some plot turns that defy credulity, and an awkwardness in both script and direction that places it several notches below the classic 1943 MGM version.

A brief sequence of Lassie being beaten with a belt, a non-graphic scene where the miners urinate to throw some hunting dogs off the scent of an escaping fox, some mildly crass language, some mild violence and the death of a dog. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-I -- general patronage. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG -- parental guidance suggested. Some material may not be suitable for children.

New book series aims to educate adult Catholics in the faith

SAN FRANCISCO (CNS)—Ignatius Press and Ave Maria University have co-published a parish-level adult faith formation series designed to help Catholics learn more about their faith or relearn aspects they do not understand well.

The series, Catholic Faith Explorers, currently covers seven topics and there are plans to add others. Each topic — the Mass, Scripture, baptism, confession, Mary, the role of laity in the church, and church authority — is developed in participant workbooks presenting church teaching in everyday language and explaining how it applies to modern life.

The workbooks contain references for more in-depth study and lists of recommended resources and Web sites for further information. The leaders' guides contain suggestions for presentations and PowerPoint materials that can be reproduced.

Books can be used individually or in a parish group setting or as part of the parish's RCIA program.

Diane Eriksen, the series editor, said that in most Catholic parishes in the United States, adult faith formation has often focused on specific sacramental formation.

"But adult Catholics, many for the first time, also want clearer understanding on other aspects of their faith," she said.

"This program is not like a class at all. It's more a primer on knowing the faith and being better able to explain and discuss it with others," she added.

The series is a response to the U.S. bishops' call for active adult faith formation at the parish level.

and a researcher for the University of Michigan Health System, also has tested her theory to include such stressful situations as Hurricane Katrina and the Kosovo war in the Balkans as examples of communal stress, and open-heart surgery as an example of individual stress.

Because about 90 percent of the people interviewed for an earlier study professed belief in some strain of Christianity or Judaism, there was no basis for comparison as to whether adherents to one faith fared better than members of another religion, Ai said.

"The 9/11 and Kosovar studies suggest the similar effect of different faiths," she added.

Ai's reports on post-Sept. 11 trauma were titled "Prayers, Spiritual Support and Positive Attitudes in Coping With the Sept. 11 National Crisis" and "Hope, Meaning and Growth Following the Sept. 11, 2001, Terrorist Attacks."

The former study, published in 2005, found "a linkage of spiritual support and positive attitudes mediated the effect of faith-based and secular factors on post-Sept. 11 distress," and that "higher levels of initial negative emotional response were associated with the use of prayer for coping, which was, in turn, related to less distress."

The study surveyed 453 graduate and undergraduate students three months after the attacks.

In "Hope, Meaning and Growth," also published last year, a survey of 457 students three months after the attacks "found the increase of seven character strengths that encompass the so-called theological virtues, including hope and spirituality, in Americans," and cited "lower levels of symptoms," presumably negative, that could have been an outgrowth of the attacks. The three theological virtues are commonly referred to as faith, hope and love.

"These findings offer further credence to the study of positive aspects resulting from violence-related trauma and highlight the needs of addressing the nature of traumatic events and" post-traumatic growth, it added, cautioning that "little is known about how they may affect post-Sept. 11, 2001, mental health."

Upcoming collection to benefit priests' retirements received a salary of $50 a month, with no health insurance or retirement benefits.

Fortunately for the young man and his fellow diocesan priests, Cardinal Patrick O'Boyle of Washington instituted a priests' retirement collection several years later.

Thirty-seven years later, when Bishop Curlin came to shepherd the Catholics of western North Carolina, he found a similar situation in the thriving mission territory. One of his first orders of business was to work with Msgr. Mauricio W. West, diocesan vicar general and chancellor, to establish the annual Priests' Retirement and Benefits Collection, to be taken up in the parishes.

Now enjoying his fourth year of retirement, Bishop Curlin lives a quiet yet active life, continuing to serve the faithful of the Diocese of Charlotte and enjoying the leisure time afforded any retiree, thanks in large part to this collection.

Much of his time is spent leading priests' retreats and parish missions throughout the United States. He is also in demand to celebrate weddings, baptisms and funerals, and visits the hospitalized almost daily.

Catholics in the Diocese of Charlotte soon will have the opportunity to show their support for the 26 retired diocesan priests, including Bishop Curlin, who have faithfully served the Diocese of Charlotte for 1,086 years collectively.

The annual Priests' Retirement and Benefits Collection, this year themed "Celebrate Our Past ... Embrace Our Future," will be taken up in every parish the weekend of Sept. 9-10.

"Contributing to the Priests' Retirement and Benefits Collection is a tangible way for Catholics to show their gratitude for the faithful service of our retired diocesan priests," said Barbara Gaddy, associate director of development for the Diocese of Charlotte.

Contributions also help provide for the future retirements of the 79 diocesan priests currently involved in active ministry, as well as the retirement funds of the 49 religious order priests serving in the diocese.

"This program is in place so that when our recently ordained priests retire, there will be funds available to help support them," said Gaddy.

The campaign's goal is to collect $1,247,822 — $863,615 to fund the diocesan priests' retirement and benefits plans; $356,507 to support the retirement funds of religious order priests currently serving in our diocese; and $27,700 to cover campaign expenses.

Each parish is assessed 3.5 percent of its annual offertory collection to raise funds needed to support the Priests'

Retirement and Benefits Collection. In most parishes, that amount is slightly less than two times the regular Sunday offertory.

Proportionate contributions on the weekend of Sept. 9-10 will help parishes pay the assessment.

"I would hope that the people of God of the diocese would recognize that these men have been serving faithfully for so many years," said Bishop Curlin. "Now is an opportunity for the faithful to provide loving care and service for them."

Catholicism in color Changes to enhance look, feel of newspaper

By now, you may have noticed something different about this issue of The Catholic News & Herald.

Perhaps it arrived in your mailbox a bit quicker this week. If so, that was intentional and not a result of the winds drummed up by Ernesto.

And perhaps it seems a bit more colorful and, dare I say, even a bit more vibrant and cheery.

This is because we now are harnessing all the technology at our disposal. In other words, while playing online mah jong, we accidentally pressed a button on the computer we didn't notice before.

As such, we are able to bring you The Catholic News & Herald with more color — like, a whole bunch of it!

Actually, we have contracted with a new printing house and mailing service, in the hopes of enhancing the newspaper's appearance and delivery.

The process to brighten the diocesan newspaper with more color came about during an in-depth analysis of the newspaper by some of the diocese's most noted scholars — specifically, my mother's card-playing group.

It went exactly like this:

"Did you notice what a fine job my son, the editor, is doing at The Catholic News & Herald?" asked my mother. "Janet, give me your eights."

"Indeed. But the newspaper is so gray. Couldn't that editor son of yours jazz it up a bit?" replied Mary, reviewing her cards. "And go fish."

"Of course he can!" proclaimed my mother, drawing a card from the deck. "My son, the editor, can do anything! You'll see! And, Martha, do you really need to smoke that thing in here?"

Actually, I have no idea if the conversation went that way, as no man is allowed — for his own good — within 30 yards of the ladies' card games.

But allegedly Mary's daughter, Becky, who's best friends with Claire, said she overheard her sister Annette talking to Cadence — who's dating that dreamy football player at Charlotte Catholic — who, while sneaking a Dr. Pepper from the fridge, overheard her mom say during the card game that it would have been nice to see a color photo of their parish picnic in the last issue while also telling Janet to "go fish."

Clearly, we take suggestions such as this very seriously at The Catholic News & Herald.

And so do many other newspapers, many of which are offering more color within their pages.

The reason? There are quite a few, excellently summarized on Wikipedia.com:

"Newspapers have been mostly

Murray's Musings

KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

printed on off-white paper known as newsprint. Since the 1980s, the newspaper industry has largely moved away from lower-quality letterpress printing to higher-quality, four-color process, offset printing.

"In addition, desktop computers, word-processing software, graphics software, digital cameras and digital prepress and typesetting technologies have revolutionized the newspaper production process.

"These technologies have enabled newspapers to publish color photographs and graphics, as well as innovative layouts and better design."

My staff and I have puzzled over the above information for weeks and we still don't have a clue as to what any of it means. But the importance of color is evident in other aspects of our lives.

Color is one of the first things you notice when you walk into a room, according to painting giant Sherwin-Williams, and the use of color is one of the most important decorating decisions.

So it would reason that color should be important in newspaper design, as it would be one of the first things you notice when you flip through the pages.

Like a moth to the flame, color will draw your eyes to the photos and ads, keeping you suspended as you oooh and aaah over the reds, the blues, the greens.

We're so color-happy around here that we've begun wearing colors that are completely no good for our skin tones or body types, just because we can.

Tom, for example, is wearing orange argyle socks. You should see them.

And this exuberance is spreading throughout the diocese. Catholic school uniforms are going pastel. The diocesan Pastoral Center will be adorned with a giant mural. The chancery is experimenting with polka dots.

We're very excited about these changes and we hope you are, too. We at The Catholic News & Herald will continue to harness all that is available while bringing you inspiring and informative news about your diocese and the Catholic Church, only now in more color — like, a whole bunch of it.

That is, at least, until my mother's card playing buddies suggest otherwise.

The preconceived notion

Facts, prejudices and clichés abound in news stories

The other day I was a "wallpaper quote."

A wallpaper quote comes from an otherwise anonymous member of the public. Wallpaper quotes appear in print and broadcast stories where they usually give legitimacy to the central theme of a story.

You see wallpaper quotes in TV stories when a person speaking, the "man on the street," isn't named with an on-screen identifier. To qualify as a wallpaper quote, all you need is a warm body and a voice.

Out of the blue, a reporter called me the other day. As I am spokesman for the Diocese of Charlotte, I field a lot of calls from reporters. But this call came because recently I had written a note to a columnist who answers questions about traffic and road conditions.

My phone number was on the e-mail and the enterprising reporter on the other end of the line apparently looks over the shoulder of the columnist.

She was very professional and polite. Her story was about a recent press conference in which the State of North Carolina announced it was starting a program called "Swat-a-Litterbug."

Basically, the state is encouraging people to report litterbugs who dump trash from their cars by e-mailing the license plate number of the offending driver.

The reporter explained that offenders would be sent a letter by the State gently reminding them not to litter. Along with the letter comes a plastic bag for garbage or an ashtray. What, she wondered, did I think about that?

I thought this was my chance to give a gem of a quote that would lift her story to Pulitzer Prize level.

"Do you mean the state is giving out ash trays to people who flick their cigarette butts from a moving car? Wow, decorating my home is never going to be easier."

No response, but I could tell that she hadn't clicked with my attempt at humor. She went on to explain some other aspects of the program. This was a clear signal that I hadn't registered on her quote-meter.

I tried again: "Now let me see if I

Catholics & the Media

DAVID HAINS
DIRECTOR OF COMMUNICATIONS

got this right. If I'm caught littering, the State is going to encourage me to take on the smelly, and perhaps deadly, habit of smoking by offering me, free of charge, a keepsake ashtray?"

Once again, I could hear that she wasn't tapping on her keyboard — the print reporter's equivalent of the silent treatment.

By now my quote bank was just about empty. But I gave it one last try. And before you could type "jackrabbit," she was gone.

This is what appeared in the newspaper the next day.

"Residents say they like the idea. 'It gives you the opportunity to do something about it,' said David Hains, who lives in Huntersville. 'Now, you can say, hey, I can report these people.'"

Pretty boring, eh?

Wallpaper quotes are usually bland and predictable. But the bigger picture is that reporters, even well meaning reporters like the one I spoke with, often have preconceived ideas of what they want in a news story — it is true when they report on something as innocuous as the Swat-a-Litterbug campaign, or as earth-shattering as a hurricane.

We need to remember when we read and watch the news that, in addition to seeing the verifiable facts of a story, we are dealing with the preconceived notions, prejudices and clichés of the individual who gathered the information.

David Hains is director of communications for the Diocese of Charlotte. Contact him at dwhains@charlottediocese.org. Podcasts of these columns are available at www.charlottediocese.org.

Ora et Labora

Part 3 of a 7-part series on the second annual Eucharistic Congress

So far, we have recalled the memorable and monumental events of our first Eucharistic Congress, followed by an introduction to the theme of this year's Eucharistic Congress, "The Love of Christ Impels Us."

The love of Christ motivates and inspires every zealous missionary effort in the life of the Catholic Church. But what about the missionary effort of the Congress itself?

There are two basic avenues in which all of us can get involved in the preparation and the execution of our second Eucharistic Congress, which will be held Oct. 6-7 at the Charlotte Convention Center.

The first and most fundamental avenue is that of prayer. Prayer fuels and inspires all the charitable works of the church; increases our faith, hope and charity; and directs us to greater love of God and our neighbor. Therefore, the first and most important ongoing work of the Congress is to pray for its fruitful completion.

To accomplish this task, we are encouraged to pray the Prayer for the Success of the Eucharistic Congress, listed at right, also found in the Raccolta.

Our prayer enkindles our hearts and impels us toward charitable works, leading us to the second avenue in which we can get involved in the Congress: service.

Innumerable volunteers and workers gave of themselves to bring our first Eucharistic Congress to a successful completion. Likewise, this year we need the assistance of hundreds of volunteers who are willing to donate their time and energy, their talents and gifts, to serve Christ and his church during this grace-filled two-day event.

Prayer and service, "ora et labora," are the two avenues traveled most by those who are impelled by the love of Christ. If you are willing to help in these two areas, please visit our Eucharistic Congress Web site (www.goeucharist.com) and fill out a volunteer form, either for work during these two days or to commit yourself to keeping watch with our Lord by signing up online for an hour of adoration of the Blessed Sacrament.

Jesus excludes no one from his loving embrace, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY -- Jesus excludes no one from his loving embrace because he came especially to save sinners and social outcasts, Pope Benedict XVI said.

The good news of the Gospels consists precisely in Jesus' message that God offers his grace above all to those who seem furthest from being holy, the pope said Aug. 30 at his weekly general audience, continuing his series of audience talks about the apostles with a reflection on the life and Gospel of St. Matthew.

Matthew was a tax collector for the Roman occupiers in Israel and, therefore, like all the tax collectors at the time, was much hated by his fellow Jews, who considered him to be a public sinner.

But Jesus invited Matthew and other marginalized people to "follow me" and even invited them to eat with him.

To those who were scandalized by Jesus associating with the community's outcasts, the pope quoted Jesus as saying: "Those who are well don't need a physician, but the sick do. I did not come to call the righteous, but sinners."

"Jesus excludes no one from his friendship," said the pope. Rather, he makes a special invitation to those who have humbly acknowledged their sins and are willing to leave their old ways of life behind for a new life with Christ, Pope Benedict said.

St. Matthew, the pope said, shows that the person who seems furthest from being holy can become the first to enter the kingdom of heaven and act as an example of God's welcoming mercy.

Matthew did not hesitate to answer Jesus' call even though it meant leaving everything behind, especially his job — an occupation that had been his one sure source of income, but which was also often unjust and dishonest work, said the pope.

"Matthew understood that knowing Jesus would not allow him to continue an activity God disapproved of," he said.

"Even today it is not admissible to be attached to things that are incompatible with following Jesus, such as is the case with dishonest wealth," he said.

Just as Matthew decided to leave behind an immoral livelihood in order to follow Christ, the pope said all people are called to remove themselves from "a situation of sin" so as to embark on a new way of life and "follow Jesus completely."

A sacrament for single people?

Q. I am an older woman, baptized at birth, always a practicing Catholic. I've had huge personal responsibilities, but have never married.

The focus of the Catholic Church is mostly on marriage and families. I understand that; they form the majority of the congregations. Recently a priest in his homily referred to the sacraments of marriage and holy orders, but said there is no sacrament for single people. I don't know how to interpret that statement.

Fortunately, I believe God's love extends to every human being. That keeps me coming to Mass. But did I miss something? Do I belong in a Catholic church? (Iowa)

A. I'm somewhat surprised at the priest's remark. There is a sacrament for single people, the first and most important sacrament for any Christian. It is baptism.

Married people, priests, men and women in religious communities receive sacraments or vocations that are particular ways of living out their baptism. But single people have the same vocation to follow Christ, and extend his love, and the love of our heavenly Father, into the world.

Through the sacraments of initiation -- baptism, confirmation and the Eucharist -- every Catholic, of whatever rank or calling, is invited ultimately by our Lord to the same responsibility of responding to God's love by loving service to others.

St. Augustine put it well in one of his sermons, "With you I am a Christian, for you I am a bishop". The basic Christian call is the same for all of us, whether married, ordained, religious or single.

By far most of the single people I know are inspiring examples of this kind of self-giving. I hope, and have the feeling, you are trying to live this Christian vocation in your life. It's the main one we have.

'Hell' in Apostles Creed

Q. I have a question about "hell" in the Apostles Creed. A clergyman recently gave a different answer than the one I was taught.

The creed says Jesus "descended into hell." According to the minister, his time in hell was part of the suffering Jesus endured for our sins. What does this part of the creed mean? (Arkansas)

A. The belief of Catholics and most other Christians is that the redemptive suffering of Jesus ended at the moment of his death. There was no extension of his passion in whatever happened after

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

he died.

The word "hell" in the creed does not stand for the "hell of the damned," its usual meaning in current English. It comes from an old Teutonic word "hela," which meant a hidden or dark place. In early English literature it was used to describe any kind of dungeon or pit.

Our word is an English translation of a Latin (and Greek and Hebrew) term for the lower, or infernal, regions, a place people went after death, with no necessary connotation of reward or punishment.

The presence of "hell" in the creed is misleading but has been traditional for so long it hardly will be changed now.

A free brochure on ecumenism, including questions on intercommunion and other ways of sharing worship, is available by sending a stamped, self-addressed envelope to Father John Dietzen, Box 5515, Peoria, IL 61612.

CHILDREN'S TRACK – "Eucharist – Food for Our Souls"

The Children's Track program at the Eucharistic Congress focuses on the source and summit of Catholic life — the Eucharist — from a child's point of view.

Through a variety of dynamic and fun-filled activities at the Eucharistic Congress, children will discover how the Eucharist can influence their lives. Children will also hear a special talk on the Eucharist during a special adoration session.

Children's Track Registration

Registration for the children's track at the Eucharistic Congress IS REQUIRED and SPACE IS LIMITED. To register, go to www.GoEucharist.com and fill out the Children's Track Registration form. Or fill out the form below and mail it to:

Revival of the Spirit

Two men are visibly moved by the preaching of revivalist Father Tony Ricard at the Revival of the Spirit at Our Lady of Consolation Church Aug. 27. Father Ricard spoke about the influence of the devil in people's lives and how to overcome it.

Priest reveals ways to beat devil, evil

CHARLOTTE — Father Tony Ricard has seen the work of the devil first-hand.

As pastor of two churches in New Orleans, he witnessed the devastation of Hurricane Katrina. On Aug. 28, Father Ricard and hundreds of thousands of New Orleanians fled the city as the category 3 storm bore down on the Gulf Coast.

Father Ricard returned 77 days later to find his churches, rectory and school damaged by rain, wind and flood waters.

The Archdiocese of New Orleans closed one of his parishes, St. Philip the Apostle Church. But Father Ricard refused to let the devil win. On Christmas Day, he celebrated Mass at Our Lady Star of the Sea Church for the first time since August.

Father Ricard refused to give up and give in to the devil, and he told his audience at Our Lady of Consolation Church they must do the same.

"You can't let the devil steal your joy," said Father Ricard. "There is no sin that

A BOX OF MIRACLES

Msgr. Paul Showalter, vicar general of the Diocese of Peoria, Ill., applies melted sealing wax in late July to ribbon on a package containing two folders documenting an alleged miracle attributed to the intercession of the late Archbishop Fulton J. Sheen, the famed radio and television host and author.

Two cases of alleged miracles claim intercession of Archbishop Sheen

PEORIA, ILL. (CNS) — Documentation of two alleged miracles attributed to the intercession of the late Archbishop Fulton J. Sheen were sent to Rome this summer as part of the promotion of his sainthood cause.

The cases claiming the archbishop's intercession involve a woman from Champaign and a baby in Pittsburgh.

The cases were investigated and documented and, following ceremonies in Peoria and Pittsburgh, documentation was sealed and prepared for delivery to the Vatican Congregation for Saints' Causes for further study.

The ceremony in Peoria was witnessed by several members of the Sheen family and officials promoting the sainthood cause. During the ceremony, folders containing more than 500 pages of witness testimony and medical data regarding the Champaign case were packaged and sealed.

The documents tell the story of the recovery of Therese Kearney, a member of Holy Cross Church in Champaign, who suffered a tear in her main pulmonary artery during surgery in December 1999. When her husband, Frank, was told there was little chance for his wife's survival, he prayed to Archbishop Sheen, whom he had long admired.

Kearney, then in her early 70s, survived, but died just five days before the Peoria ceremony. Her husband, who first shared his wife's story with those promoting Archbishop Sheen's cause, died in February.

Msgr. Richard Soseman, whom Peoria Bishop Daniel R. Jenky appointed as delegate to the archbishop's sainthood cause, said Kearney's death at age 79, more than six years after the alleged miracle, will not impact the case.

Archbishop Sheen, a native of El Paso in the Diocese of Peoria, gained worldwide fame as a radio and television host and author. He died Oct. 3, 1979. The Diocese of Peoria officially launched his cause for canonization in September 2003.

Andrea Ambrosi, postulator for the archbishop's sainthood cause, traveled to Peoria to oversee the ceremonies and planned to hand-deliver the files to the Vatican congregation.

Ambrosi attended a similar ceremony in Pittsburgh with diocesan officials and documents surrounding the claim of a miraculous healing of a gravely ill Pittsburgh infant who recovered after his parents prayed for Archbishop Sheen's intercession.

Ambrosi said the child's disease and recovery were supported by the main physicians involved in his case and all of them "recognized that a force superior to their medical science intervened for his recovery."

After beatification, in most cases at least one more miracle must be investigated and confirmed as having occurred before the person can be canonized and referred to as a saint.

Cardinal: Failure to pass immigration fixes cannot be allowed

Rallies call for comprehensive reform

LOS ANGELES (CNS) — Los Angeles Cardinal Roger M. Mahony kicked off a week of immigration-related rallies nationwide with Labor Day letters to President George W. Bush and congressional leaders, urging them to push for comprehensive reform legislation and not let it become mired in partisan politics.

"Failure to enact comprehensive and fair immigration reform will simply continue the inequality of those living and working in our country for the benefit of all of us," said Cardinal Mahony in the Sept. 4 letter to Bush. "We simply cannot allow that to happen."

In a Labor Day homily preceding an immigrant-rights rally, the cardinal blamed Congress for adding to confusion about immigration and warned members of Congress that they "do not have the right or luxury to let four weeks go by and refuse to deal with immigration reform."

Congress returned to work after Labor Day for a brief session before planned adjournment in October, to allow campaigning prior to November's general election.

The event in Los Angeles was one of many held around the country during the Labor Day weekend. In Chicago, several thousand people joined a rally to end a four-day, 45-mile protest march through various points around the city.

People from throughout the mid-Atlantic were expected to gather in Washington Sept. 7 for a march and rally to urge Congress to pass a legalization program.

Although they didn't draw crowds as large as for a series of rallies in the spring, weekend rallies also were held in Miami, St. Paul, Minn., Trenton, N.J., Portland, Ore., and Milwaukee.

Vatican to discontinue annual Christmas concert

Controversial musicians at heart of decision

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — After a 13-year run, the annual Christmas concert at the Vatican will not be continued.

The Vatican did not say who made the decision, which was reported by Italian media Aug. 31. In recent years some church officials have viewed the concert as a distraction because of minor controversies involving performers.

Last year, church officials dropped Brazilian pop singer Daniela Mercury because they feared she would use the concert to promote the use of condoms as an anti-AIDS measure. Those who did perform were disappointed that Pope Benedict XVI did not make time for the traditional papal audience with the artists.

The annual event was taped in the Vatican audience hall in early December and rebroadcast on Christmas Eve. It always drew a sellout crowd of about 6,000 people, including many cardinals, bishops and Vatican officials.

The concert was an initiative of the Diocese of Rome, which used proceeds to help build new churches in the city. Pope John Paul II made it a point to greet the artists, lending publicity to the event.

Over the years, Pope John Paul II chatted with artists like Jose Feliciano, Whitney Houston, Dionne Warwick, Gloria Gaynor and the late John Denver. B.B. King, who performed "Merry Christmas Baby," gave the pontiff one of his electric guitars.

In 2003, U.S. pop singer Lauryn Hill stunned the concert audience when she asked church leaders to "repent." Vatican Radio termed the outburst a "sour note" to an otherwise enjoyable show.

Americas will meet Sept. 11 at 7 p.m. in Our Lady's Cottage at Our Lady of Grace Church, 2205 West Market St. Any questions can be directed to Lawrence Kirwan at (336) 292-2776.

Pope says visit to Germany to be personal, chance to thank people

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI's September pilgrimage to southern Germany features 14 liturgies or religious encounters and only three public secular events.

That fact alone says a lot about the pope's homecoming visit and about his entire papacy to date.

From Sept. 9 to 14, the 79-year-old pontiff will return to his Bavarian roots, stopping in Markt am Inn where he was born, in Altötting where he used to pray at a local shrine, in Regensburg where he taught and in Munich where he was a bishop.

Along the way, he will preside over a string of public Masses, prayer services, processions and blessings. The visit is predominantly personal and religious, and the pope explained why in a recent interview with German TV and radio.

"I want to see again the places where I grew up, the people who touched and shaped my life. I want to thank these people," the pope said.

Naturally, the pope added, he also wants to express a message that goes beyond his native state of Bavaria. But when asked what the themes or issues would be, the pope said he hadn't really chosen any — it would be the liturgy that would suggest them.

"The basic theme is that we have to rediscover God, not just any God, but the God that has a human face, because when we see Jesus Christ we see God," he said.

Starting from that awareness, he said, people find a way to meet each other in the family, among generations and among cultures. The path to peaceful coexistence in today's world is essential, he said, but "we won't find it if we don't receive light from above."

The pope said he wanted to correct a widespread public opinion that Christianity is "a collection of prohibitions." The faith is above all a positive spiritual invitation, and that's the point he wants to get across, he said.

From his own words, then, it would appear the pope is going not to chastise his native culture but to awaken it.

Popemobile used in 1982 sells for $70,000 at Scottish auction

LONDON (CNS) — An armored popemobile used by Pope John Paul II during his 1982 visit to Great Britain has been sold at an auction for 37,000 pounds (US$70,000).

The converted bulletproof British Leyland vehicle, which had just more than 11,000 miles on the clock, was sold Sept. 2 in Dumfries, Scotland.

The popemobile was one of more than 2,000 items from the town's Albion truck museum, founded by local resident Mick Hayton. He bought the vehicle in 1998 for his museum, which has now closed.

A spokeswoman for the auction house Thomson Roddick & Medcalf told reporters Sept. 2 that no details of the buyer were available but added that interest had been "overwhelming," with inquiries coming from around the world.

CHARLOTTE — Our Lady of Consolation Church will be able to improve the quality of life for many of its parishioners, thanks to the Foundation for the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte.

Jim Kelley, director of diocesan development, presented two checks to Franciscan Father Jude Duffy, pastor of Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte, and Sandra Murdock, director of the African American Affairs Ministry, Aug. 27.

One grant, for $4,000, will be used to provide a spiritually-based economic development series of workshops. The second grant, for $1,865, will be used to support the Kabaka Dancers and Drummers.

The Kabaka Dancers and Drummers perform a traditional West African style of dancing and drumming as a way to preserve West African culture. Their presentations, given throughout the Carolinas, educate people of all races and cultures about African heritage.

The Foundation for the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte has more than 140 endowments, all but three of which have been established for specific parishes, schools and agencies. The three general endowments provide income to fund grants such as those presented to Our Lady of Consolation Church.

The ministry for the diocesan development office takes its development staff to visit more than 50 churches and schools each year.

"Our funding will assist you in doing your good work," said Kelley to the congregation at Our Lady of Consolation Church. "May God bless your efforts and may God bless each of you here today."

Priest reveals ways to beat devil at annual revival

God is not willing to pull you out of ... that is unforgivable, except rejecting the Holy Spirit."

Even in the midst of despair and destruction, people can find true joy and peace, he said.

Father Ricard was the preacher for "Revival of the Spirit 2006" at Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte Aug. 25-27. The annual event is sponsored by the diocesan African American Affairs Ministry.

The revival, this year themed "Who Invited the Devil?", was designed to be reminiscent of the early days of outdoor preaching and was an opportunity to worship publicly in the spirit of the black church.

In addition to his pastorate of Our Lady Star of the Sea Church, Father Ricard, who first preached at the revival in Charlotte in 2002, is the director of Knight Time

THE DIOCESAN AFRICAN AMERICAN AFFAIRS MINISTRY:

— makes recommendations to the bishop regarding the needs, hopes and concerns of African Americans;

— articulates the needs of the African-American community to diocesan agencies, schools and organizations and assists them in the planning, coordination and implementation of programs and activities that involve the African-American community.

Ministries; serves as an administrator, campus minister and religion teacher for the MAX Satellite School of New Orleans; and has spoken across the United States and in 13 other countries.

"The Revival of the Spirit continues to be a method of bringing people from all over the Diocese of Charlotte together to hear the 'Good News,'" said Sandra Murdock, director of the diocesan African American Affairs Ministry.

"It is a time of renewal for those who attend, as our revivalist always presents us with ways to enhance our spiritual growth and view different perspectives of the various teachings of the church," she continued.

The battle for power

"There is a power that will draw us away from all that God offers," said Father Ricard. "Until we acknowledge that there are evil forces in this world, we can't overcome them."

"Once you recognize that there is an ultimate evil in the world, you then know there must be an ultimate good ... that God exists," Father Ricard said.

What should a person do to overcome evil?

"Pray, pray and pray some more," Father Ricard said. "Continue to ask God repeatedly for the strength to make it through the day."

It is possible for the entire world to reject the power of evil and to choose to live for the ultimate good — God, he said.

Father Ricard said he does not think the people of the world will ever defeat evil. However, he does believe the day will come when the good will win out.

"That will be the day when the kingdom of heaven is ushered in," Father Ricard said. "I don't think we are destined to have a day when everything is great — that's why we have a heaven."

Fiesta and faith

COURTESY PHOTO

Father Carmen Malacari, pastor of Holy Spirit Church in Denver, is pictured Aug. 4 with participants of the parish's Vacation Bible School, themed "Fiesta, where kids are filled with Jesus."

More than 80 children and 30 teen and adult volunteers participated in the July 31-Aug. 4 event, which featured Bible stories, crafts, games and songs.

The children also took part in a collection to benefit the East Lincoln Pregnancy Counseling Center. Parishioners donated diapers, bottles and other baby items.

The 50 new kindergarten students and their parents were invited for "popsicles on the playground" as a fun way to meet and greet each other and their teachers before school started Aug. 28. Emma Akerman is in the kindergarten class.

Week of work and faith

Parishioners of St. Charles Borromeo Church in Morganton, including youth minister Denise Hussey (far left), are pictured in the parish's Murray Hall Aug. 9. The youths and adult leaders are participants in the parish's workcamp, inspired by the Orlando, Fla.-based Catholic Heart Workcamp that provides teens with a week of faith-powered community mission work.

The Aug. 7-13 parish workcamp, organized by Hussey, involved extensive yard work around the church; cleaning the inside of the church; praying the rosary and teachings on the rosary led by Father Kenneth Whittington, pastor; and afternoon chores at a local hospice facility.

A number of youth groups from parishes around the Diocese of Charlotte participated in Catholic Heart Workcamps around the country.

Healing continues for families after Sept. 11

Gene Yancey.

LaBorie was a flight attendant on United Airlines Flight 175, the second airliner to hit the World Trade Center Sept. 11, 2001. She was one of 56 people, including five hijackers, who died aboard the Boeing jet that morning.

"I just could not believe what was happening," said Flo Yancey. "It was surreal. It still is to me."

In the past five years, the Yanceys have drawn strength from their Catholic faith and the help of those around them.

"I don't think I could be where I am today if it wasn't for my faith," said Flo Yancey. "I know (Kathryn) is safe now."

Holy Apostles Church, as well as the community at large, was there in the Yanceys' time of need. Father Paul Wicker, pastor, visited with the Yanceys every day for a week after the terrorist attacks.

People offered prayers, condolences and assistance where they could.

Holy Apostles Church held a memorial Mass for LaBorie in late September 2001. The Yanceys also attended various memorial events that first year, including one at ground zero.

The first year was a flurry of activity, but the family has not heard much from the airline or government since, Flo Yancey said. The couple also expressed frustration in how the world situation has progressed since Sept. 11.

"I'm sad that after five years there doesn't seem to be any resolution. (Osama) bin Laden still has not been found," she said.

Her husband added that he was distressed by "lives we're losing every day in Iraq and Afghanistan."

Fighting back

In St. Paul, Minn., Tom Burnett Sr. and his wife also draw strength from their faith and the courage of their son, Tom Burnett Jr., who died aboard United Airlines Flight 93 in Shanksville, Pa., Sept. 11.

Their son was one of the passengers who led a revolt that brought down the hijacked plane.

The Burnetts say they feel their son's absence every day.

The father noted that amid his loss he doesn't like the word "closure" because he will never be able — and does not want — to put his son behind him. But the intense pain that he once felt has softened a bit over time.

"Things have changed," he added. "Our sorrow, our grieving have taken several twists and turns, and it's come to the point where I look at things a bit differently than I used to."

The couple, who attend St. Dominic Church in Northfield, said that during the past five years they have prayed more than ever. Beverly Burnett, 74, said she refuses to believe that God had a hand in her son's death.

"God did not kill our son," she said emphatically. "The terrorists did."

They also take comfort in the belief that their son is in heaven. They planned to visit the crash site in Shanksville this Sept. 11 for a memorial service, as they have done every year since their son's death.

The story of Tom Burnett Jr. lives on in the book "Fighting Back," written by his wife, Deena Burnett, and a Minneapolis public relations specialist, Anthony Giombetti.

Deena Burnett, who became a Catholic after she married, said her faith played a major part in helping her to cope with his death. She said she spent many hours in church praying for strength and came to understand that "God is a God of love instead of one of retribution and condemnation," which kept her from "becoming angry after Tom's death."

The book's title refers to how she "fought back to find purpose and joy" in her life again. Simply by writing it, she said she was able to take stock of her blessings.

"I knew I had lost Tom, and it was incredibly heart-wrenching," Deena Burnett said. "But what I had left were three beautiful children."

"And more than that, I had the support and gratitude of a nation. I had an incredible network of friends and family. I had the comfort and peace that God intends for us," she said.

Contributing to this story was Julie Carroll in St. Paul.

Remembering a martyr

Polish POW recalls encounter with saint, daring escape

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

Editor's note: This article contains descriptions of war and imprisonment.

MURPHY — "Reflecting on Maximilian Kolbe in the presence of Joe is like writing the Scriptures in the presence of God," Father George Kloster said.

Father Kloster is pastor of Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in Hayesville and St. William Church in Murphy, where Joseph Waclawski and his wife, Irene, are parishioners.

The Waclawskis live near Murphy in a home with a view of green hills.

Sixty-five years ago, though, Joseph Waclawski's view was limited to Auschwitz's drab concentration-camp gray. A Polish army lieutenant, he had been arrested by the Gestapo in March 1940 and sent to Auschwitz in May 1941.

"My daily routine of very hard menial labor, the inhumane treatment together with the unheard-of living conditions that left me numb to the environment," he wrote in 1991 in a memoir. "What was left of my energy was directed to the thought of survival."

"But during these particular days I was shaken and stunned by the courage and selfless brotherly love of inmate No. 16670 from our block (barrack)," he said. "At the time I did not know, but I was told by other inmates that the special person was Franciszek Gajowniczek, a Polish army sergeant, the man moaned, 'Oh, God! What will happen to my wife and children?'"

"At this moment, inmate No. 16670 stepped forward and said in a clear voice that he wanted to take the other man's place. The Lagerfuehrer stopped for a second, looked at the man who was willing to give his life for another and asked him if he knew what he was doing. 'Yes, sir,' was the short answer. 'Inmate No. 16670 remained in front and the man he saved was ordered to step back,'" Waclawski said.

The 10 condemned prisoners were locked in the bunker to starve to death. Most died within a few days, but Father Kolbe lived for about two weeks. He was finally killed when a block elder in the camp hospital injected him with carbolic acid on Aug. 14, the feast of the Assumption of Mary.

By the end of the war, Waclawski had been in two other concentration camps: Mauthausen, July to October 1942; and Sachsenhausen, October 1942 to early 1945.

Four months before the war ended, Waclawski was assigned to a "bauzig," a sort of railroad concentration camp, whose inmates repaired rail and electrical lines.

Waclawski's bauzig was working in the Austrian Alps shortly before the war ended in May 1945.

"I escaped at the top of a mountain," Waclawski said. "I walked through Austria, more than 100 miles. I was free."

He made it to Italy, where he met and married his wife, Irene, who is also from Poland. She was not interned in the camps, but some of her uncles died in Auschwitz.

The Waclawskis moved to England; Joseph studied chemistry. They immigrated to Detroit, where he worked for a paint company. For years, Joseph Waclawski never spoke of what had happened to him. He wanted to erase it from his mind, but he couldn't forget.

Eventually the Waclawskis retired and moved to Port Charlotte, Fla. On Aug. 14, 1991, the 50th anniversary of St. Maximilian Kolbe's death, ground was broken for St. Maximilian Kolbe Church there.

Waclawski wrote his account, printed on the program for the groundbreaking, of a man offering his life for another.

"It is probably the most difficult of all the commandments to live," Father Kloster said during the Mass on Aug. 14. "We have within ourselves that sense of self-preservation."

Soldiers going into battle hope that they'll survive.

"To willingly give up our lives and to do it so intentionally — in this situation, when (Father Kolbe) made that decision so intentionally, he knew he was giving his life," Father Kloster said.

bar. Jesus becomes the standard for how we should live our lives," said Father Kloster.

One day in August 1941, Auschwitz inmates were told that a prisoner in Waclawski's cellblock had escaped.

"After an unsuccessful search by the SS-men, the inmates from the other blocks were dismissed and our block remained standing in the rain while further checking and searching went on," Waclawski wrote.

"We stood wet, hungry and half dead until morning," he continued. "The roll call was taken again and all other inmates were ordered to proceed to their work and our block remained standing in files 5-men deep."

"The 'Lagerfuehrer' (camp commandant) announced that since one man was missing, 10 inmates would be chosen as hostages and placed without water or food in the 'bunker' (isolation cells underground) until the missing prisoner was found dead or alive."

Waclawski has forgotten nothing of those moments when his life hung in the balance: "I can still see the Lagerfuehrer with his index finger up and slowly moving down to point to the inmates selected by him. It was a death verdict."

"As he walked in front of us, he looked at each one of us. We were dying a thousand deaths at this moment. As he passed, we were as if reborn and a glimmer of hope lightly touched our souls," Waclawski said.

"God Almighty in his mercy saved us and just maybe we could come out alive from this nightmare. In terror we looked at the selected victims who were ordered to step forward," he said.

Grateful to be spared, Waclawski was even more overwhelmed by what happened next. As the Lagerfuehrer pointed to Franciszek Gajowniczek, a Polish army sergeant, the man moaned, "Oh, God! What will happen to my wife and children?"

"At this moment, inmate No. 16670 stepped forward and said in a clear voice that he wanted to take the other man's place. The Lagerfuehrer stopped for a second, looked at the man who was willing to give his life for another and asked him if he knew what he was doing. 'Yes, sir,' was the short answer."

"Inmate No. 16670 remained in front and the man he saved was ordered to step back," Waclawski said.

A roundup of Scripture, readings, films and more

Uniting teachings and Scripture

Diocesan priest authors book on Catholic beliefs, practices

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

FOREST CITY — Father Herbert Burke, pastor of Immaculate Conception Church in Forest City, has written a book that delves into the scriptural aspects of the Catholic faith.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis provides the forward for Father Burke's "A Scriptural Catechism: Expanded Edition." Bishop Jugis also gave the book an imprimatur, or ecclesiastical approval certifying the work is in conformity with Catholic understanding of Scripture.

"As the title of the book suggests, the unique contribution of 'A Scriptural Catechism' is to provide the scriptural basis for the beliefs and practices of the Catholic Church," said Bishop Jugis in his forward.

"It seeks to unite the basic teachings of the church on the Creed, the sacraments, the commandments and prayer, with Scripture quotations, references and practical reasons," said the bishop. "Thus the reader is able to see the harmony between Catholic beliefs and sacred Scripture."

The expanded edition is the fourth edition of the book, which was 14 years in the making.

Father Burke noticed that many people studying for the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (RCIA) were not reading the lengthy class materials.

"We needed something short but thorough that covered the faith. Other books did a good job, but didn't really teach Scripture and the faith," he said.

Father Burke's book combines apologetics and the catechism. Apologetics is the branch of theology having to do with the defense and proofs of Christianity.

"There's not really anything else available on the market that combines both," said Father Burke.

Fully indexed to the "Catechism of the Catholic Church," "A Scriptural Catechism" covers topics including the Mass, the Eucharist and eucharistic adoration, as well as science and relativism, sanctifying grace and why God allows evil.

"I wanted it to be brief but thorough, so that people would be ready and able to defend their faith," said Father Burke.

He wrote the book with four groups in mind.

In addition to those in RCIA, the book is good for youth groups, especially those preparing for confirmation; for those who want a quick review of Catholicism and Scripture; and for college students "so they don't lose their faith," said Father Burke.

"It is also a useful tool for religious educators, priests, religious and all involved in education and evangelization," said Bishop Jugis.

The book has received excellent feedback. The last version sold 17,000 copies in a year and a half.

Both Abbot Placid Solari of Belmont Abbey, who granted the book a nihil obstat (Latin for "nothing stands in the way," a judgment by an official church representative that a book contains no errors of faith or moral teaching), and Bishop Jugis offered "helpful ideas and corrections," said Father Burke.

The expanded edition, he said, features even more information, and a Spanish-language edition is due out within the next six months.

Bishop Jugis said he hopes the book will contribute to the spread of the Gospel and the salvation of souls.

"May it inspire the reader to grow in friendship with Christ, and to share the Lord's love and truth with others," he said.

The book is reaching people near and far. Father Burke noticed his book for sale at the Mary, Queen of the Universe Shrine in Orlando, Fla. It was displayed next to "Understanding the Mystery of the Mass," written by Father Matthew Buettner, pastor of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton.

"Tourists get to see two books written by priests of the Diocese of Charlotte," he said.

Jesus is with us in suffering

BY BEVERLY CORZINE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

I see my friend lying in a bed filled with pillows, surrounded with a web of plastic tubing. The clicks and whirrs of medical machinery fill the otherwise silent hospital room.

Years of suffering have elapsed, but now she is on the cusp of leaving us behind. Once she was a young bride, always a lover of Christ. Now she is a wife, mother and grandmother whose suffering has been horrific but whose faith has never wavered.

The night just passed has been filled with the struggle to breathe. Now the merciful drip flows through the plastic tubing to allow a respite from pain and to let her pass into the welcome realm of blessed sleep.

Standing quietly by her bedside is enough; I do not wish to make a decibel of noise. One of her relatives sits quietly in the corner.

We exchange a familiar wave and nod that means, "I'll tell her you were here when she wakes up."

At that moment my friend opens her eyes. "Beverly," she says. "I thought I was dying last night." Then she closes her eyes and falls asleep again.

During my next visit my friend's husband is the sentinel, sitting quietly in the corner. However, my friend is awake. The three of us share a lighthearted conversation.

The deep love that these two have for each other is palpable in their gentle jokes that skirt the extreme situation that being a long-term resident on the oncology floor presents.

In Mark's Gospel we hear Jesus begin to reveal his identity to his disciples. He confirms that he is the long-awaited Christ, but he must suffer and die.

To help Peter make some sense of this mysterious teaching, Jesus comforts them by saying, "Whoever wishes to come after me must deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me. ... Whoever loses his life for my sake ... will save it."

Leaving, I pass other doors on the oncology floor. I know that this teaching of Jesus is the bedrock of faith for my friend and countless others as they struggle to live or face the end of their lives with the promise of Jesus on their lips.

Vatican awards cinema prize to Chinese filmmaker Zhang Yuan

VENICE, Italy (CNS) — The Vatican awarded its annual cinema prize to Chinese filmmaker Zhang Yuan, saying his movies have depicted people's search for spiritual meaning.

U.S. Archbishop John P. Foley, head of the Pontifical Council for Social Communications, presented the Bresson Prize to Zhang at the Venice Film Festival Sept. 5.

The 43-year-old filmmaker said he was honored and hoped that the award would be "the first building block of a bridge" that connects the cultures of the Vatican and China.

Archbishop Foley said Zhang was chosen because his films showed great sensitivity to "the difficult course that every person must face in the search for the spiritual sense of existence." He said Zhang's work expressed realism and hope.

The archbishop praised his 1999 film, "Seventeen Years," which told the story of a parole visit home by a woman convicted of killing her stepsister and showed the crime's emotional effects on the protagonist and her family.

A more recent film, "Little Red Flowers," was a poetic parable about children, offering lessons about life that are also valid for adults, Archbishop Foley said.

Zhang's films have been censored in China.

The Bresson Prize, named after French director Robert Bresson, was established in 2000 to recognize artists who "give significant witness" in the spiritual meaning of life. The award is organized by the Italian Magazine of Cinematography and the pontifical councils for Culture and for Social Communications.

Rising in the Spirit

COURTESY PHOTO

Members of Y.E.S. (Youth Echoing the Spirit), the youth group at St. John Neumann Church in Charlotte, are pictured after "Family '60s Night," a concert they performed to raise funds for the parish, Aug. 12.

Under the direction of youth minister Irene Kilzer, various members of Y.E.S. researched the fashions and songs of the 1960s, gathered and made era-appropriate costumes, decorated the parish hall, sold tickets and snacks and performed more than 40 songs during the concert. The concert raised $2,500 for the parish. In addition to the concert, the youths have also helped with landscaping around the church.

"I witnessed young people working hard, having a good time and building community," said Connie Milligan, parish director of religious education. "This is every parent's dream — to know that your teen is voluntarily involved in a wholesome Christian environment with others who share their faith and values. This is what church is all about — living our faith."

His melodies prompt memories

Piano student entertains and builds a future toward stardom

BY LEE MCCrackEN
UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE

CHARLOTTE — The elderly residents at The Laurels in Highland Creek delight in 15-year-old Brandon Brown's visits. They comment on how he's grown over the years and what a polite young man he is.

But Brandon doesn't go to the assisted living center to see a grandparent or great-aunt. He's the star attraction one Monday evening a month when he sits at the piano and plays melodies that bring to mind days gone by.

"They always request 'Somewhere My Love,' and they like 'Send in the Clowns' and 'Moonlight Sonata,'" said Brandon. "I always end with a patriotic song — they like to sing along."

Learning jazz, improv

Brandon, a sophomore at Charlotte Catholic High School, is the son of Jim and Michelle Brown of Highland Creek. He began taking piano lessons in the neighborhood at age 5.

Teachers Debbie Barry and later Judy Barravecchia taught him the fundamentals.

Now, he's learning to put his own style into pieces with current teacher Noel Freidline, who also lives in Highland Creek and is an accomplished jazz musician who came to Charlotte from Las Vegas.

"I've had students who have had talent, but no discipline, and vice versa — not much talent, but willing to work hard," said Freidline. "Certainly those who have some self-discipline always do better."

"When you get a young man like Brandon, you get to see the wonderful combination of talent, commitment and passion. That truly is a rare and wonderful thing," he said.

Not only is Brandon learning to inject his own style into music, but he also has begun writing music. For his own enjoyment, Brandon plays jazz and Ray Charles and Beatles tunes. He practices about 20 minutes a day (or every other day).

"It's sheer enjoyment for him," said mom Michelle Brown. "I've never had to tell him to practice. The first thing he'll do when he comes home from a lesson is sit down at the piano."

His mother says Brandon's talent came from her side of the family.

"It skipped me — I took lessons but never had the passion," she said. "Brandon's grandmother and great-grandfather played the organ in church. His great-great-grandfather was a cathedral choral director and organ player in Poland. He was pretty famous in his time."

Sharing his time, talent

Besides The Laurels, Brandon's other gigs include occasionally playing at The Speedway Club. He auditioned when he was 12. Although he doesn't get paid, Brandon said he sometimes gets tips.

His first paid gig was this past spring at St. Thomas Aquinas Church in Charlotte. Brandon provided dinnertime entertainment for the Young at Heart club.

In April, he was the youngest performer at John Tosco's third annual Beatles Tribute Music Party at Spirit Square.

"Brandon already has more public playing experience at the age of 15 than I had in my first year of college," said Freidline. "I see no reason why he would not be able to pull off a regular four-hour gig by the time he is a junior or senior in high school.

In many ways, he is still a diamond in the rough, but what is so impressive is the speed at which he picks up new things ... and his ability to season and mature," he said.

At The Laurels, the faces of Brandon's loyal audience light up and their toes tap to the music. Brandon is at peace as his fingers dance over the keys and he shares his talent. After each concert, he spends time shaking hands and chatting with the residents, many of whom he knows by name.

At his Christmas concert, Brandon gave out goody bags.

"It wouldn't be right for me not to show up," he said. "They look forward to me coming. They've almost become a part of my family."

The hour of power

Part 4 of a 7-part series on the second annual Eucharistic Congress

One of the landmark events of the Diocese of Charlotte's Eucharistic Congress involves a holy hour of eucharistic adoration.

Last year, the holy hour was directed by Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin of Charlotte. Likewise, the Eucharistic Conference held in Asheville June 24, 2006 featured a holy hour led by Bishop Peter J. Jugis as an integral part of its brief schedule.

This year, the Eucharistic Congress will host another holy hour led again by Bishop Curlin, along with the opportunity for participants to make private holy hours throughout the day.

The holy hour is certainly a familiar and foundational event in our Eucharistic Congress. But what is the significance of this holy hour of adoration and how does it contribute to the fruit of our Eucharistic Congress?

To understand the significance of the holy hour, we need to return to the first holy hour, which was led by our Lord, accompanied by his apostles in the Garden of Gethsemane. It is no coincidence that on the night that our Lord instituted the sacraments of the holy Eucharist and holy orders at the Last Supper, Jesus invited his apostles into the garden for a time of intense prayer.

It is also no coincidence that on the night that our Lord instituted the sacrament of the holy Eucharist, which signifies his real and abiding presence in the world, Jesus would invite his disciples into an hour of prayer and communion. Thus began the practice of the holy hour.

From its inauguration, the holy hour is, in fact, a response to a personal invitation by Jesus to come away with him from the mundane events of our day. Every holy hour is mysteriously a return to that first holy hour. Our Lord summons his disciples to this hour that we might enjoy divine communion, respite from our worries and anxieties, consolation from our sorrows and rest from our labors.

But he also beckons us to communicate

Guest Column

FATHER MATTHEW BUETTNER

and, indeed, to share his agonizing passion, as did his first disciples (between moments of slumber!). Consequently, the holy hour signifies comfort and affliction, peace and penance, prayer and passion, slumber and suffering.

Indeed, the holy hour unites us with our Lord and strengthens our friendship with Christ.

Thus, the holy hour produces an abundance of spiritual fruit within the soul of the faithful disciple that, in turn, generates the very fruits anticipated by the Eucharistic Congress.

This year, the bishop has taken as our congress theme, "The Love of Christ Impels Us." Indeed, the faithful disciple who responds to Christ's invitation to communion with him in the holy hour receives an abundance of divine love, which then impels him to communicate that love to his neighbor. Love generates love.

The holy hour impels us to serve God and our neighbor; the holy hour is power. It is certainly no wonder that the holy hour would assume such an intimate and foundational role in our Eucharistic Congress.

The Lord asked his first disciples the question that continues to echo throughout time, "Could you not keep watch for one hour?"

Father Buettner is pastor of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton.

'Who do you say that I am?'

Catechetical Sunday a chance to reflect on Jesus' teachings

"Who do you say that I am?"

That simple question from Jesus was so timely. Even though he was well aware of his identity and mission, it was essential that his hearers understand and appreciate the uniqueness of his person.

Within the pages of the Gospel, Jesus asks that people accept him, identify with him and then accept his message. It should not be surprising that he would be eager that his hearers share their understanding of him in order to appreciate the authority on which his teachings rest.

This Scripture is the first of four encounters between Jesus and Peter that enable Peter to gradually clarify his recognition of the identity and mission of Jesus. In this instance there is the acknowledgement on Peter's part that Jesus is the Christ, the Messiah.

He did not state on this occasion that Jesus was divine. This encounter then was an important step along the way of growth and understanding.

On another occasion, when Jesus spoke about the Eucharist and many disciples ceased following him, he asked, "Aren't you going to leave me, too?" Peter's immediate response was, "Lord, where can we go?"

Within this proclamation, Peter acknowledges that Jesus Christ is his Lord and Savior. His awareness of the identity and mission of Jesus is expanding.

Recall the Last Supper event during which Jesus indicates that he, as servant, wishes to wash the feet of Peter as a sign of his everlasting love. This event on Holy Thursday would point to Calvary's hill upon which Jesus would "give his life for our salvation."

At the Last Supper, even though Peter initially rejected the offer of Jesus, upon being challenged, he immediately welcomed this manifestation of Jesus' love and service. During the Last Supper, then, Jesus offered to Peter a vision of service.

Guest Column

FATHER JAMES HAWKER
VICAR OF EDUCATION

After the resurrection, the risen Lord queried Peter about the depth of his love, and having received from his apostle a pledge of loving fidelity, Jesus shared the invitation, "Follow me."

Peter, enlightened by the gift of faith and instructed by these encounters with Jesus, came to grasp the truth that Jesus was the Christ, his Lord, his teacher, his guide. Although Peter would make mistakes and, at times, not follow Jesus as best he could, Peter would strive to be faithful to his Lord and God.

As we celebrate Catechetical Sunday Sept. 17, we are invited once again to reflect prayerfully upon the meaning of our response to the question directed not only to Peter, but to each of us, "Who do you say that I am?"

We might consider the extent to which we act upon the truth that Jesus is our messiah, our Lord and God, our teacher, our guide. We should evaluate the degree to which we accept each dimension of his teaching with integrity and implement his message faithfully.

In this diocese, we are blessed beyond measure by the selfless service of so many men and women, both in parishes and schools, who minister as catechists. These friends, disciples and witnesses of Jesus, by their example and assistance, enable children, youths and other adults to respond in faith to the question, "Who do you say that I am?"

Father Hawker is vicar for education in the Diocese of Charlotte and pastor of St. Luke Church in Mint Hill.

Simple House makes big difference

It was gratifying to read the article on A Simple House lay mission apostolate ("A Simple House is a spiritual, material outreach to poor," Sept. 1).

Gibson should be chastised

After reading David Hains' column on the media and Mel Gibson ("Mel Gibson's revelation," Aug. 18), I was angered by what seemed to be a misplaced response to a serious offense. Hains wrote, "Hey, Mel, 'forget about it.'" I think not.

Regarding Gibson's operating of a motor vehicle while intoxicated, I cannot make excuses for anyone that would put people's lives in grave danger. They should be chastised in the press. We all know that a car becomes a weapon when driven by a drunk. We need to think about the victims.

Furthermore, anti-Semitic remarks affect us all in a negative way. Alcohol should not be an excuse. Mr. Gibson should not forget.

Burial of the body or cremation?

Moratorium a chance to study uses and cemeteries in diocese

This is the will of my Father, says the Lord, that I should lose nothing of all that he has given me, and that I should raise it up on the last day.

(Alleluia Verse from the Funeral Rite, from John 6:39)

On Jan. 17 of this year, our diocese entered into a moratorium on the construction and expansion of columbaria within the diocese. During the moratorium, a study is being done regarding the use of columbaria and cemeteries in our diocese.

When decisions are being made regarding the final arrangements for the body after death, the choice of burial of the body or cremation of the body are often presented as equal alternatives by our American culture.

The Catholic Church, however, does not consider the burial of the body and cremation of the body to be equally weighted alternatives. The Church prefers the burial of the body of the deceased over cremation of the body.

The Order of Christian Funerals, revised after Vatican Council II and promulgated in 1969, is the rite that is used for the celebration of funerals of the faithful departed. In 1997, the Vatican approved an Appendix to the Order of Christian Funerals which contained texts to be used for the celebration of funeral rites in the presence of the cremated remains of the deceased.

Of great interest in this appendix is the affirmation by the American bishops that cremation does not enjoy the same value as burial of the body. The preferred arrangement for the human body after death is burial of the body.

This preference for burial of the body is expressed in the following words: "The Church clearly prefers and urges that the body of the deceased be present for the funeral rites, since the presence of the human body better expresses the values which the Church affirms in those rites."

"The Church's teaching in regard to the human body as well as the Church's preference for burial of the body should be a regular part of catechesis on all levels, and pastors should make particular efforts to preserve this important teaching." (nn. 413-414)

Reasons for burial

What are the reasons for the Church's preference that the body of the deceased be present for the funeral rites and that the body be buried rather than cremated? The Order of Christian Funerals gives three reasons.

The first reason for the preference that the body of the deceased Christian be buried and not cremated is that the Lord himself willed to be buried. This is expressed in the following way:

"The funeral is to be celebrated according to the model in use in the region. It should be carried out in a way, however, that clearly expresses the Church's preference for the custom of burying the dead, after the example of Christ's own will to be buried" (n. 15)

The second reason for the Church's preference is that values on the natural level are affirmed by the presence of the body at the funeral rites and the burial of the body. The presence of the body at the funeral rites expresses in a natural way the manner we had been accustomed to relate to the person while he or she was alive, namely through a human body.

The rite uses the following words to express this:

"The Christian faithful are unequivocally confronted by the mystery of life and death when they are faced with the presence of the body of one who has died. Moreover, the body which lies in death naturally recalls the personal story of faith, the loving family bonds, the friendships, and the words and acts of kindness of the deceased person."

"Indeed, the human body is inextricably associated with the human person, which acts and is experienced by others through that body. It is the body whose hands clothed the poor and embraced the sorrowing." (n. 411)

The third reason for the Church's preference is that values on the supernatural level are affirmed by the presence of the body at the funeral rites and the burial of the body. The presence of the body at the funeral rites expresses Jesus' teaching regarding the supernatural dignity and destiny of the human body.

The rite expresses this in the following words:

"The body of a deceased Catholic Christian is also the body once washed in baptism, anointed with the oil of salvation, and fed with the Bread of Life. Thus, the Church's reverence for the sacredness of the human body grows out of a reverence and concern both natural and supernatural for the human person."

"The body of the deceased brings forcefully to mind the Church's conviction that the human body is in Christ a temple of the Holy Spirit and is destined for future glory at the resurrection of the dead. This conviction in faith finds its expression in a sustained and insistent prayer that commends the deceased person to God's merciful care so that his or her place in the communion of the just may be assured."

"A further expression is the care traditionally taken to prepare the bodies of the deceased for a burial that befits their dignity, in expectation of their final resurrection in the Lord." (n. 412)

These three reasons influence the Church's reverence for the sacredness of the human body in death, and explain the Church's preference for the presence of the body at the funeral rites and burial of the body over cremation.

The Order of Christian Funerals presents cremation as an exception to the normal situation of burial of the body. The rite allows the Christian faithful

From the Bishop

BISHOP
PETER J. JUGIS
BISHOP OF CHARLOTTE

to have recourse to cremation "when extraordinary circumstances make the cremation of a body the only feasible choice." (n. 415)

Circumstances which go far beyond the usual or regular situation may make cremation the only feasible choice in certain individual cases. For example, an infection by a fatal communicable disease or deadly bacterial agent which does not die with the death of the body might be one such extraordinary circumstance to recommend cremation of the body, in order to prevent the outbreak of an epidemic.

Our American culture asserts that since the human body eventually decomposes anyway, cremation should be employed in order to hasten the inevitable natural process. The Order of Christian Funerals, however, proposes that the burial of the body is to be preferred because the Lord Jesus himself willed to be buried. (n. 15)

Our American culture asserts that the human body is of no use once we die, so we should not fuss so much over it. The Order of Christian Funerals, however, proposes that the burial of the body is to be preferred because the human body of the Christian is a temple of the Holy Spirit and is destined for future glory at the resurrection of the dead. (n. 412)

Pastoral planning

A moratorium is a time of study. It is an opportunity to engage in pastoral planning regarding the use of columbaria and cemeteries in our diocese.

To be addressed during this period of study is the observation that the Church is now apparently promoting cremation over burial of the body, since it provides columbaria on-site at some parish churches but does not offer at those locations the option of burial of the body.

With utmost love, God in his Providence cares for each one of us during our pilgrimage on earth, and when we die He receives our body with tenderness and grants us a period of rest until the day of resurrection. Jesus himself experienced this great providential love of the Father.

The Gospel writers tell us that Jesus commended his spirit into the Father's hands and entrusted his human body into the hands of his disciple to be cared for after his death: Joseph of Arimathea took Jesus' body down from the cross, and with Nicodemus tenderly dressed the body, prepared it for burial, and then reverently placed the body in his own tomb.

Because of the witness of the New Testament Scriptures, the death of a Christian is often referred to as a falling asleep in the Lord, awaiting the day of resurrection (Mark 5: 35-43; 1 Thess. 4: 13-18)

Being Christian means knowing Jesus personally as a friend, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Being Christian is not just about listening to God's word and understanding his teachings, it is also about getting to know Jesus as a friend and personally discovering who he really is, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Jesus "in fact is not only a teacher but is a friend, indeed, a brother. How can we know him from afar? Intimacy, familiarity, routine" are what help people discover who Jesus really is, the pope said during his Sept. 6 weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square.

To shade himself from Rome's intense sunlight, Pope Benedict wore a Roman "galero," the wide-brimmed red hat often worn by Popes John XXIII and Paul VI. The last time a pope wore the hat was when Pope John Paul II visited Mexico in 1979.

In his address, the pope continued a series of talks on the apostles, this time focusing on the life and example of Philip.

Even though Jesus had told the apostles, "Whoever has seen me has seen the Father," Philip still asked Jesus to show them God the Father so as to know and see him, the pope said.

Jesus assured Philip that "I am in the Father and the Father is in me," adding his surprise that "you still do not know me, Philip?" Pope Benedict said.

Jesus invited all the apostles not just to listen to him, but to be with him, to take part in his life and become his friends so that they would know God.

The pope said, "The important thing is to learn Christ, not only and not just by listening to his teachings, but even more so by knowing him in person, that is, his humanity and divinity, his mystery, his beauty."

This friendship with Jesus and truly getting to know him is like any real friendship in that "it necessitates closeness, it even exists in part" on being close to each other, the pope said.

But Christians are also called to share with others and show the way that leads to Jesus, he said.

When bystanders asked Philip to show them Christ, he did not just "announce the Gospel like a theory," the pope said, but he invited the others to experience Jesus in person.

"This teaches us to also always be ready both in welcoming questions and requests from wherever they come and in directing (people) toward the Lord, the only one who can fully satisfy" people's needs, said the pope.

SPECIAL EVENTS FOR CHILDREN AND TEENS!

EUCHARISTIC CONGRESS

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7

Dear First Communicants:

This year you have celebrated your First Holy Communion. It has been a time of blessing for yourself and for your family, and for your parish family, as well.

Please join me, along with your parents or guardian, for a Eucharistic Procession on Saturday, October 7th, in Charlotte. As a First Communicant, you will lead our procession as we make this public statement of our love for Jesus.

Please wear the special clothing you wore to your First Communion. The procession will form at St. Peter's Church at 501 S. Tryon Street at 1 pm on Saturday and it will begin promptly at 1:30 pm. Please note that you MUST be accompanied by a parent or a guardian to participate in the Eucharistic Procession.

Sincerely yours in Christ,

BRYSON CITY — "Sixty-five years ago, Bishop Eugene McGuinness came out here when the roads weren't that good to dedicate two churches," Father Shawn O'Neal, pastor of St. Joseph Church in Bryson City, told his congregation Sept. 10.

Bishop McGuinness of the Diocese of Raleigh, which then comprised all of North Carolina, dedicated St. John the Evangelist Church in Waynesville Sept. 7 and St. Joseph Church Sept. 10 in 1941.

To celebrate the 65th anniversary this year, parishioners and visitors filled St. Joseph Church's wooden pews, with the overflow seated beneath a canopy just outside

PLAYING FOR A HIGHER POWER

New York Giants kicker Jay Feely, a Catholic, said that a 1998 encounter with a 10-year-old boy dying of a brain tumor was an epiphany that made him realize how he could use football to affect people's lives in a positive way. Feely is seen celebrating his game-winning field goal against the Eagles in Philadelphia during overtime NFL action in Philadelphia Dec. 11, 2005.

For Catholic NFL players, faith is more than a pre-game prayer

PITTSBURGH (CNS) — Pittsburgh Steelers strong safety Troy Polamalu is not an NFL superstar who happens to be a man of faith. Just the opposite; in his heart, he is simply "a Christian with a passion for Jesus."

Football, Polamalu said, "gives me confirmation of how I can carry out my faith. It's my way to glorify God."

And while he views his team's 2006 Super Bowl win as "really beautiful and a blessing," Polamalu notes that "success in football doesn't matter. Success in anything doesn't matter. As Mother Teresa said, God calls us not to be successful but to be faithful."

"My prayer is that I would glorify God no matter what, and not have success be the definition of it," he said.

"Since his arrival in Pittsburgh, (Polamalu) has been a permanent fixture at Mass. Even with all of the fame and success, Troy remains committed to the Christian faith," said Father David Bonnar, who has celebrated Mass for 10 years before home games with Steelers players and coaches.

"And if he has changed in any way, he has just become even more humble and spiritual. I have found him to have both the strong contemplative sense of Mary and the fierce active sense of Martha," said Father Bonnar.

For New York Giants kicker Jay Feely, it was an unmistakable moment of clarity that solidified his Catholic faith and revealed his true mission in life.

Feely's epiphany occurred Jan. 1, 1998, in Pasadena, Calif., just hours after his college football team, the University of Michigan Wolverines, won the Rose Bowl.

The post-game celebration at the team's hotel was just a noisy backdrop for Feely's encounter with a 10-year-old boy who was dying of a brain tumor. The boy's mother had brought him to meet Feely after the game.

"He knew he was very ill," said Feely. "I told him God had a purpose for him; that God has a plan for everyone."

Feely recalled seeing a visible, remarkable difference in the boy's appearance and expression — evidence that Feely's words somehow had touched a chord.

"I think about the impact I had on that little boy," said Feely. "That was my moment of clarity. It solidified my faith. That was when I understood my life as a man, how I could use football to affect people's lives in a positive way. God gives us different gifts."

Unity walk brings together religious leaders, others who want peace

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Hundreds of participants in Washington's second 9/11 Unity Walk Sept. 10 processed past places of worship as varied in style and religious tradition as the walkers themselves.

Men in yarmulkes carrying babies in backpack-style carriers, clerics wearing collars and women in veils joined leaders of the Interfaith Conference of Metropolitan Washington in remembering the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Stops along the way included the Washington Hebrew Congregation, the Washington National Cathedral and the Vatican Embassy. The route also took participants past the Church of Christ Washington, Annunciation Catholic Church, St. Alban's Episcopal Church, St. Sophia Greek Orthodox Cathedral and St. Nicholas Russian Orthodox Cathedral.

Speaking from the steps in front of the Islamic Center in Washington, Archbishop Donald W. Wuerl called on hundreds of walkers to represent the light of their faith traditions.

"The light in God's spirit will not be overcome in the darkness," he said.

Other religious leaders in the walk included Rabbi Bruce Lustig, a senior rabbi from the Washington Hebrew Congregation; Imam Abdullah Khoury, director of the Islamic Center; and Episcopal Bishop John Bryson Chane of Washington.

"We're blessed when we recognize we're one human family," Archbishop Wuerl said. "Each of us and the tradition we represent is a community of light. The solidarity that we seek is already rooted in the gift of our life that we share."

Archbishop Wuerl noted the many bridges and overpasses that the walkers crossed to make their journey possible.

"The bridges we build — of human solidarity, of kindness — are the bridges that bring us together in a world of peace," he said.

FROM THE VATICAN

In Geneva, Vatican calls for moratorium on use of cluster bombs

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican called for a moratorium on the use of cluster bombs, saying past and future victims of conflicts "cannot wait for years of negotiations and discussions."

Archbishop Silvano Tomasi, Vatican representative to Geneva-based U.N. agencies, told governmental experts Sept. 1 that the maiming and death of tens of thousands of people as a result of the bombs' submunitions necessitate immediate, concrete action.

"For that, a moratorium on the use of such arms is essential," he said during an Aug. 20-Sept. 6 meeting in Geneva on the Convention of Conventional Weapons.

Cluster bombs eject multiple submunitions or bomblets, and their use during the recent war in Lebanon, Archbishop Tomasi said, "tragically demonstrates to us evidence of a humanitarian tragedy unfolding before our eyes."

"The images and the testimonies reaching us are alarming," he said.

U.N. experts so far have discovered 100,000 unexploded bomblets scattered throughout hundreds of different sites in Lebanon, many of them in residential areas.

Cluster bombs and submunitions are not banned by any international treaty, and many governments still consider them legitimate weapons.

"All arms are called legitimate before being prohibited or regulated," said Archbishop Tomasi.

Typically, cluster bombs open in midair and scatter dozens or hundreds of submunitions over a wide area. A percentage of duds do not explode and can remain a threat for many years. They pose a particular danger to children, as they are easily attracted to the bomblets' bright colorful casings, mistaking the volatile explosives for toys.

Vatican Observatory head rebuts suggestions that he was fired

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Jesuit Father George Coyne, who headed the Vatican Observatory for more than 28 years, said suggestions that he was forced out of the post by Pope Benedict XVI are "simply not true."

The Vatican announced Aug. 19 that Father Coyne, 73, would be stepping down as head of the Vatican's scientific research organization and that his replacement would be Jesuit Father Jose Funes.

Some news reports suggested Father Coyne was replaced by the pope in reaction to comments the Jesuit astronomer made over the last year supporting evolution and criticizing "intelligent design" as the explanation for how the universe was created.

At the time, Father Coyne was on vacation and, he said in a Sept. 8 note to Catholic News Service, purposely avoiding the news.

Upon his return from vacation, Father Coyne responded to queries from CNS and others with a written statement Sept. 8 explaining that he had for several years been requesting a replacement as head of the observatory.

"For some years I have, upon realizing that a scientific research institute such as ours requires a continuous input of new initiatives, suggested to Jesuit superiors that they search for a new director of this work," Father Coyne wrote.

"In May of this year upon my repeated request, they finally agreed to begin a search for a new director, resulting, rather rapidly to my delight, in the appointment of Jose Funes.

"This is truly a wonderful and blessed choice," he said. "Jose is a well-established international scholar, an excellent teacher and lecturer, very devoted to the intellectual life of the church and he will have new ideas and initiatives."

Father Funes, 43, an Argentine, has been on the staff of the observatory since 2000.

Father Coyne, who will remain president of the Vatican Observatory Foundation, said he learned about the speculation surrounding the transition only when he returned from vacation.

Media reports that he was dismissed by the pope are "simply not true," his note to CNS said.

Father Coyne went on to say he had been granted a sabbatical year, which he would spend as a parish priest at St. Raphael the Archangel Church in Raleigh, N.C.

In September 2007 he plans to return to work at the Vatican Observatory. The observatory is based at Castel Gandolfo, south of Rome, and at the University of Arizona in Tucson, Ariz.

Rallying for reform

A sign calls for the legalization of undocumented immigrants during a pro-immigration rally in Washington Sept. 7. The rally was one of several around the country near Labor Day aimed at building support for comprehensive immigration reform, though passage of legislation this term seemed unlikely.

Meanwhile, ongoing programs to register immigrant voters have been slow to bear fruit, according to an Associated Press review of registration figures from a handful of major cities.

Leo Anchondo, national manager of the Justice for Immigrants campaign of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, said voter registration is not specifically part of the church's immigration campaign. Where immigration is concerned, the church's efforts instead will continue to focus on educating Catholics and the general public about the whole range of concerns, he said.

CORRECTIONS

In the Sept. 1 issue, information regarding the establishment of the Priests' Retirement and Benefits Collection was incorrect. In 1994, on the recommendation of a committee of priests and laymen, then-Bishop William G. Curlin re-instituted an assessed collection. A retirement collection had been in place since the mid-1960s.

In the Sept. 8 issue, Archbishop Fulton J. Sheen's date of death was incorrect in a Catholic News Service article. The correct date was Dec. 9, 1979.

Aiding the workforce

CSS agency assists refugees, businesses with employment needs

CHARLOTTE — Businesses in the Diocese of Charlotte seeking reliable, hardworking employees have been turning to a local nonprofit agency sponsored by Catholic Social Services to find workers without paying an employment fee.

Refugee Employment Services (RES) is part of Catholic Social Services' Refugee Resettlement Office. For nearly 31 years, RES has provided area employers with workers filling skilled and unskilled positions.

Refugees are a diverse labor pool of people who are eager to work, according to Bill Hamelau, former executive director of the American Red Cross Midway-Kansas Chapter and member of the RES advisory council, which is comprised of local business people.

"These individuals have fled their home countries because of persecution due to race, religion, political beliefs or identification with a social group. They come to the United States in search of safety, freedom and a way to provide for themselves and their families as they start their lives over," he said.

Refugees are screened by the U.S. government, which also conducts security clearances. After that, they receive proper documentation, conferring all the rights and privileges of residents, and they are legally authorized to work in the United States.

RES staff first meets with new arrivals to determine language capability and any job skills and work experience. Next, the staff matches those skills to a particular industry or employer.

This may involve contacting companies currently using RES's services, checking the classified ads to see who is hiring or perhaps making cold calls to businesses they feel might be a good fit.

Once a company agrees to hire a refugee client, the RES staff assists with all related employment paperwork, coordinates transportation and, if needed, provides interpreters to sit in on orientation and training.

At intervals over a three-month period, the RES staff follows up with employers to see how the refugee workers are doing and provides assistance as needed.

"RES sends people who want to work, and they are always there when you need help."

— David Miller, operations manager, Krispy Kreme

"We have been very pleased with the workers and RES support," said David Miller, operations manager for Krispy Kreme.

"RES sends people who want to work, and they are always there when you need help," he said.

Feedback from participating businesses indicates that by employing refugees, companies can reduce turnover rate, improve efficiency, enhance quality and increase production.

"Our experience is that refugees are eager to work and have high standards for the work they do," said Mike Reardon, senior vice president of BB&T Processing Services.

Other employers have indicated that refugee employees are punctual, reliable, quick to learn and extremely grateful for a chance to be productive and earn a living, according to Hamelau.

"They are pleased with how easily these employees fit in and how their presence enriches the cultural diversity of their workplaces," he said.

"Our refugee workers are our best asset," said Jerry Henson, vice president of Charlotte operations for Cabinetcraft. "It has been a tremendous experience."

In the past eight years, RES has worked with more than 150 different participating businesses and has placed about 1,200 refugee clients.

"Because of its ability to successfully match a company's needs with the right employees, Catholics Social Services' Refugee Resettlement Office is one of Charlotte's best-kept secrets for employers," said Hamelau.

Students at St. Michael School in Gastonia (above) and St. Leo the Great School in Winston-Salem (left) participate in prayer and memorial services Sept. 11. Services were held across the United States marking the fifth anniversary of the terrorist attacks in New York, Washington and Pennsylvania that claimed the lives of 2,973 people.

Religious leaders of Islam, Judaism, Buddhism, Sikhism and several Christian denominations, including the Catholic Church, gathered at St. Paul's Chapel in New York City Sept. 11. The chapel, a center for mourners and relief workers in the aftermath of the attacks, once again served as a key gathering place in 2006 for a memorial service to commemorate the anniversary.

the door into the church.

Father O'Neal thanked his concelebrants: Bishop Emeritus William Curlin and retired Father James Cahill, "my mentor for so many years; may I never take his wisdom for granted."

The day's second reading, from the Letter of St. James, admonished all to "show no partiality" and to make no "distinctions among yourselves."

Father O'Neal said in his homily that members of St. Joseph Church have always tried to offer hospitality to everyone.

Family of faith

St. Joseph Church welcomed Hazel Colville, who joined the parish in 1952.

"I guess she was the first one around here to convert," her son, Stephen, recalls. "She was driving to Waynesville (some 40 miles away). It was about a two-hour drive. That was the only place where there was a priest all the time."

Hazel Colville went to Waynesville for instruction in the Catholic faith. Her husband, Reeves, taught Sunday school at Bryson City United Methodist Church.

"When something was going on at the Catholic church, we all went to the Catholic church," Stephen Colville said. "When it snowed, we shoveled the sidewalks and steps at both churches."

Stephen Colville lived in Waynesville for a while, but often returned to Bryson City to take his mother to Mass.

"I got to paying attention" to the homilies, he said, and became a Catholic in 2000.

Barbara and Tom Reidmiller joined St. Joseph Church after they moved to Bryson City around 1976.

"I like the people and the interaction of the people and how, if something needs to be done, they work together and get it done," Barbara Reidmiller said.

She told how the church began its thrift shop.

"I think it's been the best ecumenical thing that could have happened," she said.

When the church bought land adjacent to its existing property some 30 years ago, it acquired a small building that may have been a hamburger stand.

"The ladies got together and asked if they could open a thrift shop," Barbara Reidmiller said. "They were told, 'yes,' if they could make it self-sufficient."

The St. Joseph Thrift Shop has indeed become self-sufficient, operating for several hours, four days a week.

"It's a place where people can bring their good stuff," Barbara Reidmiller said. "If someone (in the community) gets burned out or needs something, they can have it for free. When the church needs something, we buy it; we just bought a new stove for the kitchen."

Cass Kelly, 79, known as the thrift-store "commandante," moved to Bryson City from West Palm Beach, Fla., in 1987. Active in the store, she's also a lector.

"She's the matriarch," parishioner Doris Kearns said of Kelly. "Everybody takes care of her, and she takes care of everybody."

The parish, Kelly said, "not only has more people" than when she first moved there, "but we have more classes for the children" and more people come to the weekly social hour after the 11:15 a.m. Sunday Mass.

At Mass on Sept. 10, Father O'Neal and Bishop Curlin blessed two of those young people — Sean Murphy and Beau Schneider — who will be confirmed on Oct. 22.

"Father Shawn makes us feel important," Kelly said. "He shows his support for everything we do."

Serving with spirit

In addition to the thrift shop, St. Joseph Church also reaches out to the community as part of the Swain County Ministerial Association, which has a fund to help transients and an auxiliary that works in conjunction with Swain County Human Services to assist those in need.

"You might think we're out of the way here," Father O'Neal said, "but being on Main Street we've had people stop in while we're eating (during social hour) and ask for the leftovers or for a tank of gas."

The church always helps out.

"It might be a small church in size, but it's a big church in faith," Bishop Curlin said at the end of Mass.

"I was watching during Mass; your reverence, the way you pray and sing, shows what's in your hearts. You're not just people, you're God's special people," he said. "I congratulate you. I commend you for your wonderful, beautiful faith."

Faith in action

Children participate in the Sock-A-Thon obstacle course at Holy Family Church in Clemmons in March. The event, organized by the parish's fifth-grade faith formation class, was open to children and adults and collected 327 pairs of socks and 217 articles of clothing for local nursing home residents and rehabilitation patients.

Each year, faith formation students participate in hands-on activities to help them learn and grow closer to God, according to Laura Sheets, fifth-grade faith formation teacher.

The Sock-A-Thon, inspired by a class discussion on "Welcome to the World of I Believe," was another example of the children living their faith.

"This was more than we expected for our first major event," said Sheets. "We found it to be a huge success and the kids learned that a simple phrase, 'I believe,' can lead them to what God calls us to do and help those in need."

Couple hosts Fatima statue in Greensboro

BY DEACON GERALD POTKAY
CORRESPONDENT

GREENSBORO — A statue of Our Lady of Fatima traveling throughout the southeastern states recently came to a home in Greensboro.

Ten men and women gathered around the statue in the home of George and Norma Bean Sept. 7 to learn more about Our Lady's message and to pray the rosary in reparation of sins and sacrileges committed against the Sacred Heart of Jesus and the Immaculate Heart of Mary.

"We did this to gain whatever the Lord wants us to gain, and for whatever the Lord can accomplish for Christ through his beloved mother, Our Lady of Fatima," said George Bean.

"This is only a small part of the process of developing ourselves so that we might more easily move towards God," said Norma Bean.

The traveling statue is part of the "America Needs Fatima" campaign by the American Society for the Defense of Tradition, Family and Property.

Founded in 1973, the society was formed to "resist, in the realm of ideas, the liberal, socialist and communist trends of the times and proudly affirm the positive values of tradition, family and property," according to its Web site.

More than 10,000 homes in every state except Alaska have hosted replicas of the Pilgrim Virgin statue, fashioned after one of three original statues based on sketches by Carmelite Sister Lucia dos Santos. She was one of three Portuguese children who saw visions of Mary at Fatima, Portugal, in 1917.

Statue "custodians" crisscross the country with 11 replicas, visiting churches and homes to promote these home-enthronement programs, which include crowning of the statue, a short audiovisual about Fatima and praying of the rosary.

The site says other aspects of the America Needs Fatima campaign include pro-life rallies, anti-blasphemy protests, flier distributions and audio-video presentations to draw people, both churched and unchurched, "closer to God and his Blessed Mother."

The Beans responded to an invitation to open their home to the statue of Our Lady of Fatima. Their guests found the experience rewarding.

"We were able to gain more ways to share the faith. I am certainly willing to share this life through both word and action, and by communicating with those who do not believe," said Jan Meris Oliver.

"This is being done not as a show of ego but to demonstrate a better way of life," said Oliver. "It is important to know that each person has to avail himself in order to make some kind of decision to grow in the faith."

"I really appreciate being able to share the Pilgrim Statue of Fatima here in this house," said Kathleen Kulla. "Now, I can share this knowledge with everyone."

Our Lady of Fatima

On May 13, 1917, in the village of Fatima, Portugal, three peasant children — Lucia, 10, and her two cousins, Francisco, 9, and Jacinta Marta, 7 — were watching their sheep near their home when they claimed to have seen the Blessed Virgin Mary.

The apparitions continued once a month, each on the 13th day of the month, until October 1917 and later were declared worthy of belief by the Catholic Church.

In 2000, Pope John Paul II beatified Sister Lucia's cousins, who died as children.

During the July 13 apparition, the children's vision included black demons and charred souls burning in pain and despair in the depths of hell. Then they were given the hope that many souls would be saved and peace achieved through devotion to the Immaculate Heart of Mary.

The children were also assured that World War I would soon end, but, if people did not stop offending God, an even worse war would begin during the reign of Pope Pius XI (1922-1939), for God would punish the world for its sins through war, hunger and persecutions of the church and the Holy Father.

Mary asked for the consecration of Russia to her Immaculate Heart and the reception of Communion of reparation on five first Saturdays. Finally, the children were given the very special hope that Mary's "Immaculate Heart will triumph."

MACS foundation helps bring quality education to students

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — For the past 75 years, students in Mecklenburg County have benefited from a Catholic education.

As a result of the success of the 2005-06 Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools Education Foundation annual giving campaign, more students will have that opportunity, and they will benefit in more ways.

After setting an ambitious goal of $500,000, Susan Cameron, director of diocesan Catholic schools development, said she was thrilled to have received $501,000 in pledges and gifts as of Sept. 13.

"Last year, 1,200 households donated $425,000 to the education foundation, well over the goal of $370,000," said Cameron. "This year, we have about the same number of contributors; many have increased their pledges this year."

The mission of the MACS Education Foundation is to enrich children's education by providing funding for programs within the MACS system.

Programs funded by the foundation focus on one of three areas: excellence in teaching, academic enrichment and spiritual development.

"These are programs that would not operate in their entirety without support from the foundation," Cameron said. "Most are not supplemented by the school's operating budgets, but are stand-alone programs."

Programs that were instituted using foundation grant funds have had long-reaching effects. For example, the Learning Enrichment Activities Program (LEAP) was originated at Our Lady of the Assumption School in Charlotte through a Grant for Educational Excellence.

The program, which allows students to participate in enrichment activities once they have mastered a skill, is now being used by five of the six MACS elementary schools.

"Because of the foundation, we're able to provide additional supplemental income for innovative programs, such as LEAP," said Cameron.

TRACS foundation exceeds lofty goal

CHARLOTTE — More than ever before, students in the Triad area — Greensboro, High Point and Winston-Salem — will benefit from a Catholic education following the 2005-06 Triad Catholic Schools Foundation annual giving campaign.

The campaign exceeded its goal of $417,500, said Susan Cameron, director of diocesan Catholic schools development. More than $418,000 in pledges and gifts had been received as of Sept. 13.

The goal for 2004-05 was $410,000; $430,000 was raised, including a one-time gift of nearly $20,000.

Each Triad school sets its own goal and decides how to spend the money that is raised.

The Triad Catholic Schools

Foundation provides funds for tuition assistance, teacher excellence and program enhancement.

More than half of the money raised provides tuition assistance. Nearly $240,000 in assistance was distributed during the 2005-06 school year.

"Over the five years since the foundation was established, nearly $700,000 has been given out as tuition assistance," said Cameron. "With assistance, students who might not otherwise have a Catholic education can now be part of that community."

Funds are also used to provide and upgrade technology equipment, for professional development and for teacher bonuses.

"The schools can attract and retain good teachers," said Cameron. "Also, students will benefit from the programs that are developed as a result of these fundraising efforts."

Values in Vogue program promotes modesty, v

S.C., the program was designed to combine the virtues of modesty, chastity and self-respect for girls ages 8 to 15.

"I was unhappy with some of the fashion choices my daughter (11-year-old Mary Scott) was making," said Leigh Ann Norris, a parishioner of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury and one of the Values in Vogue volunteer coordinators.

Norris' sister, Peggy Fisher, had seen the Values in Vogue fashion show in Spartanburg, and the two sisters thought it would be worthwhile to bring to Salisbury.

"We realized we needed an entire program, not just a fashion show," said Norris.

A group of Catholic mothers put their heads together and designed a comprehensive program that met six times over the summer. Topics included how a girl can dress appropriately for her age and the occasion; dressing for success, with six businesswomen speaking to the girls about their careers; and skin care.

Although several of the girls admitted that they originally participated because their mothers wanted them to, they were all glad they took part in the program.

"It was so much fun," said Katie Washington, an eighth-grader at Sacred Heart School in Salisbury.

Katie said she has changed the way she dresses since starting Values

"Christ teaches us that part of being a woman and part of being virtuous is dressing modestly, which is integrally related to the virtue of chastity."

— Stephanie Wood, fashion show emcee

in Vogue.

"I used to wear short shorts, and people would look at me weird," she said. "Now I wear Bermuda shorts, and people smile at me. Boys treat me better, too."

Values in Vogue organizers made learning about proper, modest dress fun. One session covered dressing for Mass.

Eleven girls were told to dress for Mass, but only two were given a set of guidelines to follow. The girls critiqued each other's dress, but no one could find fault in the dress of the two girls who were given the guidelines.

"I don't wear flip-flops to church anymore," said ninth-grader Maggie Grathwohl.

The fashions in the Values in Vogue show were chosen much like any girl's wardrobe — with input from both mother and child.

Middle- and high-school age girls show off their special-occasion wear at the conclusion of the Values in Vogue fashion show Sept. 10.

"We started from the girls' own closets, and put together outfits that were appropriate and that the girls liked," said Danette Stohlsorth, mother of 10-year-old Bailey and one of the show's volunteers.

Goody's clothing store also helped by loaning clothing for the show. The girls went to the store and picked out clothing they liked — clothing they liked so well, several of the girls bought their show outfits.

But Values in Vogue is about much more than fashion, even modest fashion.

Father John Putnam, pastor of Sacred Heart Church, spoke to the girls about how to behave in church. Stephanie Wood, emcee for the fashion show, spoke about the need to dress and act modestly.

Wood is the coordinator of NextWave Faithful, a youth and young adult division of Family Life Center International. She speaks to young adults about the main focus areas of love, life, purpose and truth.

"Christ teaches us that part of being a woman and part of being virtuous is dressing modestly, which is integrally related to the virtue of chastity," said Wood.

Girls benefit from modesty by gaining true self-respect, a true sense of self-worth, she said.

"(Young women) who dress and behave modestly are going to attract the kind of man who is going to love them as a person and be virtuous himself," said Wood. "He is looking for virtue and true beauty, not just physical beauty."

Wood said boys want girls to dress modestly.

"They want to value them, and it's a battle for them (when girls dress immodestly)," said Wood.

Norris said the Salisbury Values in Vogue program was designed to be easily adapted by any parish.

Tasked with saving souls

Retiring secretary of state's book illustrates Vatican's world role

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Nearly one week before Italian Cardinal Angelo Sodano was to retire, he published a book highlighting key addresses he made during 15 years of service as the Vatican secretary of state.

Titled "The Leaven of the Gospel: The Presence of the Holy See in the Lives of Peoples," the 138-page hardcover volume is a sort of memoir meant to show the Vatican as an advocate promoting and protecting human dignity and trying to save souls.

The book is written in Italian and contains 12 speeches the Italian cardinal made representing the pope and the Vatican at various national and international venues, including the United Nations.

The book is dedicated to Popes John Paul II and Benedict XVI, the popes under whom Cardinal Sodano, 78, served. The author also gives a word of welcome to his successor, Italian Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, who takes over Sept. 15.

Cardinal Sodano writes in the book's preface, "The time has come to hand over, like in the Olympic Games, the appointment" he received in 1990.

At a Sept. 7 press conference, Msgr. Gabriele Caccia, councilor for general affairs of the Vatican Secretariat of State, said there have always been questions about the Vatican's role on the world stage.

Does the church "only have a pastoral mission or also a political function?" he asked.

While the book does not give a black and white answer, he said, it does show that all the Vatican's diplomatic activity, through its various nunciatures and papal representatives, is still carrying out the church's fundamental pastoral task: the saving of souls.

The Gospel message can and should be brought to all spheres of life and can make all human activity more enlightened and noble, he said.

The Vatican is often the only state on the world stage whose agenda is not based on promoting the "particular interests of a person or peoples," Msgr. Caccia said.

Msgr. Pietro Parolin, undersecretary of state for foreign relations, said at the same press conference that the Vatican's nuncios and papal representatives play an important role "in defending the human being" and in strengthening the local churches, especially in regions where Christians face poverty, discrimination or other hardships.

When a political or social crisis threatens or erupts in a country or region, the Vatican's diplomatic corps springs into action, looking for peaceful solutions to the problem or coordinating needed aid in the event of a tragedy.

Msgr. Caccia said that while the church and the Vatican do "not magically solve every problem," their visible efforts of helping people demonstrate that "there's a community that cares and can band together" to help anyone in need.

Msgr. Parolin added that the Vatican's presence around the world shows people that the church and the pope are always near, that Christians — no matter how small their numbers — are not alone in the world.

Serving others is most rewarding trait

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

My young friend Ryan was accepted by several highly selective universities last spring. I thought this must be quite an ego trip, considering all the hype that surrounds college admissions these days.

Plus he lives in a community that overly touts the achievements of its high schoolers.

Ryan seemed oblivious to all that. I'd known him for several years before I found out that he was a top-ranked student in the most difficult academic curriculum.

All I knew was that his conversation about spiritual matters always ran deep and that a serious, mature relationship with God was at the heart of his love of social ministry projects.

So the prestigious Catholic university with its stimulating environment for intellectual, spiritually engaged young people seemed the perfect fit for Ryan.

He turned it down. He couldn't afford to go there.

Instead he now attends a state university — not even a high-ranking one — that offered him full tuition and housing.

At first, I was dismayed that he was unable to go to the hotshot Catholic school, although Ryan himself didn't seem disappointed. Then I began to tell my husband about Ryan: Of course, he'll do extremely well at the college he's chosen.

One thing about it that excited him is that it has a medical school, and he hopes to become a pediatrician. And he should, I told my husband. He's just the kind of person society needs as a doctor, compassionate, a servant-leader type — and he loves children!

Also he'll be happy in a large city where he can serve the poor through campus ministry. By the time I'd finished describing the whole imagined scene I was excited that Ryan would be where he belongs.

The servant-leader and child-loving aspects of Ryan's character are what reminded me of him when I read this week's Gospel. Jesus' closest disciples were on a group ego trip about their individual accomplishments.

Obviously embarrassed, they got a brief lesson on servant leadership. Then Jesus embraced an unassuming child in their midst, the one, he noted, who will bless those who accept him.

Ryan likely will hear these readings at Mass this Sunday. But he won't recognize himself. He'll be busy with the concerns of everyone else.

Father Joseph DeGrocco, host of "Divine Intervention," jokes with contestants (from left) Father Robert Hayden and Danny Rivera, both of St. Aidan Church in Williston Park, N.Y., and Father Jim Mannion and Kevin Hunker, both of Holy Family Church in Hicksville, N.Y., during a taping of the game show at Telecare studios in Uniondale, N.Y., in late August.

TV show tests contestants' knowledge of Catholic faith

UNIONDALE, N.Y. (CNS) — Lightning recently struck Father Joseph DeGrocco multiple times.

Although he quivered behind his podium, the priest seemed to enjoy it. After all, it was all part of the show.

"Divine Intervention," a game show that tests contestants' knowledge of Catholic and pop trivia, is a new addition to the fall lineup of Telecare, the TV system for the Rockville Centre Diocese.

The Catholic game show is filmed on a celestial-themed set, where contestants wait their turn in "purgatory" and an unseen source tosses lightning bolts at Father DeGrocco whenever a contestant chooses the "divine intervention" square in search for an answer.

The game show is similar to "Jeopardy" but with a twist: The contestants must recall where the answers are on the game board and they are revealed only for five seconds prior to the start of the game. Although the game is lighthearted, it offers real information about the Catholic faith.

"This is just another tool of evangelization," said Father DeGrocco, a professor at the Seminary of the Immaculate Conception in Huntington.

The priest hopes viewers will learn a little about their faith and have fun and also tune into other shows on the Catholic cable network.

"I love this show," said Ann DellaMonica, a recent audience member and a parishioner of St. Frances de Chantal in Wantagh. "I loved it so much, I want to be on the show myself."

Other new shows on Telecare this season include "Real Food" — a cooking show with Father Jim Vlaun and guest chefs; "Building Bridges," a show about Latin American Catholics hosted by Msgr. Robert Brennan, vicar general; and a show that will provide live coverage of diocesan events.

With the success of popular game shows on television, Father Vlaun, who heads up Telecare, hopes this show will appeal to current viewers of Telecare and bring in new ones.

During the final round of "Divine Intervention," the two winning contestants earn prizes from local businesses by finding the angels hidden under the numbered squares and trying to avoid the devil.

"Just like in real life," quipped Father DeGrocco.

Pope reflects on crisis of faith, reason — of Islamic violence to introduce a reflection on the crisis of faith and reason in the West.

The pope began his address Sept. 12 by highlighting a 600-year-old discussion on Islamic "jihad" or holy war, quoting at length a Christian emperor who condemned Islam for spreading the faith "by the sword."

But instead of critically assessing Islam, the pope focused his attention on what he said was the West's centuries-old tendency to "exclude the question of God" from the realm of reason.

This tendency to devalue religious thought, he said, makes it more difficult for the West to engage in the urgently needed dialogue of cultures and religions.

"A reason which is deaf to the divine and which relegates religion to the realm of subcultures is incapable of entering into the dialogue of cultures," he said.

Nature of God and soul

The pope looked happy and relaxed as he returned to the University of Regensburg, where he taught dogmatic theology from 1969 to 1977.

About 1,500 of Germany's leading academics greeted the pontiff with warm applause as he walked through the university's great hall and took his place on a gilded chair in the center of the stage.

To introduce the theme of his lecture, the pope quoted from an account of a dialogue between the Byzantine Emperor Manuel II Paleologus and an unnamed Muslim scholar, sometime near the end of the 14th century.

The pope said the account was marginal to his theme, but that he found it interesting — particularly when the emperor touched upon the subject of Islamic holy war.

The pope cited what the emperor told the Islamic scholar: "Show me just what Mohammed brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached."

Twice, the pope emphasized that he was quoting someone else's words.

The pope said the emperor must have known of the early Islamic teaching that "there is no compulsion in religion," but was no doubt also aware of later instructions in the Koran about holy war.

In the account, the emperor goes on to explain why spreading the faith through violence is unreasonable, because violence is incompatible with God and with the nature of the soul.

The pope then pointed to a key question about Islam that is raised by the narrative: whether God is absolutely transcendent for Muslims, and therefore not bound up with "any of our categories, even that of rationality."

The pope did not offer an answer to that question. Instead, he went on to explore, in great detail, why Christian theology has come to affirm that faith is indeed based on reason and that acting unreasonably contradicts God's nature.

Dangerous state of affairs

Asked by reporters about the papal text, Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, the Vatican spokesman, said the pope had no intention of giving "an interpretation of Islam as violent."

"I think everyone understands that even inside Islam there are many different positions and there are many positions that are not violent," Father Lombardi said.

He noted that the pope's speech was primarily a historical analysis.

The pope's main point, developed in an academic style, was that in the Western world the growing separation between faith and reason has resulted in a "dangerous state of affairs for humanity," in which society tries to construct a system of ethics without taking religion seriously and individuals try to make moral choices based solely on the subjective conscience.

He said this was partly the result of a long process of "de-Hellenization" of Christian theology, in stages marked by an overemphasis on Scripture, a reduction of the Gospel to a "humanitarian moral message" and the creation of a gulf between theology and scientific empiricism.

'Dialogue of cultures'

The pope said his broad-brush "critique of modern reason" did not aim to turn back the clock or ignore the progress made and the new possibilities opened for humanity. But the church also sees dangers, he said, and believes they can be overcome "only if reason and faith come together in a new way."

When the West invites others to a "dialogue of cultures," it should do so with the understanding that religion is an essential part of its own culture, he said.

But in fact, he said, it is widely held in the Western world that the only authentic knowledge is scientific knowledge, and that religion is a purely subjective experience.

"The world's most profoundly religious cultures see this exclusion of the divine from the universality of reason as an attack on their most profound convictions," he said.

The pope said the West needs to recover the rightful place of philosophy and theology, so that it can say — like the Byzantine emperor who debated the Muslim scholar — that "not to act reasonably ... is contrary to the nature of God."

The Vatican underlined the academic character of the pope's address by noting on the text handed out to journalists that a later version would be issued, complete with footnotes.

C.S. Lewis meets YouTube

Filtering necessary to find important media messages

"The scholar has lived in many times and is therefore in some degree immune from the great cataract of nonsense that pours from the press and microphone of his own age."

— C.S. Lewis

It seems an odd admission, because I used to make my living in broadcasting, but whenever commercials come on the radio or the television, I change channels.

Part of the reason is that the commercials are usually annoying, but it is more than that. The commercials interrupt the flow of the program. How can you listen to Mozart or a serious discussion about Iraq one minute, only to be told in the next minute that you need a new vacuum cleaner, a bigger car or whiter teeth?

What I am doing with my endless surfing of the dial is filtering. All of us filter media as we go through the day. We pay attention to some messages, avoid others and tune out the majority.

My personal filter is set to receive more programs of history, nature and sports and fewer "reality" shows and commercials.

There is such an engulfing wave of media surrounding the world that we cannot sit passively and let it wash over us, lest we all end up like commercialized characterizations of real people. Why are the names Paris and Britney going through my mind right now?

C.S. Lewis, the great Christian apologist and author of "The Chronicles of Narnia," seemed to understand this need for filtering. I thought of Lewis and filtering as I recently clicked through YouTube.com. YouTube is the current hot Web site. Like the Web itself, it can be a purveyor of beauty or a vast wasteland. It depends on how you set your filter.

YouTube houses millions — yes, millions — of short videos. According to Wikipedia, an online encyclopedia, in a little more than a year YouTube has become the 13th most popular Web site in the world. The site records 20 million visits per month. Every day a staggering 65,000 new videos are uploaded.

As you might expect with those kinds of numbers, much of what can be seen on YouTube is silly, incomprehensible to anyone not in junior high or simply a waste of time; the "great cataract of nonsense" to which Lewis refers.

The site features endless whiny diatribes from teenagers whose parents don't seem to understand. Amateur lip sync videos are another staple, as are sporting-event highlights. Renditions of the head-butting incident at the World Cup soccer game are still being viewed.

But there are some real gems, and thanks to search technology that allows you to filter out the unwanted, you don't have to look very hard to find them.

I entered the phrase "Catholic faith" and found a handful of terrific, short videos. One called "Father Jock" tells the story of a college football player who became a priest. Another, "Father Jeffrey," is a series of short talks on subjects ranging from the late Steve Irwin to the shallowness of the MTV awards.

Other videos present sacred images set to lovely music or a thought-provoking encounter among a pair of Catholic college students and an evangelical Christian.

If you enter "Catholic religion," you get a different set of videos that are just as interesting and inspiring. The word "Catholic," however, by itself brought up several samples from the irreverent cartoon show, "South Park."

Avoiding the garbage on YouTube means selecting your search terms carefully. And if a video somehow gets through your filter, you can always send it to the oblivion of cyberspace by clicking the stop button. How easy is that?

Father Jeffrey recognizes, as Lewis did, that much of the media is nonsense, but in one of his videos he states that we can't write off the media because we find some of it offensive. Amen!

Water from the ocean may be undrinkable, but that doesn't stop us from fishing.

Walking with the Lord

Part 5 of a 7-part series on the second annual Eucharistic Congress

One of the most memorable parts of our first Eucharistic Congress was the eucharistic procession. Last year, Bishop Peter J. Jugis, accompanied by thousands of the faithful, carried the Blessed Sacrament in procession through the streets of uptown Charlotte for the first time in the history of our diocese.

Many participants remarked on the unexpected display of reverence shown by construction workers, police officers and other passersby. And just a few months ago, a similarly unprecedented event took place along the streets of downtown Asheville during the diocesan Eucharistic Conference.

Clearly, eucharistic processions are among the most unforgettable and significant features of the Eucharistic Congress and, indeed, the practice of our Catholic faith. But what is the meaning of these eucharistic processions?

A book by Pope Benedict XVI released not long ago is a compilation of talks and sermons given by then-Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger and offers a few insights into this mystery of our faith.

"God Is Near Us: The Eucharist, the Heart of Life" contains a sermon that the pontiff delivered many years ago on the feast of Corpus Christi. He described the hallmark Corpus Christi procession of the Blessed Sacrament as "standing before the Lord, walking with the Lord and kneeling before the Lord."

Standing before the Lord. The mystery of standing before the Lord begins with the recognition that the holy Eucharist is the true Body and Blood, Soul and Divinity of Jesus Christ, not merely a symbol or representation.

To stand before the Eucharist is indeed to stand before the Lord. But the Holy Father states this realization: "The Eucharist is not a private business, carried on in a circle of friends, in a club of like-minded people, who seek out and get together with those who already suit them; ... thus the [Mass] is the public worship of all those whom the Lord calls, irrespective of their personal make-up."

"It is particularly characteristic of him, as he demonstrated in his earthly life, to have men of diverse groupings, social backgrounds, and personal views brought together in the greater whole of his love."

Pope Benedict concludes, "We are standing for the Lord. And the more we stand for the Lord and before the Lord, the more we stand with one another, and our capacity to understand one another grows again, the capacity to recognize each other as people, as brothers and sisters."

Walking with the Lord. Standing before the Lord unites us into marching formation, preparing us for the mystery of walking with the Lord.

The Holy Father continues, "The Lord who has become our bread is thus showing us the way, is in fact our way, as he leads us ... thus [the eucharistic procession] expounds the meaning of our whole life, of the whole history of the world: marching toward the promised land, a march that can keep on in the right direction only if we are walking with him who came among us as bread and Word."

Kneeling before the Lord. Finally, kneeling before the Lord brings to completion the great mystery of Christ truly among us in the holy Eucharist.

The Holy Father concludes, "The one whom we adore is not some distant power. He has himself knelt down before us to wash our feet."

"And that gives to our adoration the quality of being unforced, adoration in joy and in hope, because we are bowing down before him who himself bowed down, because we bow down to enter into a love that does not make slaves of us but transforms us."

Standing before the Lord, walking with the Lord and kneeling before the Lord compose the mystery that expresses the truth that "God is near us."

Join us Oct. 6-7 at the second Eucharistic Congress, where we will once again be walking with the Lord in procession through the streets of uptown Charlotte.

The church and the United Nations

Q. What is the teaching of the Catholic Church about the United Nations? The attitude we hear often today is that it is a travesty, an effort to take away our national pride and independence. It has done many good things, but some of its actions have been far from perfect. Has the church ever condemned this organization? (Pennsylvania)

A. Your feelings are perhaps understandable. Anything human is imperfect. And any effort to place nearly 200 nations representing 6 billion people around a table to wrestle with the most complex issues of international justice and peace is bound to be about as imperfect and frustrating as one could imagine.

While the faults of the United Nations, therefore, are many, the position of the Catholic Church has been clear from the beginning. The United Nations is the only world organization attempting not only to "facilitate mere coexistence among nations," but to "organize the brotherly collaboration of the world's peoples."

This purpose reflects "the ideal of which mankind dreams on its pilgrimage through time." The quotes are from Pope Paul VI, speaking at the United Nations.

"The edifice you have constructed," he said, "must never fail. ... You mark a stage in the development of mankind from which retreat must never be admitted."

This has been the Catholic position since the United Nations was founded. Popes Pius XII, John XXIII, Paul VI and John Paul II have recognized its weaknesses, but insist it is still the best hope for world peace and order.

This supportive attitude is confirmed by the presence of a permanent Vatican observer at the United Nations, and the unflagging encouragement and support the church has offered to major U.N. agencies since its founding after World War II.

No one was a more fervent champion of the United Nations than the late Pope John Paul II. Speaking to the U.N. General Assembly in October 1995, for example, he declared, "My words are meant as a sign of the interest and esteem of the Apostolic See and of the Catholic Church for this institution."

"They echo the voices of all those who see in the United Nations the hope of a better future for human society."

A major obstacle to this hope is, of course, a perverted form of national autonomy, a subject to which Pope John Paul returned several times.

"Nationalism, particularly in its most radical forms, is thus the antithesis of true patriotism," he said. "Today we must ensure that extreme nationalism does not continue to give rise to new forms of the aberrations of totalitarianism."

The United Nations, he continued, is capable of being a "moral center" developing a shared awareness of the world as a family of nations, a family of mutual trust and respect. In this, as in any "authentic family, the strong do not dominate; instead the weaker members, because of their very weakness, are all the more welcomed and served."

The mere reading of those words is a painful reminder of how far this nation and others, and the United Nations, have yet to go on the journey toward an orderly and just world.

But the stand of our church is certain. There exists no other institution on earth to give us hope that, as Pope John Paul said, "with the help of God's grace we can build in the next century (our current century) and the next millennium a civilization worthy of the human person, a true culture of freedom."

Keeping up with life's changes

Guest Column

JUDY SMITH

As the seasons change from summer to fall, it can be a good time to reflect on estate plans and other arrangements that provide for family members and other loved ones.

The foundation of most estate plans is a will, used either alone or in conjunction with a living trust, life insurance policies, retirement accounts, joint ownership arrangements, or other financial management plans.

When planning a will, it is best to work with professional advisors who are experienced in estate planning so that your goals and objectives will be met with a minimum of fees, concerns and delays.

Once your plans are in place, it is also important to review them every few years. Minor changes can usually be accomplished through simple adjustments to existing plans. Major changes, on the other hand, sometimes require a fresh look at your overall arrangements.

A variety of factors — some obvious, some not — can affect your estate plan, including:

- Births, marriages or deaths within your family;
- A change in your marital status;
- Significant increases or decreases in your financial status;
- The inability or unavailability of the named executor, personal representative or trustee to settle your estate;

- Moving to another state or acquiring property in a different state;
- Selling or giving away property;
- Changes in federal and/or state tax laws; and

- A desire to include charitable gifts as part of your estate plan.

You may also wish to include your parish, Catholic school, agency, the diocese or the diocesan foundation as a beneficiary to receive a portion of the assets remaining in your estate. You simply stipulate whether you wish for the entire balance, a specific amount, or a percentage of your estate to be designated as your gift.

Keep in mind that you can provide that a gift be made only if your other beneficiaries are unable to receive the funds. This way you can assure that your heirs' future security is not jeopardized in any way.

Up-to-date plans ensure that your wishes will be followed and bring you, and those who rely on you, added peace of mind.

Neighborhoods near and far

Love, kindness can create better world for all

"When Jesus said to 'love your neighbor,'" said my friend, holding her hands over her ears to block out the noise of her neighbor's chain saw next door, "he surely didn't mean that guy."

We've all felt that way at one point or another. Sometimes we are that neighbor. Sometimes we both share the blame.

Certain branches of the single tree in my backyard hang over onto our neighbor's property. He doesn't like how berries from the tree drop into his yard in late summer and has requested that we chop it down.

We love the tree, though, so we told him we'd look into having someone professionally trim down the offending branches. That's when the misunderstanding happened: He cut the tree branches himself.

Last week we had yet another disagreement about the tree and afterward stalked back into our respective houses feeling terrible about the situation, no doubt uttering sentences such as my friend's above.

For many people, living in a neighborhood — whether in cul-de-sac suburbia or close-packed city — no longer resembles a 1950s-type model of care and cooperation.

For some, "neighborhood" is an alien world. For others, it's a hostile atmosphere, a war zone.

It's not easy, these days, to live as neighbors.

My grandmother tells me of the days when the grass in each backyard on her street was completely unencumbered by the maze-like wood and chain-link fences that now divide house from house.

Tight-knit neighbors used to share everything from stories to lawn tools on summer nights.

Now, she says, her neighbors don't even know each other's first names.

If you're a teen growing up today, being in a close-knit neighborhood is often more the exception than the rule. It isn't as easy to love your neighbors as you want it to be — especially not when they're noisy, rude, unfriendly or any number of things.

In college I'd regularly hear thudding rap beats from the basement and crashing rock riffs from the guys next door when I was trying to sleep at midnight.

Growing up, the mere touch of my dog's feet to a nearby lawn while I was walking him earned us screaming verbal abuse from the lawn's owner.

My friend's neighbor wakes up at 6 a.m. on Saturday to tackle noisy home improvement projects. And that's only the beginning of the "neighbor stories" I've heard or experienced.

Coming of Age

It would be easy to be annoyed at these people — to put up fences of our own, to turn up the volume and stay in our own yards, blocking them out. It would be easy, but I don't think it would be right.

The world the teens of today are inheriting is a world growing smaller every year, growing more interdependent, tied together by technology and other forces. If you can imagine the world as one big modern neighborhood, you can also imagine what might be going on between people in the "houses."

The fences countries put up between themselves, the angry misunderstandings and fights both small and large, attitudes of entitlement that advance one's own "improvement projects" at the cost of neighbors' happiness show that it's time to turn all this around.

Jesus did mean "that guy" — the one my friend felt should be excluded from being loved. The effort we make in loving him — chain saw and all — shows us how we can love our neighbors on a larger level and create a world in which we all will want to live.

DEERFIELD BEACH, Fla. (CNS)—How does a racehorse build a house?

No, there's no punch line. If the horse is 4-year-old Lis Mara, it's by winning races and donating the proceeds to Food for the Poor, a Deerfield Beach-based Christian relief organization that provides food, education, housing and medical aid to 16 countries in the Caribbean and Latin America.

Eight homes will be constructed in Cap Haitien, Haiti, thanks to the winnings donated by the horse's co-owners, Mike Gulotta and Andy Willinger. The street where the houses will stand is to be named Lis Mara Drive.

"Lis Mara bought those houses for homeless people in Haiti, and he will be buying a lot more," said Gulotta, a member of Immaculate Conception Church in Annandale, N.J.

The horse has won more than $993,000 in 2006, including the $500,000 Breeders Crown Open Pace this summer at the Meadowlands in New Jersey and the Sept. 7 Des Smith Classic in Ottawa, where Lis Mara set a Canadian record.

"Lis Mara is clearly the best colt we have had," said Gulotta of his MJG Racing Stables in Annandale. "We built three houses in Haiti after he won the Canadian Pacing Derby because I wanted the good to be shared. You cannot be blessed like this and not give back."

Robin Mahfood, president of Food for the Poor, said Haiti's poor "simply need a chance at survival."

"Our poverty-stricken brothers and sisters were born into a world they did not ask for," he added. "Gulotta and Willinger have helped to renew their faith in a merciful God by helping to establish a new community."

Gulotta said he hopes the community will eventually have 100 houses funded by the racehorse's winnings.

"People in Haiti are in such dire need," he said. "If we can help them, while enjoying the fruits of Lis Mara's victories, then it is a wonderful combination."

Retake moral high ground on detainees, bishop urges senators

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The U.S. must regain the moral high ground when it comes to treatment of detainees, said the chairman of the U.S. bishops' Committee on International Policy.

In a Sept. 15 letter to U.S. senators, Bishop Thomas G. Wenski of Orlando, Fla., asked their support for legislation that unambiguously rejects torture and cruel treatment of prisoners.

The letter came as the Senate weighed legislation that would govern treatment of those detained by the United States, particularly at locations such as the U.S. facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, where they are not subject to rights granted prisoners on U.S. soil.

The legislative efforts follow reports over the last couple of years about the mistreatment of detainees held by the U.S. military or the federal government.

Bishop Wenski noted that last year the U.S. bishops supported provisions in the Defense Appropriations Act setting uniform standards for interrogation and prohibiting cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment of people under the control of the U.S. government.

"When Congress adopted them, the United States began to answer the profound moral question of how we should treat detainees," Bishop Wenski wrote. "This issue has a major impact on human dignity and on the way the United States is viewed abroad."

Since that bill was signed into law, the White House has encouraged revisions that would allow conditions under which the United States is not bound to follow restrictions on how interrogations are conducted.

Bishop Wenski's letter said U.S. troops and citizens abroad benefit from the Geneva Conventions' standards.

"Preserving the strong U.S. commitment to humane and ethical treatment of detainees would continue your efforts to restore the moral credibility of the United States at a crucial time," he said.

Pope names foreign minister at ceremony for new secretary of state

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI appointed French Archbishop Dominique Mamberti, a 20-year veteran of the Vatican diplomatic corps, as the Vatican's foreign affairs minister.

The pope made the surprise announcement at the end of a ceremony Sept. 15 to welcome the new secretary of state, Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, and bid farewell to his predecessor, Cardinal Angelo Sodano.

Archbishop Mamberti, 54, has been the apostolic nuncio in Sudan since 2002 and also in Eritrea since 2004. Since 1986 when he entered the Vatican diplomatic service, he has held posts in Algeria, Chile, the United Nations in New York and Lebanon, and has worked in the Secretariat of State's section for foreign affairs.

Born in Morocco, he is said to be knowledgeable about the Muslim world, and speaks French, Italian, English and Spanish. He was ordained in 1981 and has degrees in civil and canon law.

Archbishop Mamberti's formal title is secretary for relations with states, head of the foreign policy section of the secretary of state's office. He replaces Italian Archbishop Giovanni Lajolo, who was made president of the commission governing Vatican City State, a position formerly held by U.S. Cardinal Edmund C. Szoka.

The ceremony at the pope's summer residence in Castel Gandolfo marked the changing of the guard in two of the top three positions at the Secretariat of State, 17 months after Pope Benedict was elected.

In separate speeches, Cardinal Bertone and Cardinal Sodano both underlined that while the Roman Curia is important, it is the pope who guides it.

To date, Pope Benedict has named three new heads of the Roman Curia's top 21 departments.

Pope deplores slaying of nun in Somalia, calls for religious respect

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI deplored the slaying of an Italian missionary nun in Somalia and called for mutual respect of religious convictions among peoples.

A telegram sent in the pope's name by the Vatican secretary of state, Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, called the Sept. 17 killing of Consolata Sister Leonella Sgorbati tragic and barbaric.

The pope said he hoped that "the blood shed by such a faithful disciple of the Gospel may become a seed of hope for building authentic fraternity between peoples, in the mutual respect of the religious convictions of every person."

The papal telegram was sent to the head of the Consolata religious order in Rome and was made public Sept. 19.

Sister Sgorbati and her bodyguard were shot and killed as they left a children's hospital in Mogadishu where she worked. Authorities arrested one suspect and said they believed a second gunman was involved.

A spokesman for the Supreme Islamic Courts Council, which controls and administers Mogadishu, said there was no established link between the slaying and the widespread indignation among Muslims over a recent speech by Pope Benedict in Germany.

The papal telegram said Sister Sgorbati had carried out her mission with joy, working in favor of children and health formation. Her work was appreciated, it said.

Islamic leaders in Somalia have condemned the killing, emphasizing that Sister Sgorbati was dedicating her efforts to the Somali people. The 65-year-old nun had worked in Africa for 35 years and had been in Somalia since 2001.

According to Sister Marzia Feura, who was with her after she was shot, Sister Leonella murmured "I forgive" three times before dying.

Bishop Giorgio Bertin, apostolic administrator of Mogadishu, told the Vatican's Fides news agency that tensions have been increasing in Somalia for a number of reasons, including inflammatory statements by extremists.

The bishop said the aim of the gunmen was to "strike a Catholic nun, any nun. The ambush was premeditated. The killers knew at what time Sister would go home for lunch and they knew where to strike."

The nun's funeral was planned for Sept. 21 in Nairobi, Kenya, where she was to be buried.

Archbishop says Vatican has high regard for U.S. Catholic colleges

BRIGHTON, Mass. (CNS) — One of the greatest contributions Catholic institutions of higher learning can offer society is their "uncompromising Catholicity," the secretary of the Vatican Congregation for Catholic Education told an audience that included presidents and faculty members from several Boston-area Catholic colleges.

Archbishop J. Michael Miller stressed the importance the Vatican places on America's Catholic colleges and universities in an address Sept. 11 at Jesuit-run Boston College in Brighton.

"Not unaware of this country's superpower status and despite the fact that only 6 percent of the world's Catholics are American, the Holy See recognizes the unique role of the United States in the globalized world of higher education," he said.

Archbishop Miller focused on the need for U.S. Catholic universities to embrace their Catholic identity and to foster an integral humanism, counterbalancing institutions that fragment knowledge and leave out any reference to the faith. He challenged Catholic U.S. colleges and universities to be the leaven of academic renewal.

Middle school student receives Young Peacemaker Award

HIGH POINT — Charlie Greene, an eighth-grader at Immaculate Heart of Mary School in High Point, has been awarded a Young Peacemaker Award.

The award was presented by Win-Win Resolutions, a group that holds conflict-resolution workshops in schools, to Charlie and six other Triad-area middle school students during a banquet Sept. 11.

Win-Win Resolutions aims to recognize young people who work toward creating more peaceful environments in their schools.

Charlie and Carly Griffin, also an eighth-grader at Immaculate Heart of Mary School, were among the 31 Triad-area middle schoolers nominated for the award. Both Charlie and Carly were nominated by Terry Aiken, guidance counselor at Immaculate Heart of Mary School.

Charlie was selected for the award for helping Aiken create "Building Character," a five-week program focusing on respect, bullying and diversity. Charlie helped Aiken brainstorm relevant topics for the program, and planned and organized individual sessions.

"Charlie exhibited positive role modeling through his understanding of peacefulness and active examples of good human relations," says Aiken.

Winners of the Peacemaker awards received items such as gift cards and savings bonds donated by local businesses.

After the fire

Bishop Peter J. Jugis inspects a fire-damaged section of St. Joseph Vietnamese Church in Charlotte Sept. 18. Firefighters responded to the fire Sunday morning, Sept. 17. No injuries were reported.

"As soon as I heard of the fire, I went to see the extent of the damage," said Bishop Jugis. "I wanted to show my concern to the parishioners of St. Joseph Vietnamese Church."

"Thankfully, there were no injuries and everyone evacuated safely," he added.

The original church and community center were dedicated in November 1999, and Bishop Jugis dedicated the new church in May 2004. The facility, which includes offices and an education center, totals almost 22,300 feet.

The Vietnamese community in the Diocese of Charlotte is estimated at more than 9,000 people.

Exploring stewardship

Parishioners visit with representatives of the various parish ministries and groups during the stewardship fair at St. Patrick Cathedral Sept. 17. Father Paul Gary, rector, said the Sept. 16-17 fair was a good way for parishioners to explore ways in which they could give back to the parish and the community.

Stewardship has been a high priority of the Diocese of Charlotte since 1988. The U.S. bishops' 1992 pastoral letter, "Stewardship: A Disciple's Response," reinforces the diocese's commitment to work toward educating and assisting parishes and individuals in adopting this way of life.

25 million people, 90 percent of whom are baptized Catholics. A significant percentage of adults earn about $2 per day, said Father Lawlor.

Luis Lecaros, a parishioner of St. Vincent de Paul Church and native of Lima, Peru, approached Father Lawlor last year with the idea of mission work in Latin America.

"I had been on a couple of trips. I served as a translator and chaplain for a medical mission to the Dominican Republic and was also a volunteer on a mission trip to Jamaica with a group from St. Matthew Church," said Father Lawlor.

Lecaros told Father Lawlor about his visit to a mission in the jungle area of Pucallpa, where he helped build a natural gas plant for Duke Energy.

"It sounded as though this was where the Lord was leading us," said Father Lawlor. "I gratefully accepted Luis' offer to be my guide to visit this out-of-the-way place. I was welcomed by the priests, sisters and lay persons with great hospitality."

Seven months prior to their trip, Father Lawlor began communicating via e-mail with the four sisters, members of the Daughters of Our Lady of Mercy, who provide most of the pastoral care to the Catholics of Aguaytia.

The nearest priests are about four hours away and rotate through the mission territory; one of them celebrates a Mass in Aguaytia about every three months.

"In the Apostolic Vicariate of Pucallpa, there are only 20 priests. Many are missionaries from other countries," said Father Lawlor.

"The sisters are the Catholic presence in the community. They are known and respected in the region," he said. "They teach the faith and call forth catechists and lay leaders. They visit the sick, care for the poor and are involved in all types of charity and pastoral care."

In the absence of a regular Sunday Mass, the sisters lead Communion services.

"Without a resident pastor, the sisters do their best with pastoral counseling. They even lead prayers at funerals in the absence of a priest or seminarian," said Father Lawlor.

Because there is no convent, the four sisters live with local families. While the vicariate is helping them build a convent and pastoral center beside the church, the sisters need help with the cost of paint and furnishings.

"The sisters also need Bibles and catechetical materials for their catechists in the missions," said Father Lawlor.

To help raise funds for the sisters and their outreach, St. Vincent de Paul Church will be taking up a special second collection at the Masses the Oct. 28-29 weekend.

"In our parish, there is a charitable spirit. If there is a hurricane or tsunami, we have special collections," said Father Lawlor.

"I am hoping that our parish will raise at least $10,000 to assist our brothers and sisters in the missions. In the missions, it will go a long way," he said.

"Upon review of their progress, we will consider the possibility of a follow-up mission outreach," he added.

While in Peru, Father Lawlor celebrated Mass in St. Martin de Porres Church, and he and Lecaros visited with Bishop Jaime Rodriguez Salazar in the Diocese of Huanuco.

A highlight was concelebrating the solemnity of St. Rosa de Lima with Bishop Rodriguez Salazar in the cathedral, as St. Rose is a principal patron of Peru, said Father Lawlor. "It was a joyful celebration."

"The experience in the missions of Peru was a great experience of the universal church and of our brotherhood through baptism and ministry," he said. "The church is not bound by nation, culture or language. All of us are brothers and sisters by virtue of baptism."

Pope endorses adult stem-cell research

"The possibilities opened up by this new chapter in research are in themselves fascinating" because adult stem-cell studies have pointed to actual and potential cures of degenerative diseases that would otherwise lead to disabilities or death, the pope said at an audience for participants attending a Vatican-sponsored congress on stem-cell therapy.

"How can I not feel compelled to praise those who dedicate themselves to this research and those who support it and its costs," the pope said Sept. 16 to about 260 congress participants at the papal summer residence in Castel Gandolfo, outside Rome.

Scientists, doctors, scholars and bioethicists met in Rome Sept. 14-16 for an international conference sponsored by the Pontifical Academy for Life and the World Federation of Catholic Medical Associations.

The congress addressed the scientific possibilities and ethical implications in the use of stem cells.

The pope challenged the "frequent and unjust accusations of callousness" aimed against the church for its unwavering stance against the use of embryonic stem cells. The church has always been dedicated to curing diseases and helping humanity, he said.

The resistance the church shows toward embryonic stem-cell research is because the destruction of human embryos to harvest stem cells is "not only devoid of the light of God but is also devoid of humanity" and "does not truly serve humanity," the pope said.

No matter how promising the goals of such research may be, he added, the ends can never justify means that are "intrinsically illicit."

"There can be no compromise and no beating around the bush" when it comes to the direct destruction of human life — even when it is just a freshly conceived embryo, he said.

True progress entails the growth of the person, which means boosting humanity's technical powers and strengthening its "moral capacity," he said.

Research using adult stem cells "deserves endorsement and encouragement when it happily merges scientific knowledge, the most advanced technology, and ethics that respect the human being at every stage of life," Pope Benedict said.

The pope also asked research centers which look to the church for "inspiration" to increase research in non-embryonic stem-cell studies and to strengthen ties with health-care providers in proposing new therapies.

Experts weigh in

During the congress, one researcher said that, while there are more than 70 different therapies that utilize adult stem cells, no cures have yet materialized using embryonic stem cells.

Umbilical-cord blood offers a complete cure for children with severe combined immunodeficiency, and it has shown positive results in brain reconstruction for some children starved of oxygen at birth, said Colin McGuckin, professor of regenerative medicine at the British University of Newcastle upon Tyne.

Researchers have cultivated 20 different human tissues using blood from umbilical cords. Stem cells from bone marrow can make bone and cartilage as well as help regenerate blood vessels and revive damaged tissue, he said.

But despite the numerous success stories using adult stem cells, embryonic stem cells are still getting the bulk of the publicity and funding, said a number of participants.

According to Maureen Condic, an assistant professor of neurobiology and anatomy at the University of Utah, there is a legitimate fascination in finding out how a single cell develops into a complex, functioning human.

Embryonic-cell study "represents a profound and meaningful question for science and biology" she told Catholic News Service Sept. 15.

But money is also at the root of interest in embryonic stem-cell research, she said. Many who advocate for it "have a clear financial interest" in securing government funding, or "they hold patents or they're stockholders in companies" that would generate a lot of money.

Finances and fairy tales

Scientists also have had to learn to spin their research when trying to secure grants and when they speak to the press, Condic said.

Scientists involved in adult stem-cell research are not getting their fair share of the limelight, she said, because they are in a field that is very large and diverse, but the "very small handful" of people actually working with embryonic stem cells "can get together and create a story that's much more unified and compelling."

Many adult stem-cell researchers are too busy helping patients and cannot spend the time or money advocating their work, she said.

McGuckin agreed, saying he hardly ever goes to international meetings to promote his work because of the huge costs involved in travel. He said he was paying out of pocket for all his food and a portion of his travel expenses to attend the Vatican congress.

Getting government funding in the United Kingdom is difficult for nonembryonic studies because "almost everyone" on the panel that decides which projects get money "is an embryonic scientist," he told CNS.

Richard Doerflinger, interim director of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities, said in his address that drumming up "fairy tales" is more widespread in the embryonic stem-cell field because researchers need to overcome moral objections to destroying life.

He cited cases in which researchers misrepresented their work in major publications ranging from the human-cloning hoax in South Korea to the debunked claim by Dr. Robert Lanza, a U.S. researcher, that stem-cell lines were harvested without harming human embryos.

But as those claims have failed to materialize, he said, "researchers have felt obliged to exaggerate and deceive more and more to maintain public trust and financial investments in their efforts."

Science needs to be absolutely committed to the objective truth, he said.

Catholics rallying for pro-life issues

Life Chains to be held around Diocese of Charlotte

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — Catholics will once again be standing up for life across the Diocese of Charlotte and the United States.

The U.S. Catholic Church observes October as Respect Life Month, with Respect Life Sunday falling on Oct. 1.

To help kick off the month and show their support for life, hundreds of parishes in dioceses around the country will be participating in Life Chains. In the Diocese of Charlotte, parishes will be standing along property lines of their respective churches, on city sidewalks and with other church groups in their towns. People will hold pro-life placards with messages such as "Abortion Kills Children" and "Jesus Forgives and Heals."

The U.S. bishops inaugurated the Respect Life program with a resolution they adopted in the spring of 1972. The first of what the resolution called a

Pope reiterates regret, Muslims respond to remarks

Bishop Jugis later told The Catholic News & Herald. "If we accept the program the Holy Father is presenting for a true, honest dialogue, we will come to a greater appreciation of each other's religions and live in peace and harmony in the world."

At the very core of every world religion is a message of love and peace, said Bishop Jugis.

"Jesus is the full revelation of who God is and what God wants of us, and he made love and peace the core of Christianity," said the bishop.

"The pope was asking the Muslims to tell us the true face of Islam, so we can know and enter into a meaningful dialogue with them," he said.

During his Sept. 20 general audience at the Vatican, the pope spoke of his recent trip to Germany and his academic address at the University of Regensburg Sept. 12, and the wave of Muslim indignation that followed.

The pope said his citation of the words of a medieval emperor, which sound "incomprehensibly brusque" in today's world, was "unfortunately misunderstood."

The attentive reader, he said, would have known that he was not agreeing with the polemical criticism of Islam expressed by the emperor.

It was the second time in four days the pope expressed regret at the reaction his historical critique had provoked. At his summer residence in Castel Gandolfo Sept. 17, the pope said he was "deeply sorry" that Muslims were offended by his reference to a historical criticism of Islam, which he said did not "in any way express my personal thought."

The pope said he hoped his explanation and earlier Vatican statements would serve to "appease hearts and to clarify the true meaning of my address, which in its totality was and is an invitation to frank and sincere dialogue, with great mutual respect."

Several Muslim leaders reacted positively to the pope's comments, which were carried live on some Arab TV networks. Other Islamic groups said a fuller apology was needed.

Initial reactions

During his talk at Regensburg, the pope's main theme was how reason and faith must be reconciled in the West, but he introduced it by quoting 14th-century Byzantine Emperor Manuel II Paleologus on the errors of Islam and jihad, or holy war.

Most of the negative Muslim reaction was based on the erroneous assumption that the pope agreed with the quoted material, including the line that Islam had brought "things only evil and inhuman."

Aiman Mazyek, secretary-general of the Central Council of Muslims in Germany, initially responded that he saw no reason to be offended. The pope could not have intended to attack Islam, he said, since Christianity had its own history of violence.

Later, the chairman of the Central Council of Muslims, Ayyub Kohler, told a newspaper it would be a "grand gesture of peace and reconciliation" if the pope issued "a general apology to the Muslims for Crusades, forced baptism and the expulsion of Muslims" throughout history.

Following the pope's expression of regret Sept. 17, the Central Council of Muslims issued a statement saying it hoped the Vatican would dialogue with Muslim representatives "so that the controversy does not lead to a long-term worsening of Christian-Muslim relations."

The statement also sharply condemned "insults and threats of violence against Pope Benedict."

Constantine Dabbagh, head of the Gaza office of the Middle East Council of Churches, criticized the pope's decision to use the medieval quotation in his lecture, saying Pope Benedict should have taken into account the sensibilities of the region in light of the current situation.

He said this behavior created problems not only for the West but also for people living in the region.

Hostile response

Firebombs erupted at several Christian churches in the West Bank, apparently in reaction to the pope's speech; no injuries were reported.

Gunmen shot into St. John Melkite Catholic Church in Nablus, West Bank, Sept. 16.

Protests popped up outside the Vatican embassy in Jakarta, Indonesia; also in London, Pakistan, Turkey and Iran. In Srinagar, the capital of the Indian state of Jammu and Kashmir, protestors clashed with police and burned the pope's effigy.

The Associated Press reported Sept. 20 that a Palestinian group, the Army of Guidance, said "every place relevant to Christians" in Gaza would be a target and the attacks would continue until "the accursed infidel, the Vatican, apologizes to Muslims."

In the Iraqi city of Basra Sept. 18, some 150 people joined a protest organized by a Shiite cleric, burning the pope's effigy along with U.S., Israeli and German flags.

Rita Saadeh, a Melkite Catholic, witnessed the shooting attack on St. John Melkite Church in Nablus.

She described how the gunmen tried to kick down the door and ignited it with gasoline, then shot bullets into the church as she and her brother watched in terror.

She told CNS the Muslim reaction was "very wrong" and carried out without having knowledge of what the pope actually said.

"Why if the pope ... says this ... must we pay? It is not clear until now what the pope said. He was comparing knowledge and faith in religion," she said. "If (Muslims) say anything about the church we don't do anything (to them.) They also say we are terrorists, but we never react in the same way."

In London, a radical British Muslim said the pope should be executed for "insulting" Mohammed, the founder of Islam. Anjem Choudary was among about 100 Muslims who gathered on the plaza of Westminster Cathedral in London to express their anger over the pope's speech.

Speaking to British reporters Sept. 17, Choudary said: "The Muslims take their religion very seriously and non-Muslims must appreciate that, and they must also understand that there may be serious consequences if you insult Islam and the Prophet."

"Whoever insults the message of Mohammed is going to be subject to capital punishment," he said. "There may be people in Italy or other parts of the world who would carry that (the killing of the pope) out."

Some Catholics attending Mass at the London cathedral argued with the protesters, but the demonstration continued peacefully without any arrests.

ISLAM, from previous page

Combating the controversy

Despite the protests and violence by some, others seemed to accept the pope's statements of regret. Indonesian Islamic leaders say they hope fellow Muslims will think clearly and forgive the pope.

"Pope Benedict has offered an apology to all Muslims. We should not do something violent, because it is against our religious teachings," the chairman of the Islamic scholars council told UCA News, an Asian church news agency based in Thailand, Sept. 17.

The scholar, named Amidan, said he regretted the pope's remarks because they could affect the general view of the international community about Islam.

"We might be offended by the wrong remarks of Pope Benedict, but we must be professional, think clearly and seek the best solution," he said.

In Turkey, where initially there had been harsh criticism of the papal speech, Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul said there were no plans to change Pope Benedict's visit to Turkey Nov. 28-Dec. 1. It would be the pope's first trip to a Muslim country.

The New York Times quoted Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, an observant Muslim, as saying Sept. 19: "We respect the pope and all those interested in peace and justice. ... I understand that he has modified the remarks he made."

The Vatican had issued two statements clarifying the pope's speech, saying it had been misinterpreted.

The statements stressed the papal speech was not meant to be a critical assessment of Islam but instead focused primarily on the religious shortcomings of the West; also, that the pope respected Islam and its followers and was unequivocally in favor of interfaith dialogue.

"Indeed it was (the pope) who, before the religious fervor of Muslim believers, warned secularized Western culture to guard against 'the contempt for God and the cynicism that considers mockery of the sacred to be an exercise of freedom,'" said Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, Vatican secretary of state.

Continuing dialogue

Two leaders in U.S. Catholic-Muslim dialogue said Pope Benedict XVI's recent remarks in Regensburg, Germany, about Islam and violence in the name of religion will cause problems but will not reverse 20 years of growing Catholic-Muslim relations in the United States.

John Borelli, special assistant to the president for interreligious initiatives at Georgetown University, told Catholic News Service that as soon as he learned of the pope's remarks "I knew that there was going to be great trouble."

Sayyid M. Syeed, head of the Islamic Society of North America, said, "We were shocked and very saddened," especially since "our generation has been raised to look to the pope as a symbol of unity and a symbol of religious reverence."

"This tragedy cannot set back the clock" on Catholic-Muslim dialogue and mutual understanding, he said. "The atmosphere that we have built jointly has been tremendously cooperative and tremendously mutually appreciated."

Borelli, who was interreligious affairs specialist for the U.S. bishops for 17 years, played a key role in establishing the three regional Catholic-Muslim dialogues co-sponsored by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Syeed played a central role on the Muslim side in forming the Midwest regional dialogue, which is co-sponsored by the Islamic Society of North America. He recently attended the 10th annual Muslim-Catholic retreat co-sponsored by his society and the USCCB.

He said that after learning of the pope's remarks he has been in discussions with Catholic dialogue leaders about what actions they might take, including possibly sending a delegation of Muslims to the Vatican to explain what the "true role of Islam has been through history."

Syeed told CNS he fully agreed "that violence has no role in religion."

"Religion is the spiritual side of man, the angelic side," he said. "The role of religion is to enhance, to reinforce that angelic side, to help us to overcome any tendency towards violence."

Speaking of the history of conflict between Christians and Muslims, he praised Pope John Paul II for creating "a new environment, a departure from all those stereotypes, those mutual recriminations."

"We have to work on that. We expect our present pope as well to reinforce that," he said.

Borelli said "that a situation like this can lead to a great step forward. This has been true in ecumenical and in Jewish relations, too."

Borelli said some who are not interested in dialogue might try to exploit the pope's words for their own purposes, but "we really need to listen to our Muslim partners in dialogue, who really care, and hear what they are saying. ... They don't want this to end like this; they want some kind of serious reflection why all of this — which is beneath the surface, the effects of centuries of hostility and polemics — why the effects of bitterness and suspicion so quickly re-emerge and what can we do about that."

Bishop Jugis said "such a question about the true nature of Islam must be addressed in order to pursue a meaningful dialogue of cultures and religions."

The message of love can be found in some way in all the great religious traditions, said the bishop.

"Jesus, who revealed to us the truth of God, put this message front and center in his own teaching and life," said Bishop Jugis. "He summed it up in his great commandment: 'You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, with all your soul, with all your mind, and with all your strength.... You shall love your neighbor as yourself.'"

50th Anniversary of Our Lady of America The Immaculate Virgin

Beginning on the Feast of the North America Martyrs September 26, 1956. The Blessed Virgin Mary appeared to Sister Mary Ephrem (Mildred Neuzil) at a Precious Blood Sisters Convent in Indiana, and continued to appear to Sister there and at a cloister in Ohio. A summarization of revelations by The Blessed Virgin Mary, under the title of "Our Lady of America," is:

- Our Lady of America expressed Her thanksgiving and encouragement to the U.S. Catholic bishops for the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception at Washington, D.C.;
- She stated Her desires that Her children honor Her by the purity of their lives, and She wishes that America be the country dedicated to Her purity;
- She often emphasized Her desire that the National Shrine of The Immaculate Conception be made a place of special pilgrimage where She wishes to be honored as Our Lady of America, The Immaculate Virgin, with a statue of this likeness placed in this Shrine at Washington, D.C.;
- Our Lady of America stated Her desires to make the whole of America Her shrine by making every heart accessible to the love of Her Son, Jesus;
- She asked Her children to reform their lives, for sanctification from within, so that when God looks at the heart of each, it resembles the Heart of His Divine Son, Jesus;
- Our Lady of America asked for acts of penance and self-denial, and for family prayer of The Rosary so that Her children will recognize The Indwelling Most Holy Trinity;
- Our Lady of America stated that peace is from within, not from without: peace will come when Her children are purified and cleansed from defilement, when Her children can recognize, adore and love The Divine Indwelling Trinity more.

The next Procession of this statue of Our Lady of America is at The Shrine of The Most Blessed Sacrament, Hanceville, AL, on October 7th, 2006 1:00PM, Feast of The Most Holy Rosary

By Thy Holy and Immaculate Conception,
Oh Mary, deliver us from evil.

Ed Sullivan, Catholic press cartoonist, dies at 77

SALEM, Ohio (CNS) — Edmund R. "Ed" Sullivan Jr., a nationally syndicated Catholic press cartoonist and artist, died of cancer Aug. 26 at his home. He was 77.

A funeral Mass was celebrated Sept. 2 at St. Paul Church, in Salem, where he had been a member.

Sullivan, who retired in 1999 as associate editor of the Catholic Exponent, newspaper for the Diocese of Youngstown in northeastern Ohio, had continued to produce his "Beyond the Stained Glass" cartoons for some 35 to 50 diocesan newspapers across the United States.

Though Sullivan never had any formal art training, his cartoons had appeared in the Saturday Evening Post, Colliers, Ladies' Home Journal and other periodicals and books. He also drew the nationally syndicated "Priscilla's Pop" and "Out Our Way/The Willets" cartoons when their original creators retired.

Sullivan also published two book collections, "Laughter Through an Open Window" and "A Gift of Laughter." He was a member of the National Cartoonists Society.

"The Catholic press has lost its most talented and insightful cartoonist," said Lou Jacquet, editor/general manager of the Catholic Exponent.

"Ed Sullivan was unique in the religious press — a blend of pure artistic skill, a razor-sharp wit and the ability to evoke heartfelt laughter from a few deft strokes of his pen and a line of commentary beneath," said Jacquet.

Sullivan is survived by his wife, the former Gerry Van Hovel; a brother, three sisters-in-law and many cousins, nieces and nephews. Burial was in Grandview Cemetery.

Kairos Prize screenwriting contest has $25,000 top award

LOS ANGELES (CNS) — The Kairos Prize, which was intended to be awarded every other year for spiritually uplifting screenplays, has been changed to an annual award.

Top prize in the contest is $25,000, with $15,000 for second place and $10,000 for third place.

Criteria for the Kairos Prize describe screenplays that are wholesome, uplifting and inspirational, and which result in a greater love for, or understanding of, the "one true creator God," according to an announcement from the John Templeton Foundation, which funds the prize.

Only first-time screenwriters are eligible for the award.

Last year's winning scripts were reviewed and considered by Jeffrey Katzenberg of the DreamWorks studio.

The competition is administered by the Christian Film & Television Commission, which publishes the monthly Movieguide newsletter and aims to influence media executives to adopt higher standards "imbued with Christian and traditional family values," the announcement said.

Kairos is a Greek word for "the right time" or "the critical moment."

More details on the Kairos Prize can be obtained at www.kairosprize.com.

Jesus' love overcomes sin, temptation

BY DAN LUBY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Even now, more than 20 years later, I feel the pull of cigarettes.

When I see someone with my old brand, I remember smoking's pleasures deep in my tissues. The feel of a fresh pack tamped down against the back of my hand, the sulfurous smell of the match, the first pull of smoke in my lungs, the instant sophistication bestowed by a smoldering cigarette in my fingers — they all return in a heartbeat, causing me to wonder again what harm there could be in smoking just one cigarette, buying just one pack.

But like most ex-smokers, I can't risk it. In the years I smoked, I tried too many times to "pace myself," to smoke "just a few," utterly without success.

If I valued my health, if I wanted to be around for my children when they grew up, I had to put cigarettes aside and admit that I could not take them up again, that they were just too dangerous to fool with.

Those who have dealt with similar addictions — alcohol, overeating, drugs, gambling, the praise of others, etc. — know, too, that there are some things they have to let go of in order to move ahead in their lives.

In Sunday's Gospel Jesus uses the harsh rhetorical technique of exaggeration to emphasize his point. Hands and feet and eyes are not evil, and Jesus is not advocating literal self-mutilation.

He is, however, challenging us to recognize that even things that are in themselves morally neutral can become dangers if they move us to sin, if they blind us to the truth of God's goodness, if they lead us away from compassion and into the dark prison of selfishness.

The good news is that Jesus surrounds us with a community of love and support through which he guides and sustains us in times of temptation and trial.

Questions:

What is one ordinary part of my life that could be dangerous to me? What support and assistance do I need to help me resist temptation?

Fall's new TV series: More quality, less objectionable content

BY HARRY FORBES
AND DAVID DiCERTO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — The good news about the new fall television season is that, with few exceptions, the quality of the programs is exceptionally high, with far less gratuitous sex, violence and language issues than in recent years.

The networks may be reacting, in part, to fears of Federal Communications Commission recrimination in light of some recent cases of local stations being fined for "indecent" programming. Whatever the reasons, early indications are that the standards and intelligence of writing this season, for the most part, have been raised.

Hoping to follow in the success of hits like "24" and "Lost," serialized shows are hot this year, with a crop that includes Fox's "Vanished," ABC's "Day Break" and "Big Day," CBS' "Smith" and "Jericho," and NBC's "Kidnapped" and "Friday Night Lights."

We've noticed a proliferation of ensemble series, many dealing with groups of disparate strangers whose lives become entwined. ABC's "The Nine" and "Six Degrees," NBC's "Heroes" and "The Class" on CBS all fit that bill.

There's also been a welcome trend toward more diverse casting, including many interracial pairings — a far cry from the days when English pop star Petula Clark caused a firestorm by daring to touch singer Harry Belafonte's arm during a song.

If the new fall slate has a weakness, it's the situation comedies. Some, like Fox's "Happy Hour" are just poor. Others, like NBC's "20 Good Years" and ABC's "The Knights of Prosperity" and "Notes from the Underbelly" have their virtues, but should have been better.

Things are brighter on the drama front, and two ABC comedy-dramas show real heart: the international hit "Ugly Betty" and the Anne Heche vehicle "Men in Trees" — both of which would seem to be winners — as do NBC's two "Saturday Night Live"-themed series, Aaron Sorkin's behind-the-scenes drama "Studio 60 on the Sunset Strip" and the edgy comedy "30 Rock."

All in all, the new fall season shows a lot of promise.

Faith formation for persons with disabilities

Disabilities," at the Catholic Conference Center, Sept. 13.

Rebich, a parishioner of St. John Neumann Church in Charlotte, is a lecturer/supervisor in the Special Education and Child Development Department at the University of North Carolina at Charlotte.

The cartoon perfectly illustrated one of Rebich's points: A person with a disability is often labeled as that disability.

"When we focus on the disability, we lose sight of the person," Rebich said. "Is the person 'handicapped/disabled,' or does she have a handicap?"

Seeing the person not as "autistic," but rather as "having autism," we acknowledge that autism is part of, but not all of, who that person is, she said.

"A person who has Down syndrome is not Down or Down Syndrome Smith," Rebich said. "He's Patrick Smith, who has Down syndrome, ... not a special-ed student, but rather a student receiving special educational services."

Rebich's personal experience inspired her interest in working with people with disabilities. Her older brother, Tim, while still a toddler, underwent an operation that left him with mental disability.

"He is my energy, my teacher, when it comes to special education," she said. "All of us (in her family) are enriched by having Tim as a sibling."

Disabilities often present a challenge, because, said one woman in the audience, "we want to fix things. It's easier to fix something than it is to get to know that person."

"I think a lot of it is just fear of the unknown," Rebich said. "I've grown up with it all my life, so it's second nature to me, but for others it may be that they're afraid they might injure the person or do something wrong."

People with disabilities may be excluded from everyday events, even from fully practicing their faith. Rebich calls these situations "spiritual abuse: the act of denying people considered 'disabled' their full humanity."

Yet, in their "Guidelines for Celebration of the Sacraments with Persons with Disabilities," the U.S. bishops state that, "By reason of their baptism, all Catholics are equal in dignity in the sight of God, and have the same divine calling."

Paul Kotlowski, director of youth ministry for the Diocese of Charlotte, told of a boy in another diocese who had some disabilities. Although these weren't major, he had been so ostracized that he would slink along the wall when he came into a room.

Kotlowski asked the boy to lector at Mass.

"He read with the conviction and authority of Gabriel, to such an extent that when he finished the whole parish gave him a standing ovation," Kotlowski said. "That experience changed everyone's attitude toward him."

Such experiences, he said, "have enriched my whole idea of what we're called to be as people of God."

Called and qualified

Young families today expect their children with disabilities to be included in faith formation along with children who don't have disabilities.

To ensure that those with disabilities are welcome, begin with small steps, such as making sure the church is physically accessible and welcoming to those with disabilities.

Designate a contact for families and persons with disabilities, and publish this information in the parish bulletin and Web site. Invite families with members who have disabilities to become parishioners.

religious education; no college degree necessary.

"God does not call the qualified," Rebich said. "He qualifies those he calls. Caring and compassion are more important than a college degree."

Children with disabilities should be included in regular faith formation classes.

Teachers in religious education classes model what it is like to be welcoming and inclusive. Interacting with children who have disabilities teaches other children to be caring and compassionate.

Parishes can hold workshops on disability issues. Consider visiting other parishes that have programs for children with disabilities.

Begin to network with other churches. Build up disability-related resources in the parish faith formation library. Evaluate the program annually. Plan for expansion.

"Once people hear that you welcome those with disabilities, your program will grow," Rebich said.

St. Matthew Church in Charlotte uses SPRED (Special Religious Development) to assist parishioners of all ages who have developmental disabilities and would benefit from being in a smaller group.

Each SPRED session involves persons with disabilities working one-on-one with helpers, then joining in group interaction, said Jan Clemens, SPRED coordinator at St. Matthew Church.

According to information from Clemens, "SPRED gives parishioners with developmental disabilities an opportunity for celebration and worship and prepares them for the sacraments of initiation and reconciliation."

"Special liturgies during the course of the year are also celebrated as a community. ... No previous experience in working with persons with developmental disabilities is required to participate in this ministry," she said.

New regional coordinators hired for faith formation

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — The western and northern regions of the Diocese of Charlotte will soon have new regional coordinators.

Theresa Prymuszewski will be serving as the coordinator for the western region, which includes the Smoky Mountain and Asheville vicariates.

Theresa Prymuszewski

Sister Betty Paul

Prymuszewski holds degrees in theological studies, education and religious studies.

As regional coordinator, Prymuszewski will provide for all the faith formation needs of the area including catechist formation, policies implementation, home catechesis, catechist recognition and the sacraments of first reconciliation, first Communion and confirmation.

"Theresa lived in North Carolina for several years in the 1980s, so she is familiar with the ministerial landscape of western North Carolina," said Dr. Cris Villapando, director of diocesan faith formation programs.

Providence Sister Betty Paul will be serving as the coordinator for the northern region, which includes the Winston-Salem and Greensboro vicariates.

Sister Paul holds a degree in pastoral ministry and a certificate in advanced studies.

As coordinator for the northern region, Sister Paul will develop local communities by meeting with parish catechetical leaders and youth ministers in the area; will strengthen catechetical endeavors by organizing ongoing catechetical training in the region; and will assess the catechetical needs and educational materials.

Sister Paul will also advise parishes regarding diocesan catechetical and sacramental policies and facilitate adult faith formation.

"Sister Paul's gifts come from the wisdom and experience she has accumulated from her work in the Diocese of Worcester," Villapando said. "It is always enriching for a faith formation office to have employees who have worked in other dioceses."

"The diocesan office of faith formation will be tremendously enriched by the additions of Theresa and Sister Betty," Villapando said.

WHERE ALL THINGS GOD MAY BEGIN

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

Are we doers, hearers or talkers?

Changing the world, ourselves requires action

Are we doers, hearers or talkers? The answer lies in the fourth chapter of the Book of Deuteronomy, which states: "You shall not add to what I command you nor subtract from it." (Dt.4:2)

Adding or subtracting from the teaching of the Lord is not good policy. But in our daily lives, sometimes we make bargains with God. We really believe that only 10 commandments are not enough; we definitely need more to cover all the wrong issues, so we say.

On the other hand, should we observe all Ten Commandments? If we skip one, is it the end of the world? The average of good observance is still 90 percent. Should we be charitable all the time? Every now and then, we can take a little break and still be good Christians.

And the story — our story — goes on.

Well, Yahweh is very clear about it: You observe his commandments without adding or subtracting. You are his all the time or you are not his at all.

Justice is the keyword in this process: God gave us everything we have, and so we give to God everything we have and are.

There are two kinds of gifts: human and divine. The human gifts are meant to be kept. The divine gifts are meant to be given out and to be shared; otherwise we lose them all together.

St. James reminds us that justice is to be doers of the Word rather than hearers of the Word only. To simply know the Word of God is good, but not good enough; prayers are good, but not good enough. What is important is what we do with them.

Let's say that Mr. X needs help, and I go to church and pray instead of helping; then I am using my religion as a way of escape from reality. St. Mark very effectively points out the constant dispute between Jesus and the Pharisees (see chapter 4) about traditions and external observance.

The conclusion of this Gospel is that observing traditions for the sake of external observance is at best a waste, or at worst, is very dangerous.

Probably you know the story of the ashram cat. It is the story of a guru whose worship service was frequently interrupted by a cat, and so the holy man commanded that the cat be tied to a tree during meditation.

When the guru died, his followers continued to tie the cat to the tree. When the cat died, the faithful acquired a new cat that they also tied to the tree.

Centuries later learned scholars and experts wrote voluminous books on the liturgical meaning of the tying up a cat while worship was in progress.

Guest Column

CAPUCHIN

Are we doers, hearers or talkers of the Word? The Gospel points out very strongly that external traditions do not make us better; the internal attitude toward the Word makes us better. More laws do not make anybody holier.

Legal experts will tell you that one of the problems with laws is that there are too many laws. There are amendments, and amendments to the amendments.

We also know that there are thousands of laws written in books that have no meaning at all. Let me list some of them:

- a law forbidding the plowing of a cotton field with an elephant;
- a law banning roller-skating in a public restroom;
- a law penalizing someone for putting a penny upside down;
- a law requiring a person who appears on a highway in a bathing suit to carry a club;
- a law making it illegal to hold one's nose longer than 10 seconds.

Do we need more laws or do we want to observe what we have? By the choices we make, we define ourselves. We are what we chose to be.

There is a lovely story about a man who said the following remarks about himself:

I was a revolutionary when I was young, and all my prayer to God was, "Lord, give me the energy to change the world."

As I approached middle age and realized that half of my life was gone without changing a single person, I changed my prayer to, "Lord, give me the grace to change those who come in contact with me; just my family and friends, and I shall be satisfied."

Now that I am old and my days are numbered, my only prayer is, "Lord, give me the grace to change myself."

If I had prayed for this right from the start, I should not have wasted my life. Amen

The pope — speaking like a leader

DIALOGUE, PRAYER NEEDED FOR FIRST STEPS TOWARD PEACE

So, what is going to be the lasting image of Pope Benedict XVI? Will he be the provocateur who enraged a billion members of the Muslim faith by "insulting" the prophet Muhammad? Or will he be the leader whose thought-provoking speech in Germany is seen as an important step in a more serious Christian-Islam dialogue?

The sharks of the secular media are circling a thimbleful of blood and seem to be hoping for the former. We Catholics should pray for the latter.

The media was doing its surface-skimming job when it excerpted, out of context, the line from the Holy Father's speech last week in Germany that was sure to inflame the passion of some Muslims. If the situation were reversed and a Muslim cleric made a remark that could be viewed as an insult of Jesus, Christians may have been just as enraged and the media would have been just as happy.

The media isn't anti-Christian; it is pro-conflict.

First, let me explain how the media works when it is confronted with a 3,700-word speech written by an academic pope for an audience of university scholars.

Having flipped through hundreds of somewhat dry, difficult-to-grasp speeches in my reporting days, I know that the media's instinct is to take the complex and simplify. Reporters search the text for a quote that a large audience can grasp.

The practical reason for taking this shortcut is time and space — both are limited in newspapers and television programs. If the quote can inflame, the context of the speech is tossed aside and the story is about the quote.

This situation involving the pontiff needs to be treated differently. We Catholics must be better informed than what is available through the secular press: What Pope Benedict was doing in his speech was continuing the call to dialogue with Muslims begun by Pope John Paul II.

Pope Benedict spoke in a place

Catholics & the Media

DAVID HAINS
COMMUNICATIONS
DIRECTOR

where freedom of thought is rigorously defended: a university. His lecture was meant to provoke dialogue, and true to the academic setting in which it was delivered, he defended his statements with sound reason, church teaching and Scripture. When the media orchestration of hate-filled speech subsides, no doubt a Muslim scholar will emerge with a reply that will promote additional discussion.

Our obligation as Christians is to learn about these issues in greater depth. We cannot depend on the everyday media for anything other than a news flash. Fortunately we are not at the mercy of Fox and CNN for all of our information.

The Holy Father's speech, as well as thought-provoking commentary and analysis of it, is easy to find on the Internet. We are always just a few keystrokes away from the truth.

Christians and Muslims have a lot to talk about, and some of the discussions won't be very nice. Think of the idiocy of the Crusades or the current madness of jihad. But talk we must. The last three months in the Middle East have given us ample evidence that peace will not emerge from the barrel of a gun.

Only when people of faith are willing to work harder than any soldier ever has will we be able to settle our differences through thought-provoking discussion and prayer. Starting that discussion is what leaders do. Thank you, Pope Benedict.

Letters to the Editor

Priests deserve more respect, gratitude

It is with much regret that I write this letter, but I believe I need to make a point. The recent Priests' Retirement and Benefits Collection taken up in my parish averaged less than less $5 per family - or less than 10 cents per week on an annual basis.

Over the years I have heard many reasons as to why we believe there is a shortage of priests and religious. Maybe the real reason is that many of us put more value in a meal at McDonald's than we do in those who are called to serve us.

— William J. Barker

Diocesan priests are blessings

I am a priest formerly of the Diocese of Charlotte, who now serves as pastor in the Diocese of St. Petersburg, Fla. I would like to comment on the article regarding the Priests' Retirement and Benefits Collection in the Diocese of Charlotte ("Celebrating the past, embracing the future," Sept. 1).

The church of Charlotte indeed owes a great debt of gratitude, besides financial support, to the retired priests. As I read the list of retired priests in the article, I reflected on having the privilege of serving under the leadership of seven of them, including Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin.

From each of them, I learned the pastoral skills that helped me in my ministry as a pastor. I want to thank them for their guidance and inspiration. May God bless them!

Pope again expresses regret that remarks on Islam were misunderstood

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI again expressed regret that his remarks on Islam had been misunderstood and emphasized his “profound respect” for Muslims.

At his weekly general audience Sept. 20 where he reviewed his recent trip to Germany, the pope turned his attention to his academic address at the University of Regensburg and the wave of Muslim indignation that followed.

The pope said his citation of the words of a medieval emperor, which sound “incomprehensibly brusque” in today’s world, was “unfortunately misunderstood.” The attentive reader, he said, would have known that he was not agreeing with the polemical criticism of Islam expressed by the emperor.

In his Regensburg speech, the pope introduced the theme of faith and reason by quoting from statements of 14th-century Byzantine Emperor Manuel II Paleologus, including the emperor’s criticism of the Islamic concept of holy war and the line that Islam had brought “things only evil and inhuman.”

“In no way did I wish to make my own the words of the medieval emperor.

I wished to explain that not religion and violence, but religion and reason, go together,” the pope said.

His words were greeted by strong applause in St. Peter’s Square, where several thousand pilgrims had gathered.

The pope noted that during his trip he had underlined the need for all people to respect what is sacred to religious cultures — something that reflected his esteem for the followers of other religions, “in particular Muslims,” he said.

“I hope that my profound respect for world religions and for Muslims, who worship the one God and with whom we promote peace, liberty, social justice and moral values for the benefit of all humanity, is clear,” he said.

He said he hoped that, after the initial reactions, his speech in Regensburg would come to be understood as “an encouragement to a dialogue that is positive and also self-critical, both among religions and between modern reason and the Christian faith.”

Security around the Vatican was discreetly increased following vague threats made by extremist groups on Internet sites. The pope, however, rode as usual in an open jeep among the faithful at the start of the audience.

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

It was the second time since his return from Germany that the pope had spoken about the controversy. Three days earlier, he said he was “deeply sorry” that some Muslims had found his speech offensive.

Criticism of the papal speech came from Muslim representatives in many countries. Vatican officials have expressed disappointment that most of the reactions were based on media accounts of the papal speech and not on a full reading of the text.

Dialogue of cultures and religions

From the Bishop

BISHOP
PETER J. JUGIS
BISHOP OF CHARLOTTE

It is unfortunate that a portion of the Holy Father’s talk at the University of Regensburg on Sept. 12 was taken out of context and used to misrepresent his true views.

In his talk, the Holy Father calls for a genuine dialogue of cultures and religions. Many in the world today see the prospect of a clash of civilizations of immense proportions looming in the future, specifically a clash of Moslem culture with Western culture.

The Holy Father calls for a dialogue of cultures and religions in order to avert such a worldwide conflict and potential war. Only by such respectful dialogue among cultures and religions can the world hope to live in peace.

As the Holy Father said, the views of the 14th-century emperor do not represent his own sentiments nor the teaching of the Catholic religion regarding Islam. But, by referring to the statement of the emperor, the Holy Father did effectively raise the question: What exactly is the true face of Islam?

Is violence and terrorism such as we see it perpetrated in the world today the true face of Islam? Or is the true face of Islam rather represented by the phrase from the Quran, “there is no compulsion in religion,” which would respect the freedom of the human person to freely assent to religious truth and embrace it?

Such a question about the true nature of Islam must be addressed in order to pursue a meaningful dialogue of cultures and religions.

The Holy Father has noted on another occasion that evidence can be found in all the great religious traditions of the close bond between a relationship with God and the ethics of love. The message of love can be found in some way in all the great religious traditions.

Jesus, who revealed to us the truth of God, put this message front and center in his own teaching and life. He summed it up in his great commandment:

“You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, with all your soul, with all your mind, and with all your strength.... You shall love your neighbor as yourself.” (Mk 12:30-31).

This is true religion.

The Holy Father’s talk was primarily a challenge to the West not to exclude God from its culture. Secularism, such as we have it today, which excludes the divine from the culture, is not the best that the West has to offer in a dialogue of cultures and religions.

It is only by recognizing the great contributions that Christianity has made to Western thought and life that the West will be able to enter effectively into the dialogue of cultures and religions envisioned by the Holy Father.

Speakers of the Congress

Part 6 of a 7-part series on the second annual Eucharistic Congress

Over the past five parts of this series, we have explored the nature of the Eucharistic Congress by means of its constitutive parts. That is, we have investigated those elements that together form the body and soul of the Eucharistic Congress.

The body includes the events: the speakers and their talks, the sacred music concert, the eucharistic procession, the opportunity to receive the sacrament of reconciliation, the wonderful selection of religious goods and Catholic books for sale and, most importantly, the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass.

But the body is dead without the soul. Prayer, adoration of the Blessed Sacrament and the fellowship enjoyed among Congress participants are all signs of the mysterious work of the Holy Spirit giving life to the body.

This week, I would like to spend a moment focusing our attention on one of the most crucial elements that composes the body of the Congress: the speakers and their talks.

Eucharistic congresses attempt to discover and promote the best and the brightest speakers of the day, along with relevant talks that challenge the faithful to live the Catholic faith. This year, our theme comes from the second letter of St. Paul to the Corinthians, “The Love of Christ Impels Us.”

The theme draws our attention to the apostolic works of the Catholic Church — the charitable, educational and evangelical works that are impelled by the love of Christ. Last year’s Congress focused on the Eucharist as the source and summit of our Catholic faith and life; this year’s Congress focuses on the missionary efforts of the church inspired by the love of Christ.

Therefore, each of the renowned speakers has chosen talks with a missionary goal. Friday evening, Oct. 6, Raymond Arroyo from the Eternal Word Television Network (EWTN) will kick off the Congress talks with “The Mission of the ‘Big Way’ of Mother Angelica.”

As with last year, there will be four series of talks on Saturday: General Track, Hispanic Track, Teen Track and Children’s Track (this year broken into two age groups: Kindergarten through second grade and third grade through fifth grade).

Back by popular demand, break dancer and karate expert Father Leo Patalinghug will speak to the youth on “The Mission of Being a Super Hero” and to the adults on “The Mission of Being Beautiful,” and will probably break a few boards in the process.

Franciscan Father James Goode will address “The Mission of Building a Culture of Life.” The famous apologist

Guest Column

FATHER
MATTHEW BUETTNER
GUEST COLUMNIST

Jeff Cavins will speak at the General Track about “The Mission of Evangelization” and at the Teen Track about “The Mission of Peer Evangelization.”

Speaking to teenagers and adults is Mary Beth Bonacci on “The Mission of Chastity.” Father Juan Rivas will give a two-series talk at the Hispanic Track on “The Mission of Catholic Media” and “The Mission of Evangelization.”

And Dr. Fernando Casanova will speak at the Hispanic Track on “The Mission of Being Catholic.”

The Eucharist Congress clearly packs an evangelical punch with a missionary goal. But the Congress will be completely ineffectual without your participation.

Join us at the Charlotte Convention Center this Oct. 6 and 7 for the second annual Eucharistic Congress. The Congress promises to help keep body and soul together.

SPECIAL EVENTS FOR CHILDREN AND TEENS!

DIOCESE OF CHARLOTTE EUCCHARISTIC CONGRESS

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7

Dear First Communicants:

This year you have celebrated your First Holy Communion. It has been a time of blessing for yourself and for your family, and for your parish family, as well.

Please join me, along with your parents or guardian, for a Eucharistic Procession on Saturday, October 7th, in Charlotte. As a First Communicant, you will lead our procession as we make this public statement of our love for Jesus.

Please wear the special clothing you wore to your First Communion. The procession will form at St. Peter's Church at 501 S. Tryon Street at 1 pm on Saturday and it will begin promptly at 1:30 pm. Please note that you MUST be accompanied by a parent or a guardian to participate in the Eucharistic Procession.

Sincerely yours in Christ,

+ Peter J. Jugis

Pope expresses respect for Muslims, pledges to continue dialogue

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

CASTEL GANDOLFO, Italy — Meeting with Islamic ambassadors and representatives, Pope Benedict XVI expressed his deep respect for Muslims, pledged to continue dialogue, and said Islamic and Christian leaders should cooperate to curb violence.

"Faithful to the teachings of their own religious traditions, Christians and Muslims must learn to work together, as indeed they already do in many common undertakings, in order to guard against all forms of intolerance and to oppose all manifestations of violence," the pope said.

"As for us, religious authorities and political leaders, we must guide and encourage them in this direction," he said.

The unprecedented encounter at the pope's summer residence Sept. 25 was designed to soothe Muslim resentment over a recent papal speech that cited a historical criticism of Islam and the concept of holy war. The pope later distanced himself from the quoted material and said he was sorry Muslims had been offended.

Addressing the Islamic representatives at Castel Gandolfo, the pope alluded only briefly to the earlier speech. Instead, he focused on assuring Muslim communities that his papacy was not backtracking on

WALKING WITH FAITH

Amedeo Scaramouche, 101, walks near St. Martin Church in New Derry, Pa., in early July. Scaramouche was 6 years old when his family joined the parish. Now, nearly 96 years later, he still walks to Mass every day from his home nearby. He will turn 102 in November.

At age 101, Pennsylvania man still walks to church for Mass every day

NEW DERRY, Pa. (CNS)—Amedeo Scaramouche was 6 years old when his family joined St. Martin Church in New Derry. Now, nearly 96 years later, Scaramouche walks to Mass every day from his home nearby.

It is the home where the 101-year-old man grew up, lived with his beloved wife, Susan, and where he continues to live, still lovingly tending his garden.

He still remembers the iron fence that used to surround St. Martin Church and its cemetery. Photographs he took at the request of one of the pastors are framed and hang on the back wall of the church.

Scaramouche sang in the parish choir for many years. Although he and his wife weren't married at St. Martin Church, their son served as an altar boy there.

Scaramouche's life was tough. He never went to high school. Instead, he joined his father in the coal mines.

"My pap was laying track (for the mines), and I was helping him. But I wanted to make more money so I began digging coal when I was 16," Scaramouche said.

His father died later that year, and it became the young man's responsibility to support his mother and younger brothers.

"I took care of everything; I even paid off the land," he said.

Later, he held jobs at Westinghouse in Derry and at a glass factory in Blairsville.

He and wife Susan were married when the Depression hit.

"When I got married, I hit the jackpot," Scaramouche said with eyes turning misty. "She was a wonderful person. Everybody loved her."

The couple had been married for 67 years when Susan Scaramouche died about nine years ago.

"She told me she wanted to die at home. I was feeding her one day and she said, 'I love you and I thank you for everything,'" he said. "I have her in my mind every day."

On Nov. 25, Scaramouche plans to celebrate his 102nd birthday by singing at a parish Mass.

Catholic organizations back bill to help disabled avoid nursing homes

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops and two other national Catholic organizations have backed proposed federal legislation that would enable many people with disabilities to live in their communities instead of in nursing homes.

The legislation would help those with disabilities use Medicaid resources to choose independent living, with reliance on community-based services, over Medicaid-funded institutionalized care.

In a joint letter to key House and Senate sponsors of the bill, the heads of the USCCB Committee on Domestic Policy, the Catholic Health Association of the United States and the National Catholic Partnership on Disability urged passage of the Medicaid Community-Based Attendant Services and Supports Act, known as MiCASSA.

"With the services that MiCASSA would make available, more people with disabilities will be able to move from institutional care to lives of independence in their communities," the Catholic leaders said in their Sept. 13 letter.

"The legislation will give them the choices and control over their lives they deserve. It will also increase the ability of people with disabilities to fulfill the duty we all share, to contribute to the common good through work, service and participation in the community," they said.

"Our faith calls us to work for the full inclusion of all persons with disabilities in society and in the church," the Catholic leaders added.

The letter recalled the bishops' 1978 "Pastoral Statement on People With Disabilities," which called on all people to work for improved living conditions for those with disabilities and seek to ensure that they can achieve the fullest possible measure of personal development.

The services that MiCASSA would make available would help achieve those goals, the letter said.

Catholic, Orthodox cite friendship, plan for 2007 dialogue meeting

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Catholic and Orthodox representatives ended an important theological meeting on a good note, citing a "spirit of friendship" and making plans for a follow-up encounter next year.

A joint statement issued at the end of the Sept. 18-25 meeting in Belgrade, Serbia-Montenegro, said the approximately 60 participants had discussed in depth a draft document that touched on papal primacy and the role of Eastern Catholic churches.

The draft document "was carefully examined in a shared spirit of genuine commitment to the search for unity," the statement said.

A joint committee was appointed to revise the text in light of the many observations and comments made during the discussions. The revised text is expected to be taken up in a meeting hosted by the Catholic Church in 2007, the statement said.

It was the first time the Catholic-Orthodox international dialogue commission had met since 2000, when talks were broken off over tensions related to the re-emergence of Eastern Catholic churches in post-communist Eastern Europe.

"The meeting of the joint commission was marked by a spirit of friendship and trustful collaboration," the statement said.

It said the draft document, titled "The Ecclesiological and Canonical Consequences of the Sacramental Nature of the Church: Conciliarity and Authority in the Church," was discussed at three levels of the church's life: local, regional and universal.

The statement offered few details of the discussions. Catholic participants said before the meeting that papal primacy was thought to be the most important and problematic issue on the table and that the Belgrade meeting would be part of a long process eventually leading, it was hoped, to some form of agreement.

Pope Benedict XVI, while in Germany in September, had said he hoped the Belgrade meeting would lead to real ecumenical progress between Catholics and Orthodox Christians.

Historian says archives erase claims church did not oppose Nazism

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Documents now available from the Vatican Secret Archives will allow scholars to rewrite history and erase claims the church was not a staunch opponent of Nazism, fascism and other forms of totalitarianism, said a Jesuit historian.

Jesuit Father Giovanni Sale, historian of the Jesuit journal, La Civiltà Cattolica, said documents relating to the 1922-1939 pontificate of Pope Pius XI will have an impact on political and religious history.

What emerges is an even clearer picture of the church as being "steadfast in the fight against totalitarianism, against fascism, against Nazism, but also against communism," he said in a Sept. 18 interview with Vatican Radio.

After years of preparation, the Vatican archive office Sept. 18 opened up to researchers all the documentation from Pope Pius' pre-World War II pontificate.

The documents were considered especially sensitive because they covered the period in which Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli, the future Pope Pius XII, served as nuncio to Germany and then as Vatican secretary of state.

A 1999 book, "Hitler's Pope," accused Cardinal Pacelli of having pro-German feelings that colored his World War II policies as pope, while a 2001 book, "The Popes Against the Jews," claimed top church officials had a hand in fomenting anti-Semitism in the 20th century.

Vatican historians have repeatedly rejected such claims as false.

Father Sale said now that the pre-World War II documents are available scholars "will have the possibility to truly rewrite important pages of 20th-century history — this time based on solid and documented foundations."

He said certain positions that were "often fruit of ideological prejudices" could now be corrected.

An official at the Vatican archives told Catholic News Service that in the first week after the 1922-1939 archives were opened, between 55 and 60 scholars from all over the world were going through the documents each day.

There is no admission fee. Members of Mint Hill Arts will exhibit their works. Dale Jarrett's racing car and vintage automobiles will be on display. Putting the fun in the faith

Program to help teens know, serve Christ

BY KATHLEEN SCHMIEDER
CORRESPONDENT

HENDERSONVILLE — Youth ministry is evolving at Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville.

The parish is introducing Life Teen, an international youth ministry movement that provides resources and faith experiences to help teens get closer to Christ.

"My mission as a youth minister is to help teens fall in love with Christ, and I believe the best way to help that happen is through Life Teen," said Emily Sevier, parish youth minister.

Originally founded in 1985 as a youth group at St. Timothy Church in Mesa, Ariz., the program has grown into a prolific youth ministry in the Catholic Church, with 950 programs established in 20 countries. Life Teen estimates that every Sunday, approximately 120,000 teenagers attend a Life Teen Mass.

"The goal is not just to get teens back to Mass. It's about salvation and making the Gospel relevant to them," said Sevier.

The Life Teen program includes a Sunday night Life Teen Mass with a band, followed by a Life Night at which teens are challenged to learn and live their faith through ministry, involvement and evangelization.

Life Teen is not limited to those already in the faith, but serves as an outreach to all teens in the community, teaching them to understand the love of Christ and the value of a faith-filled life, as well as providing answers they need in order to live a spiritual life in a secular world of dating, family relationships and choosing a vocation.

Sevier was looking for a way to move the parish's teens beyond the limits of the current youth group. She was inspired after attending the recent Steubenville Atlanta youth conference, sponsored by the Franciscan University of Steubenville, Ohio, and co-sponsored by Life Teen.

"The teens wanted something like this," said Sevier. "I started looking into it, what it was, how it worked. ... I called other youth ministers using Life Teen to find out more about it."

Several parishes in the Diocese of Charlotte already utilize the Life Teen program. Sevier learned that every parish with a Life Teen program has seen positive results, and not just for the teens.

"It's been life-changing for youths and spiritually enhancing and renewing for their parishes," she said. "Many people said they have been reawakened in their faith."

When she spoke at Masses calling for interested volunteers, several people came forward with Life Teen experience at other parishes. They all recommended it.

"Many adults are seeing teens leave the church because they can't find things for them to relate to," said Sevier. "Their friends' churches have something vibrant and it attracts them; those churches are doing something to bring in teens."

Life Teen provides all the resources necessary for the program, from teachings "in line with the church and loaded with great information," said Sevier, to training for volunteers and musicians.

"They give you everything you need to spiritually feed your teenagers," she said.

Through training of volunteers, the structure and message remain constant in all the individual groups, insuring a consistent message aimed at strengthening the faith and faithfulness to the teachings of the church.

Sevier attended training this summer in Arizona and has been recruiting volunteers.

The goal is to kick off the program this fall. A band is being arranged for the Life Teen Mass, and the parish is still seeking more adult volunteers to assist with the program.

"Core members are a group of adults, preferably not parents of the members, who will be active participants in the lives of the teens," said Sevier.

The volunteers must be confirmed Catholic adults, at least 21 years old, said Sevier.

"I have a good core group of adults who are onboard and want to see this happen," she said.

Her pastor, Capuchin Father John Aurilia, is "excited about this and can't wait for it to get started," she added.

St. Leo teacher helps orphans, children with HIV in Kenya

Lindsay Shepherd traveled to Kenya to spend the month of July helping infants and children who have lost their parents to HIV/AIDS.

"I grew an emotional attachment to the children, but I expected that," said Shepherd. "The hardest thing for me was knowing that some of those kids, who are the same age as those I teach, have this demon to deal with — HIV."

According to the Amani Children's Foundation, an estimated 13 million children in Africa have been orphaned due to the AIDS pandemic ravaging the continent.

Amani Children's Foundation, a non-profit group based in Winston-Salem, works to assist these children and educate others about their needs. Amani (Swahili for "peace") organizes groups several times a year to travel with them to Kenya.

Shepherd was one of approximately 50 people who made the journey this past summer. The participants were divided into three categories: professionals, university scholars and high school students.

Marielle Kissick and Julie Anne McKellogg, rising college freshmen and graduates of St. Leo the Great School, traveled for a two-week period on this same trip.

Amani volunteers raise their own funds to cover travel costs and expenses for the month-long stay. Shepherd said she is grateful to the families of St. Leo the Great School who supported her bake sales and other fundraising activities that helped cover costs.

Amani participants worked in cooperation with New Life Homes, an organization that operates several orphanages for children exposed to HIV throughout Kenya and works to find families to adopt the children.

While Kenya's government has a program to assist those with AIDS, there is nothing for the 2 million Kenyan orphans who have been left behind. Established in 1994 and supported by private donations from Kenya, Britain and the United States, New Life Homes has cared for more than 1,000 infants and children.

The Nairobi facility, where Shepherd spent her first two weeks working, has rescued approximately 700 babies.

Education was also a component of the trip. A conference in Nairobi was organized for the Amani volunteers by universities in Kenya and Uganda. Presentations were given by people of influence from Kenya, including a member of parliament, an economist and two doctors.

They spoke about their history, the present economy, the current crises being faced and ideas for assistance.

After the conference, Shepherd spent four days at a private school associated with New Life Homes in Ruiru, a town just outside of Nairobi. Approximately 90 percent of the students are orphans.

Second-graders in Lindsay Shepherd's class at St. Leo the Great School in Winston-Salem point to Kenya on a classroom map. Shepherd spent a month in Kenya assisting orphans and students.

Shepherd worked mainly with the staff, training them in a variety of teaching methods. She said that while most of the teachers were very enthusiastic, many had no formal training.

The school was founded by a Kenyan couple in conjunction with their church to provide education and meals for the poor. It is only within the last few years that public education became "free" in Kenya, according to Shepherd, but families still must pay for items such as desks, books and uniforms.

Most public school classes are overcrowded, with 50-75 students per class, and there is a shortage of teachers. More than 70,000 children cannot afford public education.

St. Leo the Great School has committed to provide some form of outreach to the school in Ruiru.

Shepherd visited an orphanage and school in Kisumu; 400 of the 700 students are orphans, and the area's water system was poor, a condition that affects HIV-infected children with fragile immune systems.

"You get overwhelmed, since you want to help in so many ways, but there is so much that needs to be done," said Shepherd.

"It breaks my heart to think of how such young hopeful lives are being lost. These children are bearing the consequences of a disease they have no control over, and they face its reality every day," she said.

Ninety percent of the children in New Life Homes who initially test HIV positive become HIV negative when retested. Shepherd reports that this is due to the proper nutrition, care and antibodies they are given at New Life Homes.

A high percentage of the babies have been adopted. Unfortunately, 60 percent of Kenyans live below the poverty line.

"There is no prenatal care," said Shepherd, who added that few Kenyans can afford baby formula, something vital for infants whose mothers have AIDS.

On the trip, Kissick organized supplies for children at a New Life Homes orphanage in Nakuri that included diapers, formulas, blankets, toys and books.

"The woman in charge of the house kept saying that God must have told us what to bring, since the items we supplied were just what she needed," said Kissick. "It felt good to see how much we were able to help the babies."

Shepherd plans to return to Kenya at some point in the future.

"Kenya has taught me how far we have yet to go in the terms of basic human rights," she said. "It has also enlightened me as to how precious life is and how to savor it in the simplest of ways: faith, hope and love."

Eucharistic Congress offers much for everyone

"I look forward to welcoming everyone to the Eucharistic Congress again this year," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis. "This is the only time during the entire year that the whole diocese comes together as one family to witness to our faith and our love for Jesus."

"There is value in coming together like this on such a large scale," he said. "It reminds us in a visible way that we are all members of the diocesan church."

The second Eucharistic Congress in the Diocese of Charlotte will take place at the Charlotte Convention Center Oct. 6-7.

As with the first Eucharistic Congress in 2005, the year's event will feature a eucharistic procession, speakers, adoration and more.

"The holy Eucharist is the sacrament of unity and charity," said Bishop Jugis. "Our participation in the events of the congress — the eucharistic procession, the talks, the holy hour and the Mass — will unite all of us more closely with each other in charity, and form us more perfectly into one body in Christ throughout the Diocese of Charlotte."

The congress will open Friday evening with a concert of sacred music at 7 p.m., followed with an address by Raymond Arroyo, new director of EWTN, on "The Big Way of Mother Angelica."

Lauds (morning prayers) will open Saturday's events at the convention center at 8 a.m., followed by speakers and programs for all ages.

In the early afternoon, first communicants from throughout the diocese will lead a eucharistic procession through the streets of uptown Charlotte in the afternoon.

Designed to provide opportunities for spiritual growth for people of all ages, the congress will feature tracks for adults, teenagers, school-age children and Hispanics.

Featured speakers will be Father Leo Patalinghug, Franciscan Father James Goode, Jeff Cavins, Mary Beth Bonacci, Father Juan Rivas and Dr. Fernando Casanova.

The master of ceremonies will be Maureen O'Boyle, news anchor for WBTV news in Charlotte. In March 2005, O'Boyle interviewed Bishop Peter J. Jugis interviewed as part of a half-hour special about the bishop and the growth of the Diocese of Charlotte.

"Many people have made great sacrifices in preparing for this congress, and many others will make sacrifices to be present for the event," Bishop Jugis said. "All of these sacrifices, as well as the prayers others have offered for the success of the congress, cannot help but produce many blessings for our diocese."

SECOND DIOCESAN EUCCHARISTIC CONGRESS

OCTOBER 6-7, 2006

CHARLOTTE CONVENTION CENTER

Celebrating Our Lord

BY BISHOP PETER J. JUGIS
BISHOP OF CHARLOTTE

A great event is coming to our diocese on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 6 and 7. The second diocesan Eucharistic Congress takes place at the Charlotte Convention Center.

The theme for the Congress is the motto I use as the shepherd of our diocese, "Caritas Christi Urget Nos," which means "The Love of Christ Impels Us."

The response to our first Eucharistic Congress in September of 2005 was so overwhelmingly positive that we have arranged to use more space in the Convention Center this year. This will allow us to come together as one in praise and worship of our Lord.

This year's event will begin with a concert of sacred music, a nationally-known speaker and all-night adoration on Friday, Oct 6.

On Saturday, Oct. 7, we will start the day in the Convention Center with lauds and will then hear from a list of inspiring speakers. Children, teens, adults and Hispanics have separate tracks with messages specifically directed to them.

In addition, a cultural hour will be held for African-American, Filipino, Vietnamese and Korean Catholics.

I am looking forward especially to our eucharistic procession through the streets of downtown Charlotte. We make a beautiful statement of our love for Jesus when we process as one in adoration of His Most Precious Body.

Like last year, the procession will go from St. Peter Church, the oldest church in our diocese, to the Convention Center. Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin will deliver the homily during the Holy Hour that follows.

The day culminates in the Convention Center with a vigil Mass for all, which I will concelebrate with my brother priests.

On the following pages you will find more detailed information, as well as a map of the procession route. Other information is available at the Web site www.goEucharist.com.

The Congress is a beautiful opportunity for the people of the diocese to come together and celebrate our unity in faith through the sacrament of unity: the holy Eucharist. I look forward to seeing you and processing with you in praise of our Lord.

Watching and participating in the eucharistic procession

THE ROUTE

The eucharistic procession, led by Bishop Peter J. Jugis, will begin at 1:30 p.m. on Saturday, Oct. 7, at St. Peter Church, 501 South Tryon Street. (First communicants, clergy, religious and banner carriers should gather on Tryon Street south of St. Peter Church at 1 p.m.)

The procession will head north on Tryon Street for one block, then turn east onto Third Street for one block.

The procession will then turn south onto College Street for three blocks, then turn east onto Stonewall Street to the Charlotte Convention Center.

People of the Diocese of Charlotte are encouraged to line the procession route.

TO PARTICIPATE

As the Blessed Sacrament comes near, it is the custom to be silent and kneel until the monstrance passes.

After the Blessed Sacrament passes by, look for your parish's banner. When your parish banner passes by, you may fall in along with your parish to join in the procession. Once you have connected with your parish group, simply join in the communal prayers or just pray silently as the procession moves along.

When the procession arrives at the Charlotte Convention Center, move as directed by the ushers to enter the main hall. Proceed to the seating area, joining in the singing until the beginning of the Holy Hour.

Frequently asked questions about the Eucharistic Congress

What is the Eucharistic Congress?

The Eucharistic Congress is a teaching and worship event that is centered on the Eucharist, the source and summit of Catholic life. The Congress begins Friday evening, Oct. 6, with a concert of sacred music and a talk by EWTN news director Raymond Arroyo on "The Big Way of Mother Angelica." Afterward, the Eucharist will be available for adoration throughout the night at St. Peter Church, 501 S. Tryon St.

Events on Saturday, Oct. 7, begin at 8 a.m. at the Charlotte Convention Center with lauds (morning prayer). From 9 a.m. until 1 p.m., there are programs (or "tracks") for adults, Hispanics, teens and children. At 12:15 p.m., there will be a culture hour in native languages.

At 1:30 p.m., the eucharistic procession will begin at St. Peter Church and process through uptown Charlotte to the Charlotte Convention Center, where there will be a holy hour.

During the day, the Eucharist will be available for adoration in a special chapel in the Charlotte Convention Center. Priests will be available for confessions all day and there will be an area for vendors selling religious merchandise and offering information about Catholic vocations, religious organizations and ministries, etc.

The Congress concludes with a Vigil Mass that begins at 4:30 p.m.

Where does the idea for a Eucharistic Congress come from?

The first eucharistic congress was held in Lille, France in 1881 under the direction of Msgr. Gaston De Segur. In time, eucharistic congresses developed to their present international character. The Congress of 1908, which met in London, was the first occasion on which a representative of the pope had entered England since the Protestant Reformation. Two international eucharistic congresses have been held in the United States — Chicago in 1926 and Philadelphia in 1976.

The Diocese of Charlotte celebrated its first Eucharistic Congress in September 2005.

Who is allowed to take part in the procession?

Everyone. Leading the procession will be altar servers, organized societies including the Knights of Columbus, clergy and most importantly, the Eucharist. Following the Eucharist will be banner carriers representing churches, schools and organizations in the Diocese of Charlotte. The faithful are invited to join the procession as the banner for their church or organization passes by.

What if I am handicapped or unable to walk in the procession?

The Charlotte Convention Center is handicapped-accessible. In addition, individuals with handicaps and those who choose not to walk in the procession are invited to witness part of the procession on the video screens in the Convention Center. Music and clergy will be available in this location until the Eucharistic Procession arrives.

What if it rains?

The Congress will be held rain or shine. The procession may be moved into the Charlotte Convention Center depending on the weather.

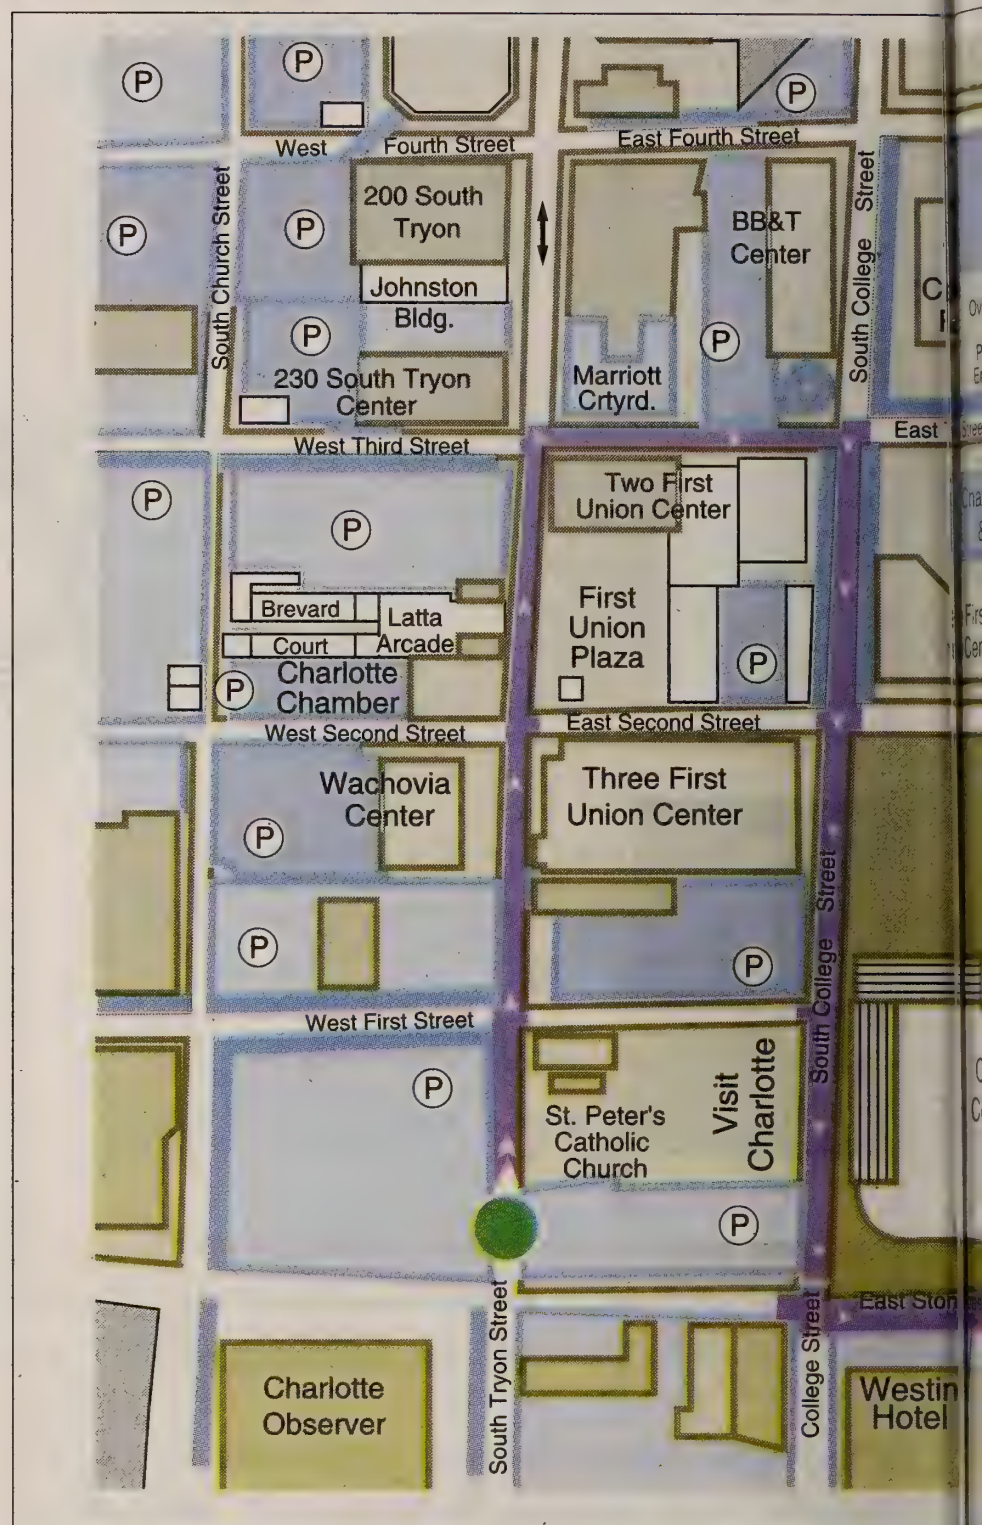

Where can I park?

There is ample parking around the Charlotte Convention Center. Since the Congress takes place on a weekend, traffic will be minimal but allowing extra time for parking is advised.

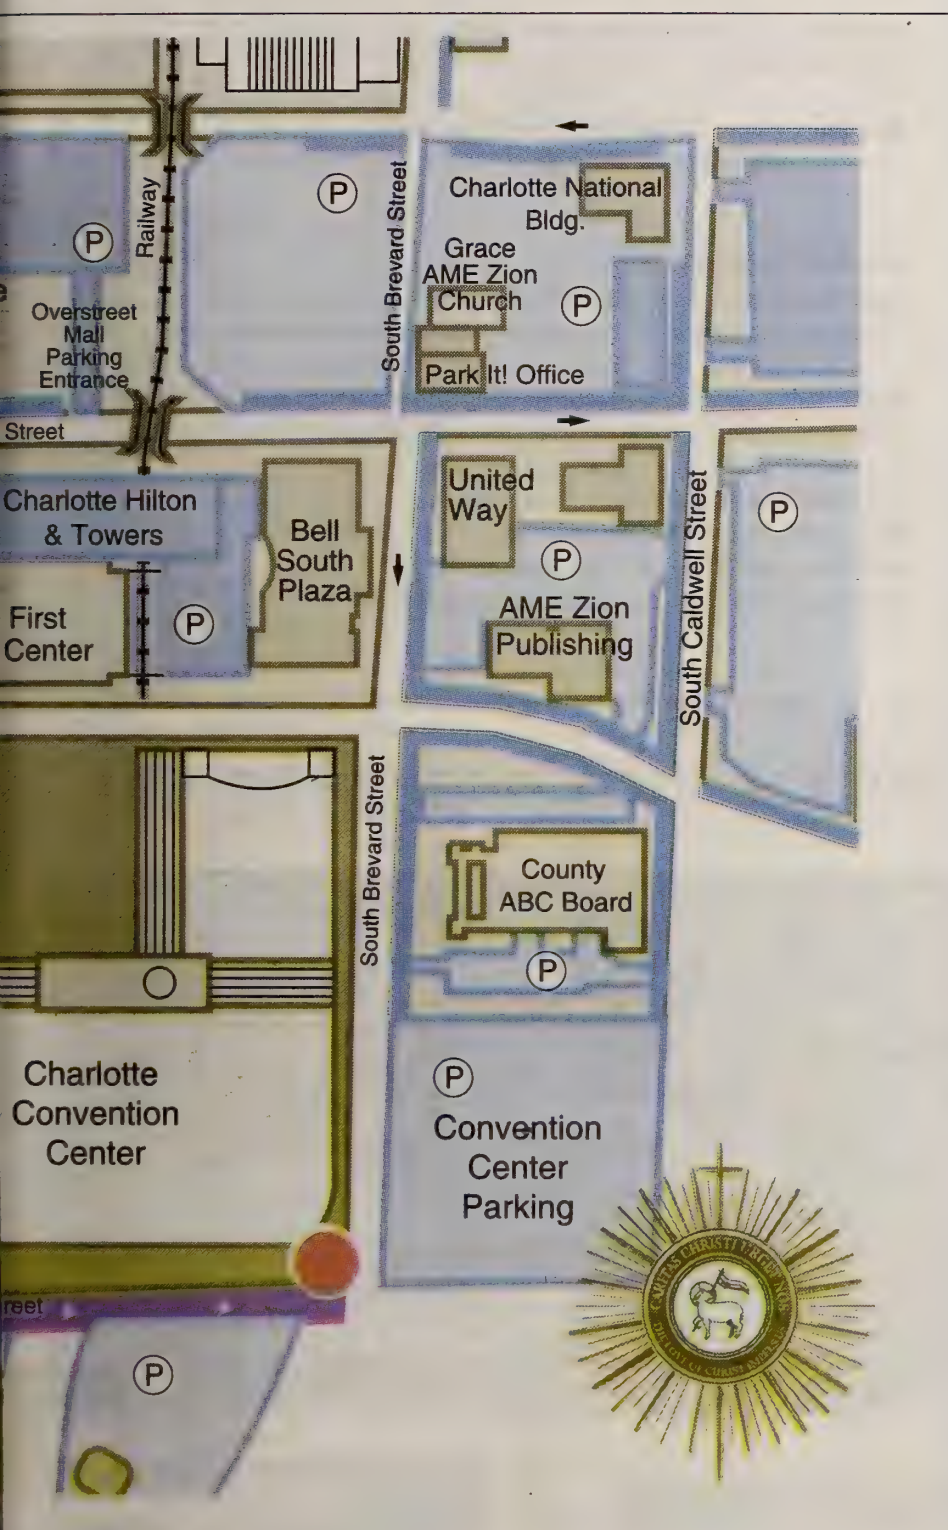

What age children will be able to participate in the Children's Track?

Children from kindergarten through fifth grade are welcome to participate in the Children's Track. All children in the Children's Track must be pre-registered. Registration forms are available online (www.goEucharist.com) or through individual parishes.

EUCHARISTIC

Seating in the Children's Track will be limited. Children in the Children's Track will be involved in age-appropriate activities and will be served lunch.

What is being done to provide a secure environment for the children?

The Diocese of Charlotte is committed to "The Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People" as adopted by the U.S. bishops.

All adult volunteers at the Congress who will have supervisory contact with children will be required to attend the diocesan training, "Protecting God's Children." Background checks will also be performed on any adult having supervisory contact with children.

Who is speaking at the Eucharistic Congress?

The list of dynamic, inspiring speakers can be accessed by visiting the speakers' page of the Congress Web site at www.goEucharist.com and on page 16 of this issue of The Catholic News & Herald.

Is there a charge to attend the Congress?

There is no charge for any of the events associated with the Eucharistic Congress. Everyone who desires a closer relationship to the Eucharist is encouraged to attend and participate. The Diocese of Charlotte is accepting contributions to defray the cost of staging the congress. To donate, visit www.goEucharist.com.

Will food be served?

The Charlotte Convention Center will offer a variety of food for sale

College newspaper pulls comics after Catholic group, others complain

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. (CNS) — After receiving complaints from the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights and from more than 2,000 people across the country, the University of Virginia's student newspaper, The Cavalier Daily, removed comics that had originally appeared in its newspaper from the paper's Web site.

The comics were drawn by a student at the Charlottesville university and appeared in the school's newspaper Aug. 23 and 24.

The first one, "Christ on a Cartesian Plane," depicted Jesus crucified on a mathematical grid. The other one, "A Nativity Ob-scene" implied that Mary had a sexually transmitted disease.

A statement released by the newspaper expressed regret "that many took offense" to the comics. "Offense was not our intent — neither the intent of the artist, nor the intent of the newspaper, which seeks to provide contributors an open forum to present their ideas."

In a Sept. 15 press release, Catholic League president Bill Donohue said he was pleased with the outcome and noted that his concern about the comic was based on its "anti-Catholic nature" and also because the newspaper had granted apologies to other groups, referring to a cartoon last year that was offensive to gays.

When Donohue first contacted the school's newspaper seeking an apology, the editor in chief responded, "Under our newspaper's policies, satire of religion, or any other belief or creed, is acceptable."

An unsigned editorial, titled "Catholic bashing," in the Sept. 25 issue of The Catholic Virginian, newspaper of the Richmond Diocese, noted that the initial lack of an apology was also "not acceptable to some 2,000 people who complained to the paper and university about the cartoon. Their uproar apparently made an impact and the cartoonist has apologized."

In a statement, the cartoonist, Grant Woolard, said his sole intent "is to present situations that provoke thought and amusement," and since "this comic did not achieve that goal" he requested that it be taken off the newspaper's Web site.

The Catholic Virginian's editorial noted that "fortunately the apology did come — although only after a massive protest from those who were offended."

"It's good to know that people's voices do make a difference," it added.

We are a family of faith

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

"Actually, my siblings and I haven't spoken to each other in years."

The young man across the desk from me had come to the parish office to talk about becoming a fully initiated Catholic through the RCIA process, and as the coordinator of the program I was conducting an initial interview. When we got around to talking about his family, I was a bit stunned by his admission.

Although my two brothers, my sister and I lived some distance from one another, we always had been rather close. I couldn't imagine going several months without contact, much less several years.

But I was struck by a much deeper irony in the would-be Catholic's statements. As he chatted about the "family spirit" of the parish and how it had attracted him to consider Catholicism, I couldn't help but wonder what sort of family he was looking for.

Today's readings are full of family references — husband and wife, parents and children, brothers and sisters, even grandchildren — set in an unmistakable context of God-ordained blessing, fruitfulness, relationship and joy.

By contrast, Jesus' hard sayings concerning divorce make the Gospel reading problematic in a "real world" in which divorce, child and elder abuse, and sibling estrangement are all too common. Such circumstances make it difficult to imagine how family life with its myriad imperfections and varied interpretations can be viewed as a window to God's goodness.

Yet Jesus reminds us that we are to accept the reign of God like children. My children continually surprise me with their willingness to forgive, to overlook my poor attempts at parenting, to magnify the good and minimize the not-so-good qualities of our family life.

My family's remarkable resilience and loyalty — despite and through heartache, misunderstanding and even the occasional arguing — teach me more deeply about God's faithfulness than any other relationships I have experienced.

No one should allow himself or herself to be abused by a family member or anyone else. But today's readings challenge us to recognize and repent of the "hardness of heart" that prevents our encountering God in the sacred spaces of family life.

Questions:

In what way have your family relationships been difficult lately? How has your hardness of heart kept you from seeing God's blessing in another family member?

Bishop Jugis approved chaplet to be at Congress

The Chaplet of Adoration and Reparation was inspired by prayers taught to the three children by an angel in Fatima, Portugal, in 1916.

A chaplet is a prayer or set of prayers, recited using rosary beads. A familiar chaplet is the Divine Mercy chaplet, prayed on Divine Mercy Sunday (the first Sunday after Easter). There are dozens of chaplets of Mary and the saints.

The Chaplet of Adoration and Reparation was arranged by a Dominican Sister of Perpetual Rosary at a convent in Fatima. Father Christopher Roux, priest secretary to Bishop Jugis, acquired the chaplet from another Dominican sister during a visit to the convent as part of an annual pilgrimage to Fatima in 2004.

Later that year, he was encouraged via correspondence with the sister to seek Bishop Jugis' imprimatur, or ecclesiastical approval, for the chaplet.

Bishop Jugis approved the chaplet Dec. 8, 2004. It has since been printed on a prayer card with an image taken from the story of the angel giving holy Communion to the children.

The angel first appeared in the spring of 1916 as the children were pasturing their sheep. The angel said, "Fear not, I am the Angel of Peace. Pray with me."

The angel knelt on the ground and recited this prayer three times as the children repeated it after him: "O my God, I believe, I adore, I hope and I love Thee. I ask pardon for those who do not believe, do not adore, do not hope and do not love Thee."

During the second apparition in the summer of 1916, the angel urged the children to pray and offer sacrifices for the conversion of sinners. In the angel's final appearance, he prostrated himself on the ground before a vision of a chalice and host and said:

"Most Holy Trinity, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, I adore Thee profoundly. I offer Thee the most precious Body, Blood, Soul and Divinity of Jesus Christ, present in all the Tabernacles of the world, in reparation for the outrages, sacrileges and indifferences whereby He is offended. And through the infinite merits of His most Sacred Heart and the Immaculate Heart of Mary, I beg of Thee the conversion of poor sinners."

Then he gave holy Communion to the children.

The prayer card will be made available in the adoration chapel and at the vendor table operated by the Te Deum Foundation at the second diocesan Eucharistic Congress in Charlotte Oct. 6-7.

Pope pledges continuing dialogue with Muslims

the dialogue opened by the Second Vatican Council and developed in large part by his predecessor, Pope John Paul II.

The pope expressed his "esteem and profound respect" for Muslim believers and said he wanted to continue to build bridges, especially between Muslims and Christians. Productive dialogue, he said, will be based on mutual knowledge, which "with joy recognizes the religious values that we have in common and, with loyalty, respects the differences."

He said historical animosities should be left behind. The lessons of the past, he said, should help Christians and Muslims seek "paths of reconciliation" that lead to respect for individual identity and freedom.

In that regard, Pope Benedict cited Pope John Paul on the important issue of reciprocal respect for religious rights, quoting from a speech the late pope delivered to Muslims in Morocco: "Respect and dialogue require reciprocity in all spheres, especially in that which concerns basic freedoms, more particularly religious freedom."

The pope said that in the current world situation it was imperative that Christians and Muslims join to promote human dignity and the rights that flow from that dignity.

"When threats mount up against people and against peace, by recognizing the central character of the human person and by working with perseverance to see that human life is always respected, Christians and Muslims manifest their obedience to the Creator," he said.

The pope closed his talk by recalling that Muslims worldwide were about to begin the spiritual month of Ramadan, and he prayed that they be granted "serene and peaceful lives." When he finished, he was warmly applauded.

The meeting, arranged with unusual urgency by the Vatican, was a formal audience and not a closed-door exchange of opinions. In attendance were ambassadors from 22 predominantly Muslim countries and 19 other Islamic representatives based in Italy.

The pope delivered his talk in French; the Vatican immediately made available translations in Arabic, English and Italian. Afterward, the pope greeted those present individually.

The papal talk was broadcast live on the Arab television network Al-Jazeera.

The Vatican spokesman, Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, said the encounter was a sign that dialogue was returning to normal after a moment of misunderstanding. He said the pope's speech Sept. 12 at the University of Regensburg in Germany might even turn out to be "providential" for dialogue.

"We hope the tension and suffering of the past days make everyone understand the urgency of a renewed dialogue that is positive, trustworthy, capable of looking at problems in depth, and ready for 'self-criticism,' as the pope said," Father Lombardi said.

"If this happens, the speech in Regensburg, with its intellectual courage ... will have been fruitful, perhaps even providential," he said.

Reaction to the pope's talk was mostly favorable among the participants and mixed among other Islamic leaders.

An Iranian diplomat assigned to the Vatican, Ahmad Fahima, said the encounter was "good and, as far as we're concerned, sufficient." Indonesia's ambassador to the Vatican, Bambang Prayitno, said the pope's encouragement to dialogue should have positive effects.

Abdellah Redouane, who represented the Islamic Cultural Center of Italy, said that with the papal talk "a new stage" in dialogue had begun.

Yahya Pallavicini, a Muslim cleric who is vice president of the Islamic Religious Community organization, welcomed the encounter with the pope but said Islamic leaders wanted more than a papal speech. He suggested forming a commission of Christian, Muslim and Jewish experts to map out a new cycle of dialogue meetings.

In Turkey, Ali Bardakoglu, the head of the country's directorate of religious affairs, said he thought the pope's talk would be welcomed as a positive development and would allay misgivings in the Muslim world.

Question prompted by "The Da Vinci Code"

Q. Some of us have found the ludicrous screw-ups about the Catholic faith in "The Da Vinci Code" interesting and fun to talk about, especially the fantasy about a marriage between Jesus and Mary Magdalene!

There is one question, however. We've always read that Mary Magdalene was the "repentant sinner" whom Jesus converted (Jn 8). The assumption now seems to be that's not true. Were there two Magdalenes in the Gospels? (Texas)

A. No, there is only one Mary Magdalene in the Gospels, but there are three Marys whom tradition for a long time confused with one another.

The Gospels mention Mary Magdalene by name several times. She is also referred to as Mary of Magdala, a town on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee.

We are told (Mk 16:9) that Jesus expelled seven demons from her. She was one of the women who ministered to the needs of Jesus (Lk 8:2), and she witnessed his crucifixion (Jn 19:25) and burial (Mt 27:61).

Finally, on the Sunday of the resurrection, she was a witness to the empty tomb. Later the same morning the risen Jesus appeared and spoke to her alone commanding her to go tell his "brothers" what had happened (Jn 20:11-18).

Sometimes Mary Magdalene is identified with the penitent sinner you mention, who anoints the feet of Jesus and bathes his feet. That woman is not named, however.

While there's a long tradition in Christian literature and art that identifies the repenting woman as Mary Magdalene, perhaps because Mary was the one from whom Jesus expelled the demons, there's no reason in the Gospels for making that connection. It is generally considered unfounded.

The other woman with whom Mary Magdalene is sometimes confused is Mary, the sister of Lazarus and Martha of Bethany. It is she who is said to have "the better part" in her relation with Jesus (Lk 10), who anointed the feet of Jesus in her home (Jn 12:3), and she is much involved in the story of her brother being raised from the dead (Jn 11).

In spite of traditions otherwise, with paintings and sculptures depicting the "Repentant Mary Magdalene," from all the evidence we have these Marys were three different people.

Mary Magdalene herself is without doubt one of the most distinguished women involved with the earthly life of our Lord. Next to the mother of Jesus, she has the primary role of all women in the Gospels.

She figures prominently in five of the six resurrection stories, all except John 21:1-23. In John (and, along with some other women, in Matthew and Mark) she is the first witness to the rising of Jesus from the dead.

She is honored as a saint not only by the Catholic and Orthodox Churches, but also by the Church of England, the Episcopal Church in the United States and the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America.

Despite the self-important claims of the Da Vinci story, how this woman became misconstrued as the public sinner in Luke Chapter 7 is entirely the work of pure, if fascinating, conjecture.

Letters to the Editor

which it skimmed millions from the program and deprived Iraqis of needed food and medicine, is public knowledge.

The church's position been "to espouse any organization for the brotherly collaboration of the world's peoples." But considering the United Nations' direction, it's not the best chance for world peace, and certainly has conformed too little for which Catholics stand.

Every pope has encouraged and cajoled the United Nations into doing what is right, but the United Nations has failed the church continuously. The teaching of the church is what the United Nations should be — not what it is.

— Kevin Roeten, Asheville

What is next for Christians and Muslims?

Dialogue must continue toward peace, not hatred

By now it is well known that Pope Benedict XVI enraged large numbers of Muslims by delivering an erudite university lecture making the important point that reason and faith are partners. No religious belief must be imposed by force.

The pope made a passing reference to the 14th-century Byzantine Emperor Manuel II Paleologus, who said the prophet Mohammed brought evil, "such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached."

The wise papal admonition against violence provoked its opposite. Riots erupted throughout the Muslim world, ranging from the firebombing of Catholic churches to death threats issued against the pontiff.

The Vatican and other world leaders did their best to calm matters, but to little immediate avail, leading some to utter "res ipsa loquitur" — it speaks for itself.

Whilesome Islamic voices demanded a greater apology, Pope Benedict was careful never to shade the truth of his original message: "Violence is incompatible with the nature of God and the nature of the soul."

Why this should enrage is mystifying — perhaps especially to Americans, who from 9/11 onward have distinguished the Islamic radicals who hijacked planes from the adherents of Muslim faith in general. More than a few of us wondered aloud why more Islamic leaders did not more strongly and forcefully make the same differentiation.

In truth, the modern Catholic Church has been extending the hand of interreligious friendship to Islam consistently and openly for a great while. In the conciliar document "Nostra Aetate," it is written that "the church regards with esteem ... the Muslims. They adore the one God, living and subsisting in himself."

Special mention also is made of Islam's respect for Jesus, who is seen through Muslim eyes as prophet rather than savior. So too, Catholic teaching applauds the honor Islam gives to the Virgin Mary and how greatly Islamic believers "value the moral life and worship of God especially through prayer, almsgiving and fasting."

Guest Column

DOUGLAS W. KMIEC
GUEST COLUMNIST

This is far too much interreligious effort to suddenly forget about at the drop of a footnote. So what's going on here?

The faiths of others seldom perfectly coincide with our own, but disagreement ought not beget intellectual or actual dismemberment. Quranic passages that say the opposite are, to say the least, troubling.

Various "suras" or passages call upon Muslims to "make war on the unbelievers" or "fight and slay the [non-Muslims] wherever you find them."

It is more than a little ironic that the U.S. Senate and the Supreme Court have been tied up in knots over being insufficiently generous to alleged terrorist detainees, while the Quran directs Muslims not to take "prisoners of war until a great slaughter [has been made] among his enemies in the land."

Sound like Iraq? New York? Any hope of religious friendship will depend upon getting beyond mindless literalism.

And we must candidly admit the dark side of Catholic history, be it the bloody Crusades or the tragic moral corruption of child abuse.

But fair is fair.

The word "dialogue" is from the Greek "dialogos," meaning to converse across difference. It goes nowhere if it is one-sided.

And the present moment is too urgent, too beset by war, to expend valuable time on who owes who an apology.

What Catholics and Muslims owe each other is a transformation of a secular world that too often mocks the sincere religious belief and practice of both. In this, Catholics should give emphasis to Jesus' commandment of love of neighbor, and Muslims may want to rely upon the "five pillars" or (the "greater jihad" of testimony, prayer, almsgiving, fasting and pilgrimage).

Neither path is compatible with hate or an unforgiving nature that finds fault only in the other.

Kmiec is chair and professor of constitutional law at Pepperdine University.

Church should encourage U.N. to improve

In regard to Father John Dietzen's column, "The church and the United Nations" (Sept. 15), the U.N. Human Rights Council has poor human rights records. This includes Algeria, China, Cuba, Pakistan, Russia and Saudi Arabia.

China has a documented record of forced abortions and sterilizations. Other members are frequently guilty of imposing birth control and denying the "right to life" in certain circumstances.

In fact, the United Nations considers abortion formally established as a defacto "right." If you take a cursory look at the United Nations' alleged "social" programs, you'll also find it granting NGO (nongovernmental organization) status to homosexual activist groups. And the U.N. Oil for Food scandal, in Christians must ask God for help when faith is in doubt, pope says

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Christians must have the courage to ask God for help and encouragement when their faith is troubled or shaken by uncertainty, Pope Benedict XVI said.

It is often difficult to understand what God is teaching or asking of his children, the pope said during his Sept. 27 weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square.

But, he said, people must find "the courage to say, 'I don't understand you, Lord. Listen to me. Help me understand.'"

Christians have "the right, so to speak, to ask Jesus for an explanation," the pope said, and asking for further clarification "is the true way to pray and speak with Jesus."

Not only does this show that believers realize their own limited ability to understand God's greater plan, but it also demonstrates their faith in receiving "enlightenment and strength" from God who can grant them, he said.

In an address to some 30,000 pilgrims from all over the world, the pope continued a series of talks on the apostles, this time reflecting on the life and example of Thomas.

Even though Thomas is mostly remembered for having doubted the risen Christ was alive and among the apostles, Pope Benedict said the faithful can still "take heart from the life of Thomas," who shows that there is comfort available in times of uncertainty and that "doubt can lead to spiritual growth."

The pope recalled Thomas' courage and loyalty when he wanted to accompany Jesus on a dangerous journey back to Bethany where the people there had tried to stone Jesus.

It was Thomas who said to his fellow disciples, "Let us also go, that we may die with him," which reveals "a precious lesson" in Christian living, the pope said.

It not only means one should be ready to sacrifice one's own life for Christ, but also more importantly means one should "never leave Jesus' side," since being Christian means living together with Jesus, he said.

Thomas shows the faithful they should not be afraid to ask Christ for help in understanding his words, said the pope.

After Jesus told his disciples "Where I am going, you know the way," it was

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

Thomas who asked, "Master, we do not know where you are going; how can we know the way?"

The pope said Jesus used that occasion to reveal that he himself was the way, the truth and the life.

Lastly, he said, the "doubting Thomas" helps the faithful learn that a true, mature faith in God does not rest upon having tangible or visible proof: Only after Thomas put his hand on Jesus' wounds did he believe Christ had risen from death and proclaim, "My Lord and my God."

The pope said this is one of "the most splendid professions of faith in the New Testament" because it shows Thomas touching a man and then proclaiming his faith in God, "whom he neither saw nor touched."

Jesus, in fact, underlines what true faith is when he responded, "Blessed are those who have not seen and have believed."

Pain awareness

Guest Column

FATHER FRANK PAVONE
GUEST COLUMNIST

Rep. Chris Smith, R-NJ, and Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan, have introduced legislation in Congress that would require an abortionist to provide documentation on the capacity of an unborn child to feel pain to any woman seeking an abortion past the 20th week.

After receiving this information, the woman must either accept or refuse the administration of pain-reducing drugs directly to the unborn child. The bill also contains congressional "findings" regarding scientific evidence that unborn children experience great pain during abortions at 20 week, and cites existing federal laws that seek to diminish the suffering of animals, such as restrictions on how livestock are slaughtered.

Nothing in the bill would deny that unborn children may experience pain prior to 20 weeks after fertilization, but a notable segment of the medical and scientific community agrees on the 20-week benchmark for pain.

Interestingly, Nancy Keenan, president of the leading pro-abortion group NARAL Pro-Choice America, said: "Pro-choice Americans have always believed that women deserve access to all the information relevant to their reproductive health decisions. For some women, that includes information related to fetal anesthesia options. NARAL Pro-Choice America does not intend to oppose this legislation."

Good thinking. What can appear more heartless than opposing legislation to keep babies from feeling pain? And what can be more damaging to the cause of abortion than to create a big fight over the pain babies feel during abortion?

It's one of those lose-lose propositions for the abortion camp. Maybe that's why abortionists often don't allow themselves to think about it. Consider the following exchange that took place in U.S. District Court, Southern District of New York, between Judge Richard Casey and abortionist Timothy Johnson in March 2004.

Johnson was testifying in the case that dealt with the ban on partial-birth abortion.

THE COURT: I heard you talk a lot today about dismemberment D&E procedure, second trimester. Does the fetus feel pain?

THE WITNESS: I'm aware of fetal behavioral studies that have looked at fetal responses to noxious stimuli.

THE COURT: Does it ever cross your mind when you are doing a dismemberment?

THE WITNESS: Does the fetus having pain cross my mind? No.

It's time for us to make this issue cross the mind of every American. Urge your representatives and senators to support the Unborn Child Pain Awareness Act (H.R. 256, S. 51).

An event to remember

Final part of a 7-part series on the second annual Eucharistic Congress

We began this brief series on the Eucharistic Congress by recalling the wonderful memories of our first Eucharistic Congress last September: the sacred music concert, the speakers and talks, the eucharistic procession through uptown Charlotte, the books and religious articles for sale, the opportunity for the sacrament of reconciliation, the holy Mass and more.

These memorable events punctuated the day with signs and evidence of God's grace and mercy. The events formed and shaped the day into lasting unforgettable proof of God's love.

And as we complete this series in preparation for our second annual Eucharistic Congress, which will take place Oct. 6-7 at the Charlotte Convention Center, it would be fitting to conclude with a glimpse at the events that will unfold very soon - the events that will once again leave an indelible impression on our memories.

As with our first Eucharistic Congress, the second Congress will take a similar path: Friday evening through Saturday evening, beginning with a sacred music concert and ending with the holy sacrifice of the Mass.

However, the events that unfold during these two days will acquire a unique shape this year.

Last year, our minds and hearts, indeed our souls, were captivated and elevated by the sacred music concert on Friday night, which hosted more than 100 singers. This year, not only has the size of the room doubled, but so has the number of voices!

We are anticipating the beautiful and powerful melodies to be produced by this 200-voice choir composed of people from around the diocese.

Last year, we were inspired by the famous Catholic actor Jim Caviezel, who periodically broke into live performances of his role as the Savior in the film "The Passion of the Christ." This year, the internationally-known EWTN television host and author Raymond Arroyo will inaugurate the talks with an address on "The Mission of the 'Big Way' of Mother Angelica."

Following the talk, we will have the opportunity to adore the Lord in nocturnal eucharistic adoration at St. Peter Church (across from the Convention Center) throughout the night.

The next morning will proceed differently from last year. Our first Eucharistic Congress began with a eucharistic procession on Saturday morning. This year, however, there is a foot race that will draw thousands to uptown Charlotte. Therefore, we will begin the morning with an indoor procession of the Blessed Sacrament, a moment of adoration, lauds (morning prayer) and benediction.

The Blessed Sacrament will then be moved to the chapel for private adoration throughout the day.

The daytime events are the same as last year with talks in four tracks: general, Hispanic, teen and children's. The eucharistic procession will then take place beginning at 1 p.m.

Following our outdoor procession, we will return indoors where Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin will lead us in prayer during a holy hour. Finally, as with last year, the day will come to climax and completion with the celebration of the holy Mass with Bishop Peter J. Jugis, priests, deacons, seminarians, religious brothers and sisters and laity from around the diocese.

The final piece of preparation for the second Eucharistic Congress is both practical and spiritual: arrive early; bring money for food, religious goods, and donations; and prepare your mind for the light of truth, your heart for the grace and mercy of God, and your soul for peace and joy.

This will certainly be a Eucharistic Congress to remember!

Father Buettner is pastor of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton.

CHARLOTTE — While Catholic schools are known to provide excellent, well-rounded education with focus on the Catholic faith, some students have been left out due to a school's limited resources and budgets.

Through the Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools (MACS) Special Needs Endowment Fund, special-needs students could eventually be the beneficiaries of a Catholic education.

CHARLOTTE — A young woman walks slowly out of the reproductive health clinic, holding a small white bag.

"Look — she's had an abortion," Andrea Hines says. The bag holds post-operative medications and instructions, and possibly birth control pills.

A few minutes later, the woman stops her car where Hines and Veronica Cortes are standing. She talks with Cortes for a moment, and takes the pamphlets Cortes offers.

Hines stands a few feet away, holding a sign reading, "I regret my abortion."

WASHINGTON — Legislation calling for construction of a 700-mile fence along the U.S.-Mexican border passed both houses of Congress before they adjourned until after the November elections.

The fence was criticized by advocates for comprehensive immigration reform, who said the bill was little more than an election-year stunt aimed at voters who want a crackdown on illegal immigration.

In a Sept. 29 teleconference, Kevin Appleby, director of migration and refugee policy for the U.S. bishops' Migration and Refugee Services, said the bishops opposed a fence for a variety of reasons.

For one thing, half of those who are in the country illegally come in legally and stay beyond

Four-year-old kindergarten students from Blessed Sacrament School get a hands-on demonstration of a water hose from the Milwaukee Fire Department Sept. 15. Fire department representatives visited the school after students reported a house fire across the street from the school's playground during recess Sept. 13.

Kindergartners called heroes for spotting smoke, reporting house fire

MILWAUKEE (CNS) — Quick action by members of Cathy Dudzik's kindergarten class to report a house fire across the street from their playground brought a fast response from the fire department and earned the entire class a commendation for being heroes.

The 4-year-old kindergartners at Blessed Sacrament school were outside for recess Sept. 13 when three of the children rushed to their teacher to report black smoke billowing out of a house.

All the children watched from the safety of their classroom window as the firetrucks zoomed down the street.

Principal Kathleen Kannenberg and Ron Wachowlak, the school's maintenance man, rushed to the house to see if anyone was inside. No one was home at the time of the fire, but the owner's cats and a dog were inside.

"I knew there wasn't supposed to be smoke coming out of the house," 4-year-old Matthew Barker said.

The boys said they alerted their teacher right away, "because you always tell the teachers," said Dominic Gonzales.

Kannenberg felt the students needed to be praised for their quick thinking and assistance. They received ice cream treats and certificates saying "they were heroes," she said.

"We were able to talk about fire safety at school and at home, so we were able to use it as a teachable moment for them," said Kannenberg.

As another show of thanks, firefighters from Engine Company 23 of the Milwaukee Fire Department visited the school Sept. 15.

"It was an opportunity to show our appreciation of what they did and the service they provided," said the company's Lt. Tom Kizewski.

The firefighters allowed the children on the firetruck. They also unrolled a hose and allowed the children to take turns holding it.

"They were very thrilled and excited about everything," said Kizewski.

Peace tomorrow relies on justice today, Vatican official tells U.N.

UNITED NATIONS (CNS) — "Building peace for tomorrow requires doing justice today," a top Vatican official told the U.N. General Assembly.

Italian Archbishop Giovanni Lajolo, president of the Governor's Office for Vatican City State, addressed issues ranging from development and human rights to religious freedom and dialogue in his speech at the assembly's annual opening debate Sept. 27.

The archbishop warned that "failures to correct fundamental inequalities in the world economic system are fast becoming lost opportunities to advance a moral alternative to war."

He praised the Millennium Development Goals adopted by key world leaders including U.S. President George W. Bush but warned that "implementation has been lacking."

"The present lack of progress in the fields of development aid and trade reform threatens everyone's security and well-being," he said. "The surest way to prevent war is to address its causes."

He called human rights "pillars of peace" and urged governments to understand that "violation of the fundamental rights of the person cannot be removed from the attention of the international community."

Addressing the role of religion in world affairs, Archbishop Lajolo said, "At its best, truest and most authentic, religion is a vital force for good, for harmony and for peace among peoples. ... It cultivates peace in hearts."

Archbishop Lajolo urged nations and civil societies to "promote religious freedom and a sane, social tolerance that will disarm extremists even before they can begin to corrupt others with their hatred of life and liberty."

He encouraged current U.N. reform efforts but warned that the organization's "lofty goals ... will be reached only by overcoming the narrow confines imposed by the dominance of national interests."

Pope thanks all who helped him have a peaceful stay at papal villa

Rosary is 'simple yet so profound,' says pope

CASTEL GANDOLFO, Italy (CNS) — Wrapping up his public appearances at the papal summer villa, Pope Benedict XVI thanked those who helped ensure he had a peaceful stay in the hills south of Rome.

During a morning meeting Sept. 30 he conveyed his thanks to the mayor, city council and parish priest of Castel Gandolfo, to the religious communities present in the town and to the police and firefighters who assisted Vatican agents throughout the summer. In the afternoon, he met with employees of the papal villa, gardens and farm.

The pope left Castel Gandolfo Oct. 4 after a stay of more than two months.

Reciting the midday Angelus Oct. 1 for the last time before returning to the Vatican, the pope encouraged Catholics around the world to make a special effort to pray the rosary with their families during the month of October and to be missionaries of God's love.

In the Catholic Church, the month of October traditionally is dedicated to the rosary and to the promotion of the church's missionary work around the world.

Pope Benedict said the Oct. 7 feast of Our Lady of the Rosary is an annual invitation "to rediscover the beauty of this prayer, which is so simple yet so profound."

The pope asked Catholics "to recite the rosary during this month in your families, communities and parishes for the intentions of the pope, for the mission of the church and for peace in the world."

Pope prays that ties between Muslims, Christians in Iraq endure

CASTEL GANDOLFO (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI prayed that the strong ties between Muslims and Christians in Iraq endure as he prayed for peace in the "martyred country."

He invited everyone to join him in praying for "the gift of peace and harmony" in Iraq after praying the Angelus Oct. 1.

The pope said he met Sept. 30 with Chaldean Patriarch Emmanuel-Karim Delly of Baghdad who detailed "the tragic reality faced daily by the dear people of Iraq, where Christians and Muslims have lived together for 14 centuries as children of the same land."

"I hope these bonds of fraternity will not be loosened," the pope said from the window of his summer residence to pilgrims gathered in the courtyard below.

The patriarch made a special visit to Rome and Castel Gandolfo to inform the pope about the situation in Iraq, said Father Philip Najim, the Rome-based representative of the Chaldean Catholic Patriarchate of Baghdad.

Deaths of Iraqi civilians have been on the rise, according to a recent report by the United Nations. More than 6,500 civilians were killed in July and August this year, the report said. Many were killed by death squads and sectarian militias, it said.

Christians have been facing an onslaught of recent attacks in Mosul and Baghdad. AsiaNews reported Sept. 25 that Muslim militias in Mosul had threatened the city's Catholic bishop and priests unless they publicly denounced the speech Pope Benedict made at the University of Regensburg in Germany.

Fliers had been distributed in the city calling for a condemnation of the pope's remarks about Islam or else "Christians would be killed and churches burnt down," reported AsiaNews.

Father Najim told Catholic News Service Oct. 2 that militants were using the pope's speech as "an excuse to threaten all the Iraqi people," not just Christians.

Everyone, Muslim and Christian, "is under threat in Iraq," he said.

Sacred Heart parishioners make pilgrimage close to home

EMMITSBURG, Md.—Parishioners of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury recently returned from a pilgrimage to Emmitsburg, Md.

The parishioners accompanied their pastor, Father John Putnam, on the trip to visit the national shrines of St. Elizabeth Ann Seton and the Grotto of Lourdes Sept. 26-28.

"Last year the parish made a pilgrimage to the Shrine of the Most Blessed Sacrament in Alabama. It was such a success that we wanted to try another pilgrimage this year," said Father Putnam.

"Many people are unable to take major pilgrimages to the shrines of Europe and the Holy Land, so a pilgrimage closer to home is perfect for them," he said.

Emmitsburg is located in the rolling hills of western Maryland, where St. Elizabeth Ann Seton, the first American-born saint, once ministered. A predominantly rural lifestyle still prevails.

The National Shrine of St. Elizabeth Ann Seton is surrounded by park-like grounds. The National Shrine of the Grotto of Lourdes is the oldest known replica of the revered French shrine honoring the apparitions of Mary in 1858.

Father Putnam described the area as a "very picturesque area of Maryland."

"Our daily lives are so busy that it is very easy to forget the importance of being quiet and reflective," he said. "This was the greatest gift of the pilgrimage - the opportunity to come away and spend some time with God."

The group also visited Mount St. Mary's Seminary and the battlegrounds at Gettysburg during the trip.

New endowment provides for special needs in classroom was divided among various local organizations.

David Bishop, a member of the Livingstone foundation board of directors and the chair of the MACS Education Foundation board of directors, recommended MACS as a recipient of the principle funds.

The MACS Special Needs Endowment Fund was established, and will receive $100,000 over a two-year period.

The endowment fund will provide grants for unique situations not normally included in a school's budget.

"In the past, diocesan schools have not always been able to serve students with special needs," said Susan Cameron, former director for diocesan Catholic schools development. "This fund allows them to do that."

"We had one student with mild autism — the child did well in a small classroom at times, but at other times needed an area to be alone, without feeling isolated," said Linda Cherry, superintendent of diocesan Catholic schools.

"It would be nice to have an area within the classroom that is soundproof and enables the child to feel successful," she said.

Some students with learning challenges receive limited help from the learning support teachers, due to other students requiring their assistance, said Cherry.

"If each classroom teacher had materials to use with individual students, the learning-challenged student could receive even more assistance," she said.

Cherry said one of the greatest benefits she has seen recently was the addition of the Down syndrome class at St. Patrick School.

The main goals of the program are to make the students employable and educate more students. There is a focus on learning time- and money-management skills.

The class's three students are taught basic academic curriculum as well as life skills based on their levels of ability. Students join the other St. Patrick students in the lunchroom, on the playground, at Mass and in some of the special classes.

"These children have changed the lives of the other students and parents at St. Patrick," Cherry said. "They have been given the opportunity to learn, live and play with other children within a Catholic environment."

"While we may not be able to meet the needs of every single child with special needs, to be able to say to parents 'we can certainly try' gives hope to many Catholic families," she said.

With the endowment fund, "students with special needs will have greater access to a Catholic education," said Cameron.

Bishop McGuinness among top 50 Catholic schools in nation

KERNERSVILLE — Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville recently was designated as one of the top 50 Catholic secondary schools in the United States for 2006.

The designation was announced Sept. 27 as part of the Catholic High School Honor Roll.

"The honor roll provides a powerful resource to parents and educators by acknowledging those schools that best maintain high academic standards, uphold their Catholic identities and prepare students to actively engage the world," said Anthony Pienta, research project coordinator for Acton Institute.

The honor roll is an independent project of the Acton Institute, an international research and educational organization. The honor roll was produced in consultation with a national advisory board comprised of Catholic college presidents and noted Catholic scholars.

"High schools that are fulfilling well their mission to form students morally and intellectually deserve to be recognized," said Gerard Bradley, University of Notre Dame law professor and advisory board member.

Nearly 1,300 Catholic high schools were invited to apply to the honor roll by completing surveys that measure academic excellence, Catholic identity and civic education.

Texas led with six schools selected, followed by California with five. Overall, 25 states are represented on the honor roll, including North Carolina for the first time.

Eleven different religious orders sponsor honorees, including the Dominicans, Legionaries of Christ, Jesuits and Norbertines.

"Congratulations to Principal George Repass, his teachers, staff, students and parents for this distinguished honor to not only Bishop McGuinness, but all of the Diocese of Charlotte," said Linda Cherry, superintendent of Catholic schools in the Diocese of Charlotte.

Our Lady of the Assumption School named a Blue Ribbon school

CHARLOTTE — And the blue ribbon goes to: Our Lady of the Assumption School in Charlotte.

The school was announced to be one of the 2006 No Child Left Behind — Blue Ribbon Schools by U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings on Sept. 22.

The U.S. Department of Education's No Child Left Behind — Blue Ribbon Schools program honors public and private kindergarten-through-12th-grade schools that are either academically superior in their states or that demonstrate dramatic gains in student achievement.

"These Blue Ribbon Schools are examples of what teachers and students can achieve," Spellings said.

They "show what wonderful accomplishments can be made when we focus on the bottom line in education — student achievement," she said.

A state's chief school officer nominates public schools and the Council for American Private Education (CAPE) nominates private schools.

Our Lady of the Assumption School qualified for the award with consistent academic excellence and programs that meet its diverse students' needs.

The pre-kindergarten-through-fifth-grade school was one of 250 schools nationwide to receive the distinction this year and one of two private schools to be recognized in North Carolina.

Principal Mary Leva and a representative teacher will be honored at a special ceremony in Washington, D.C. in November.

'Our biggest day was six saves. We had about 25 saves in the last month.'

Sidewalk counselors teach respect for human life

With Cortes and Hines are Margaret and Stephen Nagy and Francesca and Karen, who asked to be identified only by their first names.

There is no yelling, no condemnation — just silent prayer, a few signs, a model showing fetuses at various stages of development and women handing out literature and rosaries.

"We use a loving approach," said Nagy. "The main thing is to change hearts so that they don't come back again."

The women and man are all part of the Helpers of God's Precious Infants, a Brooklyn-based network of volunteers working to help women who face unwanted pregnancies choose to give birth to, rather than abort, their babies.

Founded in 1989 by Msgr. Philip Reilly, the Helpers of God's Precious Infants are a group of people committed to maintaining a loving and prayerful presence outside of the abortion clinics.

The Helpers' work doesn't end when a woman walks into the abortion clinic. If she does terminate her pregnancy, they will refer her to Rachel's Vineyard and other post-abortion counseling services.

There are currently about a dozen Helpers in Charlotte, who spend about three hours, three days a week praying and counseling at Charlotte's abortion clinics.

Hines estimated that about 25 women visit the clinic each day, which offers a variety of gynecological services, including pregnancy tests, birth control and abortions.

About one-third of the women will stop and talk to the sidewalk counselors. Usually, two each day will decide against the abortion.

"Our biggest day was six saves," Hines said. "We've had about 25 saves in the last month."

The Helpers pray not just for the women, but for their husbands or boyfriends, parents, friends, clinic workers — anyone involved in the decision to have or perform abortions.

"We hope that clinics will close due the changes in the hearts of the employees," said Nagy.

When a pregnant woman decides again abortion, the Helpers refer her to pregnancy help organizations, including Room At The Inn and Catholic Social Services.

Room At The Inn is a maternity and after-care program for pregnant women. The program concentrates on self-sufficiency support services by providing emotional health therapy; education, job training and housing guidance; and referrals to a variety of community agencies.

Catholic Social Services offers adoption services and pregnancy support to people of all faiths.

The Charlotte Helpers recently had a baby shower for a young woman who decided to have her son.

"Just our presence at the clinics is good," said Nagy.

Recently, a young woman stopped outside the clinic where Nagy was praying and showed a photograph of her baby.

"She drove by us one day and knew she couldn't go through with (the abortion)," said Nagy.

Speaking the truth

Classes help laity understand, respect life

BY CAROLE MCGROTTY
CORRESPONDENT

ASHEVILLE — The truth is being spoken in Asheville.

"Speak the Truth in Love" is a series of eight Saturday morning classes designed to equip the laity — especially youths — to "lovingly speak the truth about three absolutely fundamental things: life, love and marriage," according to its brochure.

The series, held at the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville and sponsored by the parish Respect Life Committee, runs from August until April 2007.

The classes will educate and provide strategies for speaking the truth, according to Pat Glass, a parishioner of the basilica and a member of Guadalupe Catholics for Life.

"We live in a time when many people ignore God until they are desperate," said Glass, who conducted the first session,

"Abortion vs. Civilization of Life and Love," Aug. 19.

Basilica members were joined at that session by parishioners from Arden, Hendersonville, Franklin, Waynesville and Charlotte, as well as by Episcopal Father Jim Swatzell, pastor of Church of the Incarnation in Black Mountain.

"I wanted to gain greater understanding and awareness on issues surrounding the culture of death and the culture of life to share in my own parish," said Father Swatzell, "with hopes we can balance out to some degree the misinformation coming from the culture of death."

Glass recalled her youth in the 1950s, when people dressed more conservatively, families stayed together and beliefs were basic — "God and one nation under God."

In the 1960s, she said, a revolution occurred, and we are now living in a "cultural war of beliefs and ideas."

Other speakers included Ben Wadhams, a junior at the University of North Carolina at Asheville who helped found an on-campus Right to Life group, and a nurse who had abortions and is now a pro-life activist.

Upcoming session topics include contraception, euthanasia and the theology of the body.

Maggi Nadol, Catholic Social Service's Respect Life coordinator in the Diocese of Charlotte, said she was appreciative of the Basilica of St. Lawrence's pro-life efforts.

The classes bring "a message of life in such a vibrant life-affirming manner," said Nadol.

Helen Gordon, a member of the basilica's Respect Life Committee, said she was pleased with the turnout for the series, and its messages.

"The whole purpose is to take it back with you," she said.

Week of prayer, fasting part of Respect Life Month events

Goals are to end abortion, build a culture of life

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A coalition of Catholic and other Christian organizations have mobilized a grassroots effort worldwide to pray and fast for life in October, which is Respect Life Month.

Respect Life Sunday Oct. 1 was the first day of the 14th annual International Week of Prayer and Fasting to promote a culture of life.

The observance, which actually was to last until Oct. 10, included prayer rallies and life chains, which ask people to line up by an abortion clinic to pray for an end to abortion.

In announcing the observance, the coalition asked people to participate as individuals, families and parishes by fasting, attending daily Mass and taking part in Holy Hours, going to confession and reciting the rosary and the Divine Mercy chaplet.

"The goals of the week are: the conversion of nations, an end to abortion and to build a culture of life," said the announcement.

Among participants listed on the event's Web site were representatives of Generation Life, Priests for Life, Life Teen, United for Life Foundation and WAKEUP, which stands for Women Against the Killing and Exploitation of Unprotected Persons.

Two major events were planned in the Washington area: a youth and family conference with the theme "To Build a Culture of Life" Oct. 7 in the Diocese of Arlington, Va., and an all-day prayer vigil Oct. 9 at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington.

Another major pro-life event taking place in Washington and around the country at the beginning of October was the American Life League's second annual Pro-Life Memorial Day Oct. 2, the opening day of the new U.S. Supreme Court session.

By participating in the observance, pro-lifers were paying "their respects to the estimated 47 million babies lost through surgical abortion," said Erik Whittington, the league's director of youth outreach.

"The innocent children who have fallen victim to this American tragedy have no voice of their own. It is our job to speak up for the babies," Whittington said in a statement.

A roundup of Scripture, readings, films and more

Third volume of The Saint John's Bible published

COLLEGEVILLE, Minn. (CNS) — Liturgical Press has published the third in its series of full-color reproduction books from The Saint John's Bible.

The volume, Pentateuch, features text and illustrations of the first five books of the Old Testament — Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers and Deuteronomy — known as the Torah in Judaism.

Illustrated scenes include creation, the Garden of Eden, Adam and Eve, Jacob's ladder, Abraham and Sarah, the Ten Commandments and the death of Moses.

When completed in 2007, The Saint John's Bible will be composed of seven volumes: Gospels and Acts, Psalms, Pentateuch, Historical Books, Prophets, Wisdom Literature, and Letters and Revelation.

Each 9.75- by 15-inch volume is about two-thirds the size of the hand-illuminated vellum pages that form the original 1,150-page manuscript.

The $4 million project began in 1998 when the Benedictine monks of St. John's Abbey commissioned one of the world's foremost calligraphers, Donald Jackson, to serve as artistic director and illuminator. Jackson is senior scribe to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth's Crown Office.

The first handwritten Bible that illustrates Scripture from a contemporary perspective, The Saint John's Bible also incorporates imagery from Eastern and Western religious traditions, as well as influences from the native American cultures in the Minnesota area.

It also documents Minnesota as the birthplace of The Saint John's Bible through the illustration of flora and fauna indigenous to the region.

"Many people have appreciated the butterflies of central Minnesota in the margins, or the occasional building from St. John's that has been tucked into an illumination, or the reference to the now-vanished World Trade Center in New York," said Benedictine Father Eric Hollas, senior associate of arts and cultural affairs at St. John's University, in a statement.

"Many agree it is important to bring

Meanwhile two versions of the "Illuminating the Word" exhibit continued to tour U.S. museums and galleries. The exhibit features more than 60 actual manuscripts, examples of preliminary sketches and tools of the artists, and explanations of the nature and history of the project.

The exhibit was at the Museum of Biblical Art in New York until Nov. 26 and was to appear at the Library of Congress in Washington, Oct. 6-Dec. 15. When God calls, we must answer

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

It has been my pleasure to know a large number of men better than myself. They have been doctors, lawyers, meat inspectors, mechanics, engineers and insurance salesmen.

Like growing to like vegetables and fish, this observation of the virtue of others is one of the great privileges of growing into maturity.

One of my virtuous friends, the meat inspector, died only a couple of weeks ago. Ralph was one of the finest men I ever knew. He was also one of the gentlest, most courteous and wisest of men.

Humble, good humored, he epitomized for me the manly maturity all males hope to grow into.

And he had a godly wisdom that came forth in his humor. He didn't talk a great deal, nor was he taciturn, but when he spoke you knew that what he said would be, like him, reliable, sound and grounded in his love of God and common-sense wisdom.

This week's Scriptures speak much of the value of wisdom and how, when pursued above all other goals, it brings us all good things besides.

In the reading from Mark for this weekend, we have the rich young man coming up to Jesus asking what must be done to enter into eternal life.

Jesus asks him if he knows the commandments and lists off six of the 10. The young man replies that he has kept them from his youth.

Jesus then asks him to measure up to a higher standard, to sell all his many possessions and give them to the poor. The young man turns on his heel and goes away sad, knowing he cannot part with his riches.

Though I can't know for certain that the virtuous men I have known would be able to meet this higher standard, I do believe they are not so full of the love of money that they would have no chance of complying with Jesus' call to leave their possessions behind to follow him — should he ever make that request.

Questions:

Are there possessions or honors or positions that own you rather than you owning them? If Jesus called you to give them up for the sake of the Gospel, what would you do?

Rapping priest releases new CD, says genre speaks to young people

BY NADIO POZO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

PHILADELPHIA — He's at it again. Father Stan Fortuna, the Franciscan Friar of the Renewal who is known as the "rapping priest," has released his latest CD in the genre.

Eighteen songs, ranging from old-school rap to world beats, make up the new release, which completes the series of rap albums he has released over the past few years.

"Sacro Song 3: The Completion of the Trilogy" deals with a range of topics, from the negative effects visited on fatherless children in "Daddy Wound," and the grip of the culture of death in "Hangin' in There," to a message of peace in "Peace Shout Out," and a tribute to his beloved role model, the late Pope John Paul II, in "I'm Loving You," "The Great One" and "KW."

Throughout the album, the doctrines of the Catholic Church are a consistent thread.

"I continue to do rap music because it's a genre that makes the message intelligible to many young people," Father Fortuna said. "And it even challenges people who don't like the genre, because the rap music affords the message to transcend boundaries and make an impact on the culture."

The new album includes the aspiring young rappers Sean Santiago, youth director of the South Bronx Youth Cultural Center in New York founded by Father Fortuna, and Glenda Mortoral, who is a member of the center.

Their song, "Ima Do Me," deals with their experiences growing up in the inner city of the South Bronx.

The album also features the rap artist Righteous B in "Jesus Talks," and the lyrical prose of Brother Agostino Torres, also a Franciscan Friar of the Renewal, in "Mezcia."

"I didn't go into working on this CD saying, 'Here is what I need to touch upon.' It was very spontaneous," Father Fortuna said.

For instance, the idea for "Daddy Wound" came to him during a conversation with another friar about the children and teens to whom they minister in the South Bronx and, specifically, about how the lack of a father figure has severely wounded those young people.

Rappin' Father Stan Fortuna performs in this undated photo. The Franciscan Friar of the Renewal's latest release contains 18 songs ranging from old-school rap to world beats.

He was on his way to World Youth Day 2005 in Germany and was missing the late pontiff, who had so greatly desired to make it to that youth festival, when Father Fortuna was inspired to write "I'm Missing You," which is his own favorite track on the album.

He has dedicated the album to Pope John Paul II, writing: "This project is dedicated to none other than my hero now and (forever), the late, great Pope John Paul II. What can I say but 'Thanks JP. I'm Lovin' You,' and see you soon."

During the same trip, Father Fortuna was impressed with Pope Benedict XVI and the current pope's clear but profound explanations of the faith.

"I love his spirituality, and the way God made his brain. He's extremely clear," Father Fortuna said.

That was also when he was inspired to write the song dedicated to Pope Benedict: "B16 Bomber." In the song, Father Fortuna includes excerpts of Pope Benedict's closing Mass homily from World Youth Day.

All proceeds from the CD go to Francesco Productions, Father Fortuna's nonprofit organization, which works with the poor and needy in the South Bronx.

Partial-birth abortion cases set stage for Supreme Court

Court observers are eyeing two abortion cases, in which the 9th and 8th U.S. Circuit Courts of Appeals each said the 2003 federal law banning partial-birth abortion was unconstitutional, to see if recent changes in the Supreme Court's makeup will affect the outcome of abortion-related decisions.

The U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops is among the organizations that filed amicus, or friend-of-the-court, briefs urging the high court to uphold the ban and use the cases to reverse the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision that legalized abortion nationwide.

Another case that has attracted the attention of Catholic organizations is a lawsuit by Massachusetts against the Environmental Protection Agency, for failing to adopt regulations that would limit greenhouse gases that contribute to global warming.

The National Catholic Rural Life Conference joined the National Council of Churches in an amicus brief arguing that the EPA was remiss in ignoring reports that greenhouse gas emissions from motor vehicles are contributing to global warming.

Christian ethics call for stewardship of the environment, the brief said, and the two organizations "therefore contend we must reduce our substantial contributions to climate change to protect the world entrusted to us."

The two abortion law cases are challenges to the 2003 federal law banning partial-birth abortion. Both rulings on appeal at the Supreme Court, as well as one by the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that is not before the high court, found the legislation unconstitutional.

In Gonzales v. Carhart, the 8th Circuit sided with Dr. Leroy Carhart, a Nebraska abortion doctor who successfully sued to overturn that state's partial-birth abortion ban. In 2000 the Supreme Court ruled 5-4 the state law was unconstitutional because it lacked a provision allowing an exception in cases where the pregnant woman's health is at risk.

Congress sought to reverse the effect of that ruling by passing a federal law banning the procedure nationwide. The bill did not include a health exception, because, the bill's proponents argued, sufficient evidence had been heard that this particular procedure is never medically necessary.

The banned procedure involves partially delivering a live fetus and then puncturing the brain stem to kill the baby before completing the delivery. Supporters of keeping the procedure legal argue that it is usually used late in pregnancy when other abortion methods are more dangerous to the woman.

In Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, the 9th Circuit ruled on behalf of a San Francisco-based Planned Parenthood affiliate and its national organization that the federal law is unconstitutional because it lacks a health exception, imposes a burden on a woman's right to choose to have an abortion and is constitutionally vague.

The legal question before the Supreme Court when it hears both cases Nov. 8 is whether the law is invalid because it lacks a health exception or otherwise is unconstitutional on its face.

The case will be heard Nov. 29. Rulings in the abortion cases and the environmental case are expected by the time the court term ends in June.

Additional cases are likely to be added to the court's docket soon after the term opens.

Objections to border fence bill their permitted period, he said. Also, a fence will not prevent people from attempting to cross into the U.S. over even more difficult terrain, he added.

But it's also a moral issue, said Appleby, citing a Government Accountability Office report that showed the number of deaths doubled after the United States began to blockade less hazardous crossing points in the 1990s.

"It's going to lead to more deaths because people will become desperate," said Appleby. "It sends the wrong signal to our neighbors. Instead of meeting the problem head-on, we're hiding from it."

Frank Sharry, director of the National Immigration Forum, said in the same teleconference that the fence legislation was pushed by the House Republican leadership "in hopes of turning out voters."

Also before the recess, Congress included $1.2 billion in appropriations to go toward various border enforcement measures including the fence, the cost of which is estimated conservatively at more than $2 billion.

Despite that, Sharry said he doubted the fence would ever be built, because of the harsh mountainous terrain, objections such as those expected from environmentalists and the Tohono O'odham Indian tribe, whose reservation traverses the border in Arizona.

In the days before the late night vote Sept. 29, religious leaders joined senators from both parties in a final push to prevent the passage of several immigration bills that House leaders threatened to add to last-minute legislation.

Auxiliary Bishop Jaime Soto of Orange, Calif., said at a Sept. 26 press conference in Washington that "this is not the time to make political points." He said Congress was faced with "a stark moral challenge," as well as a complicated economic, political and cultural issue.

"We cannot accept ineffective proposals which masquerade as solutions," Bishop Soto said.

He was among religious leaders and politicians who insisted that any broad immigration legislation must include measures to enable foreign workers in the country to meet labor demands legally and to provide a path for illegal immigrants to "come out of the shadows" and regularize their status.

Jewish, Baptist and evangelical

Protestant leaders also put immigration proposals emphasizing enforcement into a moral context.

"Thirty-six times the Bible tells us to treat strangers as we treat ourselves," said Rabbi David Saperstein, director of the Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism. "It is its most common command."

At the same press conference, Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., Ted Kennedy, D-Mass., Arlen Specter, R-Pa., Ken Salazar, D-Colo., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., all argued for holding out for a comprehensive immigration law that includes a guest worker plan and provisions that would allow the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the country to legalize their status.

Several enforcement bills were put on the table in September by House members who had blocked efforts to move forward on a comprehensive immigration bill passed in May by the Senate.

The House had earlier passed a bill with only strict enforcement measures. It was expected the two different bills would go to a joint House-Senate conference committee over the summer and a compromise version would emerge.

Instead, Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., House Judiciary Committee chairman, and other committee chairmen held a series of field hearings around the country during the summer that focused largely on enforcement. Supporters of comprehensive legislation, including Republicans and Democrats in the Senate, criticized the hearings as one-sided.

When Congress returned to work after Labor Day, Sensenbrenner resurrected parts of the original House bill as three separate pieces of legislation, which passed Sept. 21. A fourth, expanding enforcement authority against people who build cross-border tunnels, was attached to the Defense Department appropriations bill and also passed.

In a Sept. 26 letter to the Senate, Bishop Gerald R. Barnes of San Bernardino, Calif., chairman of the bishops' migration committee, had urged senators to oppose the Secure Fence Act.

The fence law "would create more problems than it would solve," Bishop Barnes wrote. "We fear it would lead to increased exploitation and deaths of migrants ... and an increase in smuggling-related violence directed at Border Patrol agents and others."

He said that a fence might be viewed "as a sign of fear, weakness and isolation, not strength and engagement."

New Catholic high school open in Arden

ARDEN — St. Thomas Aquinas Academy, the first North Carolina mountain-area high school in 30 years to offer a Catholic curriculum, opened in Arden Aug. 16.

The private, nonprofit school was organized by local parents and is run by a board of directors. It is not part of the Diocese of Charlotte Catholic school system.

"We're part of a national movement to establish schools for Catholics in rural and underserved areas," said Barbara Edwards, president of the board of directors.

Three Catholic high schools once existed in the Asheville area, but the last one closed in the mid 1970s. Meanwhile, the area's Catholic population has increased.

The board spent several years preparing for the school's opening and were pleased to meet with Bishop Peter J. Jugis in 2004 as part of their preparations.

"It was a real shot in the arm to meet with him," said R. Trent Codd Jr., headmaster of St. Thomas Aquinas Academy. "That meeting energized us. No question."

The school utilizes a college-preparatory curriculum. While it is open to students of all faiths, Catholic students attend Mass at the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville.

"I am very excited about the opening of this academy," said Father Wilbur Thomas, pastor of the basilica and spiritual director of the school.

"Many have been waiting a long time for a return to the mountains of a high school in the educational tradition of the Catholic Church," he said.

Father Thomas visited the school and blessed the students, faculty and building Aug. 18.

"With a classical curriculum, this academy builds itself on the educational foundation of Christendom," said Sedrick Dellinger, academic dean.

The school opened with students in ninth through eleventh grades and will graduate its first class in spring 2008.

Director named for Abbey Motorsports program

Rishel to oversee unique college program

BELMONT — Belmont Abbey College recently announced Dr. Tracy Rishel as director of its new Motorsports Management program.

The college is home to the nation's first four-year bachelor's degree in business with a concentration in motorsports management. Rishel's appointment was announced Aug. 31.

"We recognize the importance and uniqueness of motorsports," says Dr. Philip Bayster, chair of the business department in which the motorsports management program resides.

"There's a need for management talent. The companies associated with the motorsports industry are exceedingly advanced and, as the industry continues to grow, there will be an even greater need for highly sophisticated, competitive individuals," he said.

Although other programs of study exist, Bayster says Belmont Abbey College's program is the first with a strong emphasis on business. Other programs concentrate on technical aspects of the industry and are solely engineering-based.

Rishel is responsible for curriculum development and delivery, motorsports industry relations and student advising. She also will be involved with marketing, internships and student recruitment.

"Tracy brings a unique set of qualifications to this position," said Bayster. "Her impressive academic credentials, expertise in operations management and previous faculty experience in motorsports make her the ideal choice to lead this program."

A longtime racing fan from Pennsylvania, Rishel comes to Belmont Abbey College after two years at N.C. A&T in Greensboro, where she contributed her expertise in the business aspects of racing to the school's motorsports technology curriculum.

An active member of the N.C. Motorsports Education Coalition since its inception, Rishel has researched, presented findings and co-authored numerous articles related to the business of motorsports.

"I love academia and have a passion for motorsports, so the opportunity to combine the two is my dream job," said Rishel. "My goal with this new position is to develop a sound program that graduates students with the business knowledge and skills needed by the industry."

Belmont Abbey College is continuously ranked to be one of the best comprehensive colleges in the southeast by U.S. News & World Report and The Princeton Review.

Spreading the Word — who needs big media?

Hi-tech and grass roots promos inform the faithful

Last year, when planning was underway for the first diocesan Eucharistic Congress, questions arose about the best way to promote the new, unknown event.

Invariably in discussions like that, the idea came up about asking the secular news media for publicity. Over the course of my career, I've spent a lot of time working with and in the news media, and asking reporters for free advertising didn't strike me as a good idea.

News organizations don't exist to help well-meaning Catholics, or any other group, get the word out about an event. News organizations function at their best when they are explaining events as they occur or when they are detailing a conflict of some kind.

A story about an unknown event with only a guess as to how many people might attend isn't very attractive to news professionals.

But not having help from the news media doesn't mean that you can't attract a crowd. Quite the contrary. We hoped and prayed that 2,500 people would come to the first Eucharistic Congress. God certainly heard us, because we were blessed with a crowd of close to 6,000 for the two-day event.

That response led us to rent a larger venue for the 2006 Eucharistic Congress, and we are once again praying for a big turnout.

So how did we get the word out? Along with prayer, we used a variety of media channels to spread the message about the Congress. This included advertisements in this newspaper, a series of columns on the Eucharist by Father Matthew Buettner, letters from Bishop Peter J. Jugis to the priests of the diocese and to the faithful, Web pages on the diocesan Web site, posters and prayer cards that were distributed to churches and the creation of an e-mail list of parish contacts.

These parish contacts worked at the grass roots level, making sure that bulletin and pulpit announcements were placed, putting Congress posters on the walls of churches and talking up the event. They also kept me informed about the number of buses that were coming to Charlotte, an important indicator of crowd size.

I am most grateful to that group of people for proving beyond any doubt the power of word-of-mouth advertising.

This year's Congress created a landmark event for the successful use of a media tool in the diocese. Last year, registration for the Children's Track was handled at the parish level. This year, for a variety of reasons, registration for the Children's Track was done almost entirely on the Congress Web site at www.goEucharist.com. (A printed version of the form appeared in ads in this newspaper.)

DIRECTOR

Final score: Web registration: 320; print forms received: 2.

As a two-way mass communication tool, the World Wide Web has no equal. More and more of us use the Web, from searching for telephone numbers to registering for an important faith-based event.

As I have mentioned many times before, the Web is a liberating place where we can express, share and communicate our faith. Look for more creative uses of this medium on the diocesan Web page www.charlottediocese.org in the months to come.

Please take the time to fill out a Eucharistic Congress survey form, which will be posted Monday, Oct. 9. Your feedback of your impressions of the Congress will help us make the next Congress a better event. (It takes place Sept. 21-22, 2007.)

Thanks to the tireless efforts of volunteers and the existence of media tools such as the Web, spreading the word about an important event based on the Word has never been easier.

The most precious of God's angels

"Hello again," said the Child with a smile.

"Hello, little one," said the Voice. "My, you've gotten a lot bigger since I saw you last."

"I can suck my thumb now," beamed the Child. "See?"

"My, that's wonderful," said the Voice.

"I hear other voices," said the Child, "but I don't recognize them."

"You hear your mother talking with the doctor," said the Voice. "They are talking about you."

"My mother doesn't speak to me much anymore," sighed the Child. "I'm glad you visit with me. It's always brighter when you do. ... Sir, are you my father?"

"I am not your biological father, but I am your heavenly father," replied the Voice. "And I am always with you."

"Who is that man in the corner, the man with the horns?" asked the Child. "He scares me."

"Do not pay attention to him."

"You seem sad today, Father," said the Child. "What's the matter?"

"I'm sorry, little one," said the Voice. "I so looked forward to seeing you born, to watching you grow up. You were going to live near the water, and break a national swimming record. You were going to dance with a boy at your prom, fall in love and marry him. You were going to raise precious children of your own. You were going to work with sick people and help them feel better. But now ... that is not going to happen."

"Why not?" asked the Child.

"Because, little one ... your mother made a choice," replied the Voice.

"I don't understand," said the Child. "I want to be born. I want to grow up and do all those things."

"I know you do. And you would have been amazing at them."

"Why is my mother doing this?" asked the Child. "Does she not love me?"

"She does not know you," replied the Voice. "She has been corrupted by the lies of that man with the horns. He has won another victory today."

"What is happening, Father?" asked the Child. "I don't feel well. Something is wrong."

"Look at me, little one. Focus on me. Do you hear the music?"

"Yes, I hear it."

"That is the chorus of my kingdom, where my angels sing and dance on the clouds," said the Voice. "Listen to the music."

"I'm trying, but I feel pain! It hurts, Father!" cried the Child. "Am I dying? I don't want to die! I want to be born! I want to grow up! Please, Father!"

"I am sorry, little one," said the Voice. "I am so sorry."

"Father ... don't leave me"

"Never."

Darkness overcame the Child. The chorus of heaven fell silent. And the man with the horns smiled.

"What ... what happened?" asked the Child.

"Hello again, little one," said the Voice.

The Child looked around. "I can hear the music again! Is that where we are going?"

"Yes. I am taking you to my kingdom."

"I can see it! It's so beautiful! And I can see your angels dancing on the clouds!" said the Child.

"They are celebrating to welcome you home," said the Voice.

The Child paused, looking back. "Father, is there any way I can help my mother, and other mothers, to make the right choice?"

"That's a big task," said the Voice. "Let's work on that together."

The Child beamed. "Thank you, Father. But first ... I want to dance on the clouds with the angels!"

"Of course, little one, but," said the Voice, holding out his hand, "may I have the first dance?"

During this Respect Life Month, let's remember:

"Before I formed you in the womb I knew you. Before you were born I dedicated you." (Jer 1:5)

"My frame was not hidden from you, when I was being made in secret, intricately wrought in the depths of the earth." (Ps 139:15)

"You shall not kill." (Fifth Commandment)

The miraculous act of 'knowing'

Seeing, sharing with others reaffirms our humanity

One of our most precious resources as human beings is about to become extinct.

We are becoming completely invisible to each other. We can spend a busy and productive day, run a dozen errands around town and not actually "see" any other people.

We can go to the bank and withdraw our money from a machine. We can go to the grocery store and check out through the self-checkout line. We can talk on our cell phones as we drive through town, never noticing anyone else around us.

Our modern technology affords us incredible ease in our daily lives. But with each new convenience, there is a part of our humanity that is being lost: our connection with each other.

We don't look at each other, don't make eye contact, don't touch. We rarely smile or say a kind word.

Blessed Mother Teresa of Calcutta called America "the loneliest, the most disconnected and the most unhappy nation on earth." Loneliness, according to Mother Teresa, "is the most terrible poverty."

This is reflected in some of the biggest problems our society faces: increased crime that objectifies people as irrelevant, all-time-high rates of depression that leave people feeling alone in facing their problems and a divorce rate that illustrates just how quickly we give up on each other.

Do you know your neighbors?

Do you address the grocery clerk, whom you see sometimes twice a week, by name?

Do you look your fellow elevator riders in the eye and say good morning?

St. Paul tells us, "Now we see but a poor reflection; then we shall see face to face. Now I know in part; then I shall know fully, even as I am fully known." (1 Corinthians 13:12).

As Christians, our goal is to share the God that is within us and to recognize the God that is in others. This is what feeds our spirit and brings healing to the wounds of life.

But how does this happen when we don't make a conscious act of "seeing" those around us?

Let us now challenge ourselves to help break down the walls of alienation and loneliness in some of the following ways:

1. Be in the moment when we are with others. Let us turn off our Ipods and take off our Bluetooths. Let us open our senses and honor the presence of the life that is around us.

Peace of Mind

LORI FOX
GUEST COLUMNIST

2. We can make a connection with a smile or a handshake.

3. We can treat people around us as though we truly care about them, even if it's just for the one moment we're passing by.

One of our greatest human fears is that we will be invisible to others. Our deepest need is to know that we matter.

You have the power to heal and encourage a total stranger with merely a smile and a nod. You have the power to bring more of God's love into your heart every time you interact with another person, whether it's standing in line at the bank, waiting at the bus stop or spending a few minutes with co-workers before a meeting begins.

To know and be known? The choice is yours, a hundred times a day.

Pope says Christians must discover Jesus personally

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — To truly know Jesus requires discovering him personally, Pope Benedict XVI said at his weekly general audience.

While hearing about Christ through the Bible or through other people can introduce a person to Christian belief, "it must then be ourselves (who) become personally involved in an intimate and deep relationship with Jesus" in order to know he is truly the savior of the world, the pope said.

The pope returned to the Vatican Oct. 4 by helicopter from his long summer stay at the papal residence in Castel Gandolfo, south of Rome.

Some 30,000 pilgrims packed into St. Peter's Square, where security was boosted by additional uniformed police officers posted along the periphery of the square.

The pope, however, continued his traditional tour of the square in his open jeep at the start of the audience, greeting pilgrims and kissing babies. Additional plainclothes Swiss Guards trailed the jeep.

Continuing a series of talks on the apostles, the pope focused his catechesis on St. Bartholomew, who is traditionally identified as Nathanael.

Little is known about this apostle, the pope said, which goes to show that "belonging to Jesus can be lived and witnessed without performing outstanding works."

It was Nathanael who, incredulous at first that the Messiah could come from an obscure town, said, "Can anything good come from Nazareth?"

But Philip urged him to "come and see" for himself. Jesus showed Nathanael that he already knew him and that he had seen him under a fig tree.

The pope said this struck Nathanael as proof that Jesus was someone who "knows everything about me, knows everything" in the world, including the right path to take in life, and that this was a man whom he could really trust.

It was then that Nathanael realized and proclaimed before Jesus that he was the Son of God and the king of Israel — two aspects of Christ that all Christians must never lose sight of, the pope said.

Proclaiming only Christ's "heavenly dimension" as the Son of God risks turning him into something "ethereal and evanescent" or intangible and fleeting, said the pope, just as only recognizing his place in human history as the "king of peace" would overlook his divinity.

A call to action for Catholics

Informed voting can help foster real immigration reform

Many localities are seeing a campaign of agitation of anti-immigrant sentiment for political gain. Hispanics, in particular, are being vilified in the hopes of getting a few more voters out on election day.

Candidates and incumbents often seem to have declared an open season on Hispanics. Unfortunately, this is not receiving the national attention it deserves.

As Catholics, we are called to care for the poor, the widow and the "stranger" among us, for they have nobody to champion them. Most of these voiceless "illegals" are fellow Catholics — in fact, in many places, and despite their apparent invisibility, they are no longer the minority of local Catholics.

Unfortunately many, inside and outside the Hispanic community, fail to see this.

Despite the best efforts of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, I worry about the broader Catholic Church in the United States as appearing excessively aloof from such a pressing human concern, and too deferential to the secular world's "wisdom" on this matter.

We are all the church, and as such we would look bad (internally and externally) if we didn't take this issue to heart.

Most voters are not hearing the other side of the picture. Many Catholic voters may not be aware of the wisdom of the Gospel, as it is presented by the U.S. bishops' Catholic Campaign for Immigration Reform (www.justiceforimmigrants.com).

The Catholic Church, through its many venues, should:

1. Unmask the false political rhetoric we often hear in the media about immigrants in our communities;

2. Offer other relevant facts and figures to help develop a more balanced understanding of the reality of immigration today; and

3. Present the fullness, nuances and wisdom of church social teaching as it relates to this matter and the duties it places on us as Christians, as citizens, as politicians and as legitimate authorities.

Catholics have a duty to take Catholic social doctrine as a key point of reference in the shaping of their political views. The U.S. bishops' Catholic Campaign for Immigration Reform is doing its share to help.

The interventions of Los Angeles Cardinal Roger M. Mahony and several other bishops are enriching the local and national debate. But we need more.

This is truly an unparalleled opportunity for renewed conversion, for a deepening of our awareness of the demands of the Gospel and for action to address some of the justice and compassion issues faced by almost half of the Catholics in the United States.

Election time is only a few weeks away. The Catholic Church as an opinion-maker can play an important role in providing guidance to its English-speaking voters, to the wider church and to the nation.

Catholic-Muslim dialogue looks at faithful living in today's world

BY JERRY FILTEAU
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — At their recent Midwest dialogue, Catholic and Muslim leaders and scholars discussed what it means to live one's faith in a complex society that is secular and multicultural.

The Midwest Regional Dialogue of Catholics and Muslims was held Sept. 12-13 at the Retreat Center at St. John's in Plymouth, Mich. The U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, Catholic co-sponsor of the dialogue, issued a news release on it at the end of September.

Amid a debate over the role of religion in American life, Catholic and Muslim dialogue participants noted that their respective convictions, based on revelation, make them bearers of faith traditions that offer humanity guidance on peace, reconciliation and virtuous living.

Anas Malik, a Muslim who teaches sociology and political science at Xavier University in Cincinnati, analyzed the dynamics of Christian-Muslim collaboration on justice and other shared social concerns.

He said cooperation involves a cost on each side, so agreement to take the risk of collaborating cannot be presumed. His paper set a framework for discussing the interaction of trust and power in human group relations.

Donald W. Mitchell, a professor of philosophy and religion at Purdue University in West Lafayette, Ind., presented a paper on the role of the laity in the life of the Catholic Church.

He discussed lay spiritualities and movements and the challenges of living as a Catholic in a secular culture.

Discussion of his paper led to clarification by Catholic participants that when the church speaks of evangelization it is not talking about proselytizing, but bringing values of the Gospel to all aspects of life.

The discussion also turned to questions of authority in Catholicism and Islam.

Participants noted that, while Islam is basically egalitarian, in practice holy people and legal scholars may exercise a certain authority. Participants also discussed the authority of their respective holy books in their communities - the Bible for Catholics, the Quran for Muslims.

The next meeting is to be held Oct. 21-23, 2007, at the Islamic Center of America in Dearborn, Mich.

Its topic will be "The Mission of Muslim-Catholic Dialogue in the USA." Among issues to be discussed are best practices in local dialogues, the scope and structures of regional dialogues, interreligious cooperation on social issues, the principles and ethics of dialogue and how to approach questions of interfaith prayer.

The Midwest dialogue, one of three regional dialogues between Catholics and Muslims in the United States, was started in 1996. Last year it issued a report, "Revelation: Catholic and Muslim Perspectives."

Co-chairing the Plymouth meeting were Auxiliary Bishop Francis R. Reiss of Detroit and Sayyid M. Syeed, secretary of the Islamic Society of North America, the Muslim co-sponsor of the dialogue.

"I can suck my thumb now!"

Month 2

The developing baby is now called a fetus, which is Latin for "little one." She is making rapid progress developing all her external and internal organs. During the second month baby teeth form; fingers and toes are developing. Ears, nose, lip and tongue can now be clearly seen; brain waves can be recorded. The skeleton changes from cartilage to bone. Fetal muscle sets begin their first exercises. By 8 weeks all body systems are formed. This little one can now suck her thumb.
